I now come to the second part of the case, and that is as regards the registration in June, 1892. That is a registration for an improvement on the original registration of April, 1891. It is an improvement on the plaintiffs' original registered design, applicable for pattern and shape. Now, I understand that the plaintiffs wanted a stove which would carry a heavier lamp, and therefore afford a better heat. They wanted the stove to be enlarged, and therefore, as an improvement on the original design, the plaintiffs brought out the design of June, 1892, and got that registered as an improvement upon the first. It is said that that was not novel. I think that the improvement is novel. It is said that it is only an enlargement of the base of the original design. But, as was pointed out by Mr. Bousfield, the object was to keep the same semblance of the cathedral stove which was in the design of April, 1891, and not to depart from that. That idea was adopted of enlarging the base in the manner in which it was in the registered design in June, 1892. I think that there was novelty, and I think that it is a good registration.

Now, what do we find the defendants doing? The original design was, as I have already said, brought out in 1891. The defendants subsequently brought out that which this court holds now to be an infringement. When the second design, of June, 1892, was registered, and the stove was brought out in the next year, we find the defendants, with regard to that, doing the same thing as they had previously done.

But it is said by Mr. Moulton that the two stoves are different, and that if we hold design No. 2 to be good on account of the improvement as regards the base, you must take it as it is improved; and when you look to that which is said to be an infringement of No. 2, it is not an infringement at all. Now as I look at the plaintiffs' No. 2 it seems to me that they make a wider base by means of a sloping shelf; whereas the defendants make a wider base by means of sloping steps. The same kind of exterior is kept; the same look remains in the one as in the other. and I think, therefore, that an infringement has been made out by the plaintiffs of the registration of June, 1892, as in the case of the registration of April, 1891.

It therefore follows that there must be an injunction, and an inquiry as to damages, and an order giving up the articles in the ordinary form.

RIGBY, L.J.—I set aside in this case all the evidence as to the state of knowledge at the time when the plaintiffs registered their first stove; or, rather, I treat all that evidence as no importance. None of the articles produced at all resemble, to my mind, the design of the plaintiffs. We have therefore simply to trust to the eye, and, looking at the two stoves of the plaintiffs and defendants respectively, I am not only satisfied that one is an obvious imitation of the other, but I am also satisfied, quite independently of the evidence—though, that, of course, assists the conclusion—that the design of the defendants would never have come into existence if it had not been for the design of the plaintiffs.

Again, considering the second registered design of the plaintiffs, taking into account what has been said about its resemblance to the first, I judge when I look at it that it is a novel design. Looking again to the alleged infringement of the copyright in that design, I come to the same conclusion—namely, that the defendants' stove would not have existed as it does but for its being an imitation of, and in fact copied colourably from, the second registered design of the plaintiffs. That being so, I make no question about the validity of the registration in each case, or the fact of infringement.

I would only say, with regard to the question that was raised as to shape and configuration, that what is the subject of protection under this Act is a design. But it is not every design that can be protected. According to the definition contained in section 60 of the Act, a design is to be "applicable to any article of manufacture or to any substance artificial or natural or partly artificial or partly natural." Then the section goes on to say (in order that there should be no doubt as to the meaning of the word "applicable") "whether the design is applicable for the pattern or for the shape or configuration or for the ornamentation thereof, or for any two or more of such purposes." Now, that is a limitation. There is no question in the first part of the section as to the meaning of the word "design," and then follows an explanation of the word "applicable" in order that any mistake about the meaning of that word should be avoided. When Rule 9 of the Designs Rules, 1890, is looked at, you find that the application is, of course, for the registration of a design. The claim is to be a claim for a design. But the rule does go on, in somewhat curious language I think, to say that in making that claim for a design the applicant shall state whether it is applicable for the pattern or for the shape or configuration of the design. It appears to me that there are very many cases in which that would be appropriate and useful. But whether the statement there made would limit the claim of the plaintiffs for protection in the design we have not now to determine at all. In the case before us the claim is for the pattern, the configuration, the shape, and so on, but not as applied to anything except their stove. I have no doubt that the plaintiffs have in no way limited their rights to protection for that design by stating the shape, pattern, or configuration, and so on, to which it is altogether applicable. The design is applicable in its totality in every way in the present case, and the argument founded on that rule I think comes to nothing.

With reference to the other and more general point, that the plaintiffs have in some cases misused their registered designs, I look in vain in the Act to find that any such misuser would cause a forfeiture of their right. I do find a very stringent obligation upon them in every case and upon every article sold which represents their registered design that they shall, under pain of forfeiture, make a reference in the words of the Act to registration. But I can understand that in many cases a person who has a registered design may be in great difficulties. He would always want to be quite safe, and as long as he does nothing more than make himself quite safe under the Act I cannot see that he is doing anything wrong.

But even if he put a reference to the register upon a thing which it was impossible to suppose that he thought to be covered by that registration, it may be provided for (I have not referred to the Act) in some way by penalties or otherwise. But the Act does not say that even in a strong case like that he should forfeit his protection for the design actually registered. And I cannot find that, even if we wish to introduce any such clause, we have any jurisdiction to do so.

MORGAN v. RICHARDSON. (a.)

Executor—Legacy—Appropriation.

An executor may appropriate specific shares to a legatee, and even to himself if he is a legatee; and it is not necessary to the validity of such appropriation that a proportionate amount of the specific shares should at the same time be appropriated to the other legatees.

Adjourned summons.

By his will, dated the 13th of December, 1889, Charles Richardson appointed his son, Charles William Richardson, and Percy Fenwick executors and trustees, and in case either of his executors should object to act or die he appointed Walter Norman Richardson in his stead; and, after certain specific and pecuniary legacies, gave one-fifth of the residue to Charles William Richardson and one-fifth to Walter Norman Richardson absolutely, the remaining three-fifths being settled upon his daughters for life with remainder to their children; and as regarded the nature or quality of the securities in which the testator desired his executors or trustees to invest the residuary trust funds, he directed that one half of the residue should be invested in Consols, Reduced or New Annuities, and no other bank shares or commercial undertakings, and that the other half of the residue might remain invested in the City of London Brewery Co., either in preference shares or stock.

The testator died on the 9th of August, 1892, and his will was proved on the 12th of October, 1892, by Charles William Richardson and Walter Norman Richardson; Percy Fenwick having renounced probate.

The testator's estate consisted of a freehold house and premises called Torwood, £18,586 10s. 10d. ordinary stock in the City of London Brewery Co., £1,000 Great Indian Peninsular Railway, £800 Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. 4 per cent. Debenture Stock, £1,019 1s. 2d. Consols, and certain cash at the bank.

On the 3rd of May, 1893, an order was made upon a summons taken out by the trustees that one half the residuary estate might be invested in investments authorized by the Trust Investment Act, 1889, other than bank shares or commercial undertakings, that the ordinary stock of the City of London Brewery Co. might be retained in respect of the other half, but that the Lancashire and Yorkshire and Great Indian Peninsular Railway Stock could not be retained.

The trustees proceeded to act upon this order.

On the 19th of January, 1894, £3,600 City of London Brewery Co. was appropriated to Walter Norman Richardson at the market price of £5,283 in respect of his one-fifth, and Charles William Richardson was paid £3,500 on the 23rd of January, 1894, and £2,300 on the 23rd of February, 1894, on account of his one-fifth share.

The value of the City of London Brewery shares had since increased.

This summons was taken out by one of the daughters, who contested the validity of the appropriation to Walter Norman Richardson.

beneficiaries should have been treated alike, and appropriation made to all at once.

Macaskie replied.

NORTH, J.—I do not see my way to grant the relief asked. Two-fifths of the testator's estate were left to the sons absolutely, three-fifths were settled upon trust for the daughters, with remainder to their children. The testator held shares in the City of London Brewery Co., of which he thought a great deal; but his will directs that one half of the three-fifths shall be invested in Consols, the other half being invested as at present in the City of London Brewery Co., either in shares or stock. In consequence of this direction it became necessary to realize a considerble portion of the shares in the brewery company. One year after the death one son was paid rather less than his share. It is not suggested that he received more than his share, although he received almost the whole. The other son, instead of having the stock sold and buying it back with the proceeds, which he would clearly have been entitled to do, took it at the market price as part of his share, and I do not think it was necessary to go through the form of selling the stock belonging to the estate, and then buying it back. What has happened is this. This son has received less than his share. The stock has risen in value, and has produced income in the meantime. It is not suggested that the appropriation was mala fide, or that at worst there was more than a mistake. It is said when a share of stock was appropriated to the son a corresponding share should have been appropriated to the daughters. If a similar appropriation had been made to them, I have no doubt that it would have been perfectly good, if it did not exceed one moiety.

If the estate has to be divided in a proper state of investment, I see no reason the part already in a proper state of investment should not be divided. It would have better if the executors had made a similar appropriation to the daughters, but they were not bound to do so. I cannot say that the estate is to be divided on the footing that that was done which I do not think was done. Costs must be allowed out of the estate.

Petition.

H. W. Lawson became insolvent in India, and, by virtue of section 7 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 21, being "An Act to consolidate and amend the laws relating to insolvent debtors in India," all the interest of the debtor in any real or personal estate which might revert, descend, be devised or bequeathed, or come to him, vested instantly and without any conveyance or assignment in the official assignee, who shall have full power for the recovery thereof.

The debtor died intestate without having obtained a certificate of discharge, and administration to his estate was granted to the Administrator-General of Intestate Estates at Bombay. The debtor's father died after the debtor, and by his will bequeathed him £1,500. The trustees of the will had paid the legacy into court, and this was an application by the official assignee of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors at Bombay for payment out of the fund. As the fund had not been dealt with for fifteen years, notice had been served on the official solicitor.

The debts proved for in the insolvency largely exceeded the assets.

Will—Trust for sale—Power to postpone—Business—Time.

A testator gave his residuary real and personal estate (which included a business carried on by the testator) to trustees to sell and convert, and that they "particularly shall with all convenient speed sell" the business aforesaid; the will contained a general power for the trustees to postpone the sale of any part of the testators real and personal estate for so long as they should think fit.

Held, that this power did not authorize the sale of the business to be postponed for an indefinite time. Under the special circumstances the court authorized the postponement of the sale for two years.

In re Crowther, 43 W. R. 571, [1895] 2 Ch. 56, considered.

Originating summons.

Thomas Smith, by his will, gave his trustees all his residuary, real, and personal estate upon trust to sell and convert, and that they "particularly shall, with all convenient speed after my decease, sell and dispose of my business as a pawnbroker (as a going concern) carried on by me at (X. and Y.), together with the leases under which the premises are held, for the best price that can be obtained for the same." The testator then directed the trustees to invest the proceeds, and out of the income to pay the widow an annuity for life, reducible on remarriage. He then gave directions for the trustees to maintain his infant children during the life of the widow, in case of her remarriage, and to accumulate the surplus income, and to stand possessed of his residuary estate, including the proceeds of the sale of the business, upon trust for all his children who being sons should attain twenty-one or being daughters should attain that age or marry. Then the will continued: "I also empower my trustees or trustee to postpone the sale and conversion of my real and personal estate, or any part thereof, for as long as they or he shall think fit, and in the meantime to let or demise any real estate, including chattels real, for any term of years not exceeding twenty-one years, to take effect in possession, at such rent and subject to such covenants and conditions as my trustees or trustee shall think fit." The trustees had sold the business carried on at X., but as to the other business the trustees were of opinion that it was desirable that that business should be retained until the second son attained twenty-one, which would be in two years. This would give the two elder sons a chance of purchasing it. The main portion of the testator's estate consisted of these two businesses and the assets employed therein.

The defendants were the testator's infant children, and the court was asked (1) whether on the true construction of the will the trustees were authorized to carry on the business until the second son attained twenty-one, or during some other and what period; (2) and whether, under the circumstances of the case, they were justified in so doing.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Micklem, for the plaintiffs, relied on In re Crowther, 43 W. R. 571, [1895] 2 Ch. 56; and In re Chancellor, 32 W. R. 465, 26 Ch. D. 42, as justifying the postponement of a sale directed to be carried out with all speed, when the delay is manifestly for the benefit of the beneficiaries and estate.

Harman, for the defendants, took the same view.

NORTH, J., after intimating that the proposed postponement seemed to be for the interest of the estate, and that the immediate power of sale was not limited by the proviso giving the power of postponement, continued:—I think that the testator did not consider it desirable that the business should be continued by the trustees, but that it should be sold with all convenient speed. On the other hand, he did not wish it to be sacrificed by a forced sale. I do not think that In re Crowther is an authority that the sale could be postponed for an indefinite period. There were no such special words in that will as there are here. What is suggested here seems to me to go beyond that case. But I will do what the Court of Appeal did in In re Chancellor. I can authorize the trustees to postpone the sale for two years from the testator's death. Of course, if a favourable opportunity arose in the meantime, it should not be thrown away. There will be liberty to apply at the end of two years. The sons may probably buy the business; it would be worth more to them than to anyone else.

Solicitor—Costs—Common order for taxation obtained on behalf of a client of unsound mind not so found—Client subsequently found lunatic—Discharge of order—Duty of solicitor to disclose facts.

A summons in lunacy having been issued against A. for the appointment of a receiver and manager of A.'s estate, A. instructed B., a solicitor, to act for her. B., on behalf of A., obtained ex parte against C. & Co., A.'s former solicitors, an order for the delivery and taxation of C. & Co.'s bill of costs against A., but did not disclose the pendency of the summons in lunacy. A. was subsequently found a lunatic. C. & Co. applied for the discharge of the said order, and that B. should pay the costs.

Held, that the order must be discharged; but

Held, that as there was no evidence that B. at the time he obtained the order knew that A. was of unsound mind, and as he acted in good faith, he ought not to be ordered to pay the costs.

This was a motion by Messrs. Geo. Armstrong & Sons, a firm carrying on business as solicitors, asking that a common order for the delivery and taxation of their bill of costs against Miss Sarah Watson, obtained on the 8th of April, 1895, on behalf of Miss Watson, by Mr. G. B. Wilson, solicitor, might be discharged for irregularity, on the ground that it had been obtained by the suppression by Mr. G. B. Wilson of the fact that Miss Watson was at the date of the order in question of unsound mind and incompetent to manage her affairs or to employ or instruct Mr. Wilson to apply for the said order, and also of the fact that a petition in lunacy for an inquiry into her state of mind was at the date of the said order and to the knowledge of Mr. G. B. Wilson pending; and for an order for the payment of costs by Mr. G. B. Wilson as between solicitor and client.

Miss Watson for some time prior to 1895 employed Messrs. Geo. Armstrong & Co. as her solicitors, and they, having reason to believe that Miss Watson's mental powers were failing, communicated with her nephew Mr. Milburne. Mr. Milburne, on the 4th of March, 1895, took out a summons in lunacy asking for the appointment of a receiver and manager of Miss Watson's estate, and for the application of the income therefrom for her maintenance and benefit. On the 15th of March, 1895, that summons was served on Miss Watson personally.

On the 16th of March she, with Mr. W. Watson, called on Messrs. Geo. Armstrong & Co. with reference to the summons, which she then told them she should oppose, and she then required them to hand over to her certain moneys belonging to her; but they refused to do so. Miss Watson thereupon retained Mr. G. B. Wilson to act for her in opposing the lunacy summons and also for the purpose of obtaining the delivery to her of certain personal property in the possession or control of Messrs. Armstrong & Co.

On the 20th of March, 1895, Miss Watson filed a notice of objection to the summons. On the 29th of March, on the summons coming on, the master intimated that in consequence of the notice of objection a petition must be presented. On the 1st of April Mr. Milburne presented a petition asking for an inquiry as to Miss Watson's state of mind, and on the 3rd of April that was served on her personally. On the 8th of April Mr. Wilson obtained ex parte the order in question for the delivery and taxation of Messrs. Armstrong & Co.'s bill of costs, but without telling the officer of the court that Miss Watson was alleged to be of unsound mind or that a petition against her was pending. On the 23rd of April the present notice of motion to discharge that order was given.

On the 24th of April an order for an inquisition was made, and on the 11th of June it was found that she was of unsound mind and incapable of managing her affairs, though capable of taking care of herself. The notice of motion was then amended by making the committee a respondent, and he made no opposition to the order. The amended notice was dated the 6th of December, 1895. The nature of Miss Watson's lunacy was that she was subject to hallucinations. It appeared from Mr. Wilson's evidence that he first became acquainted with Miss Watson on the 16th of March, 1895, and that though she seemed eccentric she gave him clear and rational instructions, and during several conferences conversed with him without indicating that she had any hallucinations, and it was not until the 3rd of April that he became aware that she was subject to them. And he stated that it was his opinion at the time that she was quite competent, with the assistance of Mr. W. Watson, to take care of herself and her affairs, and was not of such unsound mind as was alleged.

Buckley, Q.C., and Fellowes, for the applicants, referred to Beall v. Smith, 22 W. R. 121, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 85, where James, L.J., says: "The bill purports to be the bill of a person of unsound mind, not so found by inquisition, suing by his next friend. It is essential to any such suit that the plaintiff should be of unsound mind, and that he should not have been found so by inquisition. What is the effect of that state of things ceasing to be? I am of opinion on principle, and there is no authority to the contrary, that the suit is absolutely paralyzed thereby"; and to Hartley v. Gilbert, 13 Sim. 596, as showing that the order ought to be discharged. They also urged that the costs ought to be paid by Mr. Wilson personally.

Hastings, Q.C., and Gatey, for Mr. Wilson, argued that upon the facts their client had been guilty of no such misconduct as a solicitor as would justify the court in making him pay the costs personally.

The committee did not appear.

Buckley, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J., referred to the notice of motion, and continued:—The discharge of the order to tax is a matter of course, there being no opposition, owing to the fact of the lady being of unsound mind.

The only question is whether Mr. Wilson is liable for the costs. It cannot be disputed that the court has jurisdiction to order him to pay them. It was done in Beall v. Smith; but of course it is a serious thing to make an order of that kind, and the jurisdiction is not one to be exercised lightly. Let us see what the facts are here. [His lordship then stated the facts, and continued:—] The question is whether Mr. Wilson has been guilty of professional misconduct in obtaining ex parte the order to tax without disclosing that his client was alleged to be of unsound mind, and that a petition in lunacy was pending against her. If, on the evidence, I could come to the conclusion that he knew on the 8th of April that she was of unsound mind, then I should say that he was guilty of misconduct and ought not to have obtained the order; but I cannot come to that conclusion. I must take it that on the 3rd of April he was aware that she was subject to hallucinations; but it does not follow that he was then aware that she was of unsound mind so as not to be able to manage her affairs. It is a difficult thing to ascertain a person's state of mind, and the border line between sanity and insanity is not easy to fix. No doubt the lady was insane, but there is no evidence that he knew it or that he was party to any improper conduct, if there was any, on the part of Mr. Wilson Watson, who assisted Miss Watson in instructing him; I cannot therefore hold Mr. Wilson guilty of misconduct in instituting legal proceedings on behalf of a client whom he believed to be of sound mind.

It was said that Shadwell, V.C., in Hartley v. Gilbert, held that to take or continue proceedings in a suit after a petition in lunacy had been presented against the party, was in one sense a fraud upon the lunacy jurisdiction. In that case, after the decree in the suit, a commission of lunacy was issued against the plaintiff, a married woman suing by her next friend. The plaintiff's husband moved that all proceedings in the suit might be stayed until after the opening of the commission and the result of the inquiries directed by the commission was known. Shadwell, V.C., said: "The only question is whether I shall allow a sort of fraud (using the word in the sense in which it is used in this court) to be practised on the jurisdiction in lunacy. Primâ facie there is good ground for supposing that the suit, instead of being conducted by the next friend, will be conducted under the jurisdiction in lunacy. Therefore nothing ought to be done in the master's office until the court has been informed what has been the result of the proceedings under the commission of lunacy." The Vice-chancellor there does use the word "fraud," but it does not seem to me that he meant to go the length of saying that a solicitor who believed his client to be sane could not take proceedings in the name of the client if he knew that a petition in lunacy against the client had been presented. If that were so, it might be very disadvantageous to the client. All that that case goes to, in my opinion, is that the court, when informed of the petition, will, in a proper case, stay the proceedings until the inquiry into the state of mind of the party has been completed. In the present case an application to stay proceedings would have been a proper course to take; but I can imagine a case in which, for the protection of the alleged lunatic, it would be proper that the proceedings in his name should go on.

Another authority referred to was Beall v. Smith. In that case, after the inquisition had been held, proceedings in the name of the lunatic were prosecuted without the committee being communicated with, and the Court of Appeal held that there had been professional misconduct on the part of the solicitor. I am bound by the decision in that case. Moreover, I agree with what was laid down by it, and in no way desire to depart from it. In the present case, when the proceedings were instituted, there had been no inquisition, and the case of Beall v. Smith is only relied upon because James, L.J., in his judgment, said: "We were referred to some decisions or dicta to the effect that a suit becomes abated by the appointment of a committee; and it was contended from this that there was no abatement until such appointment. But there is no decision that it can go on in the interval between the inquisition and the appointment; and Shadwell, V.C., expressed a clear opinion that going on, even after the commencement of proceedings in lunacy, would be a fraud on the jurisdiction." The Lord Justice there adopts the language of Shadwell, V.C., who, as I have said, used the word "fraud" in a qualified sense, and meant no more than that the court would, in a proper case, stay the proceedings until the result of the inquiry was ascertained.

Then it was said that the solicitor was guilty of professional misconduct in not disclosing that the petition was pending when he obtained the common order to tax. I express no opinion as to whether it would not have been better that he should have disclosed it; but if it was anything more than a mistake it was not such misconduct as to make Mr. Wilson liable for the costs.

I think there is no reason for supposing that the proceedings here were taken otherwise than in good faith, and in the interest of the lady by the person advising her. I discharge the order to tax, with costs, to be paid out of the trustee's estate; and dismiss the motion as against Mr. Wilson, with costs, to be paid by the applicants, who can apply in the lunacy to be recouped such costs out of the estate.

JONES v. PENNEFATHER. (a.)

Administration — Executor — Retainer — Surety — Promissory note — Money due, but not paid — Receiver — Claim after chief clerk's certificate filed.

A surety who is one of the executors of a testator is entitled to exercise his right of retainer in respect of the debt for which he is surety, if due though unpaid, out of the assets of the testator paid into court by the executors in an administration action; and such claim is not made too late even if first made after the chief clerk's certificate has become binding.

Summons.

On the 28th of March, 1891, the defendant Colonel Pennefather, who was one of the executors of Thomas Giles, the testator in this action, gave jointly with the deceased a promissory note for £1,000 to Messrs. Pomfret, Burra, & Co., the deceased's bankers, payable six months after date with interest at 5 per cent. The defendant Pennefather joined in the note simply as surety for T. Giles.

The bankers made a claim in this action, which was an ordinary creditors' administration action, and their claim had been allowed. The usual administration decree had been made, and the chief clerk's certificate had been filed and become binding, from which it appeared the estate was insolvent.

The executors had paid into court £5,000, proceeds of the realization of the personal estate, and had subsequently paid £770 to the receiver, who was appointed in the action.

The defendant Pennefather had not paid the amount due on the note, but now applied by summons, which came on with the further consideration of the action for liberty to prove against the estate of the testator for the sum of £1,000 and interest thereon from the 28th of March, 1891, at the rate of 5 per cent., notwithstanding the time limited for entering claims had expired, and for liberty to exercise his right of retainer as one of the executors of the testator.

Warrington, Q.C., and Sebastian, for the defendant Pennefather.—An executor who is a surety and pays moneys into court is entitled to the right of retainer, although he has not actually paid the debt. The surety, if he were not the executor, could sue the executor and could have paid the debt out of the £5,000 in hand before it was paid into court: Nisbet v. Smith, 2 Bro. C. C. 579; Ferguson v. Gibson, L. R. 14 Eq. 379, 21 W. R. Dig. 6. Though In re Harrison, Latimer v. Harrison, 34 W. R. 736, 32 Ch. D. 395, is primâ facie against him, the question as to present right of indemnity was not argued nor were the former two cases cited. Payment into court makes no difference: Chissum v. Dewes, 5 Russ. 29; Richmond v. White, 27 W. R. 878, 12 Ch. D. 361.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Waggett, for the plaintiff.—The claim is too late: Player v. Foxhall, 1 Russ. 538; Ex parte Campbell, Campbell v. Campbell, 29 W. R. 233, 16 Ch. D. 198.

They also cited In re Orme, Evans v. Maxwell, 50 L. T. N. S. 51, 32 W. R. Dig. 6.

KEKEWICH, J.—There is no doubt as to the general law that persons claiming to be creditors are allowed to come in at any time on reasonable terms, so long as there are funds available and so as not to disturb any prior division that may have been made; and this has been allowed even after a second further consideration.

Under an order for the administration of an estate the executors' right to retain is preserved. But it is said here that he is too late, and reliance was placed on the case of Player v. Foxhall; but that case is explained and dealt with by Bacon, V.C., in his judgment in Ex parte Campbell, where the Vice-Chancellor says that "the executor's right is one which, like any other, may be lost, forfeited, or released. But I cannot entertain any doubt that under an order that the estate shall be applied in payment of debts in a due course of administration the executor's right to retain is preserved. His right is a plain legal right, and he has done nothing either by instituting a creditor's suit or by submitting to account in the ordinary form, which shows any intention to relinquish it." Here I can see no intention on the part of the applicant to forfeit or release it. The delay on his part is amply explained. The bankers proved for the full amount. The estate has not been distributed, and there is no difficulty as to the proof. As executor he may claim to retain, if he has a present debt. In In re Orme Kay, J., directed the application to stand over to see if, in fact, the applicant had to pay the debt; but here that course would be absurd, as Colonel Pennefather would, of course, be at once called on to pay. He has the right to prove; there is therefore no convenience to be obtained in causing it to stand over.

But then it is said that until he has paid he has no right to retain, and for this proposition the case of In re Harrison, Latimer v. Harrison, is relied on; but in that case neither Ferguson v. Gibson nor Nisbet v. Smith was cited, and it does not really touch the point. Pearson, J., in that case said that there was no debt due to the surety before payment, which is true, for the right to indemnity is not a debt; and then he devotes his mind to the question whether there could be a right of retainer, as there were no moneys in his hands at the time when the debt matured. Whatever may be the value of that case, it is entirely unaffected by anything I say on the present question, as it does not affect the point in this case. Colonel Pennefather has an equitable debt which can be converted into a legal debt by payment. The bank debt should be paid in full, and the applicant is entitled to his costs.

Company — Winding up — Set-off — Mutual dealings — Money on deposit — Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 38 — Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 10.

A company which was being pressed by its creditors deposited certain moneys with a firm of solicitors to settle certain claims, and after the claims had been paid a balance remained in the hands of the solicitors. Shortly afterwards the company passed resolutions for voluntary winding up, which was continued under supervision. No account had been rendered to the company by the solicitors, though they kept an account in their books showing the various receipts and payments, and there was no evidence that the company had in any way consented to any portion of the money being applied to any purpose other than that for which it had been originally deposited with the solicitors. The solicitors claimed to set off a debt for costs against the liquidator's claim in the winding up for the balance.

Held, that there was no set-off.

Observations on the meaning of section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The above-named company was being wound up under supervision of the court, and a question arose in the winding up as between the liquidator and a firm of solicitors with whom moneys had been deposited by the company to settle certain claims whether a balance of these moneys, after the claims had been paid, could be set off by the solicitors against a debt for costs, or whether they belonged to the liquidator.

Early in the year 1892 the company was pressed by some of their creditors, who had got judgments, and they deposited certain moneys with their then solicitors and instructed them to settle the claims of the creditors. The solicitors settled some of the claims, and had a balance in their hands. The solicitors kept an account of these transactions with the company in their own books, showing the various receipts and payments, but there was no evidence that they ever rendered an account to the company. In March, 1892, the company went into voluntary liquidation, which was afterwards continued under supervision. The solicitors claimed to set off the balance above mentioned against the amount of their costs incurred prior to the winding up.

This was a summons taken out in the winding up by the liquidator to determine the question whether the said balance could be properly set off against the amount due for costs.

Micklem, for the summons.—The money was given to the solicitors for a specific purpose, and the balance belonged to the company and ought to be paid to the company. There can in these circumstances be no set-off.

He referred to In re Pollitt, 41 W. R. 89, [1893] 1 Q. B. 175.

C. E. E. Jenkins, for the solicitors.—The specific purpose came to an end when the claims had been paid. After that the balance was in the hands of the solicitors as a mere debt due to the company, and the provisions contained in section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (which by section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, are extended to companies), as to "mutual dealings" apply, and the balance can be set off against the sum due to the solicitors for costs.

He referred to Palmer v. Day, ante, p. 14, [1895] 2 Q. B. 618; Jack v. Kipping, 30 W. R. 441, 9 Q. B. D. 113.

Micklem replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In this case a set-off cannot be allowed. The summons is raised in a very convenient form—i.e., on an agreed statement of facts, the substance of which is that certain sums were deposited by the company with its former solicitors for a specific purpose, and it is not denied that so long as they were retained by the solicitors for that purpose there was no right on the solicitors' part to any set-off; but it is said that before the date of the winding up the purpose for which the moneys had been deposited had failed—i.e., the moneys had been applied as far as they could be. That is, the judgment creditors of the company are said to have agreed to accept a composition on their debt, the composition and the costs have been paid, and there is no purpose to which the balance remaining in the solicitors' hands can be applied. It remains in the solicitors' hands as a debt due to the company, and the liquidator now claims payment of it. The solicitors say they are entitled to set it off against their costs, and I agree with them to the extent that if it can be shown that the moneys in question remained in the hands of the solicitors with the knowledge and consent of the company after the judgment creditors had been paid their composition, the solicitors would be entitled to set off. It would be a mere debt due to the company from their solicitors. But it is denied that it ever did so remain in the hands of the solicitors of the company. Primâ facie the moneys were paid for a specific purpose, and primâ facie they would be held for that specific purpose, and when that purpose had been satisfied the solicitors would have to return the balance to the company. The onus is therefore on the solicitors to show consent by the company to their retaining the moneys in question, and I fail to find evidence of such consent. There is nothing to show that the solicitors ever communicated to the company the fact of their having a balance in their hands, or that they rendered any account to the company before the company went into liquidation. Nothing, therefore, happened to change the purpose for which the moneys were originally paid, and no set-off can therefore be allowed.

That is sufficient to decide the present case, but I wish to say a word on the "mutual credit" section in the Bankruptcy Act of 1883. The law has been modified by the insertion of the word mutual "dealings" in this Act. Many matters now fall within the section which formerly did not, but the necessity for mutuality has not ceased. At one time there had to be mutual debts; then it was held that mutual transactions resulting in debts would be sufficient, and then mutual transactions which would probably result in debts. Finally there came the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which (section 38) includes all "mutual dealings" between the bankrupt and others, but mutuality must always appear. Palmer v. Day has been cited to show that no mutuality is necessary, and that every provable debt in bankruptcy falls within the section. I am of opinion that Palmer v. Day did not decide that. The Lord Chief Justice said: "The section, however, in its present shape has been held applicable to all demands provable in bankruptcy and so as to include claims as well in respect of debts as of damages, liquidated or unliquidated, provided they arise out of contract." The Lord Chief Justice clearly limits the operation of the section. The present claim does not arise out of contract at all. It is a claim to retain moneys paid to the solicitors. It has been said that the section covers claims for costs, but in the case of Jack v. Kipping the claim for costs was only allowed to come within the section on the ground that, the claim of the trustee being for the price of goods, the misrepresentation by the vendor leading to the purchase was, as between vendor and purchaser, a "mutual dealing" within the section. In the present case no set-off can be allowed, because the money was received under a contract to be applied for a specific purpose, the contract was never determined, and the company never consented to the money being applied to any other purpose.

Tramway — Bye-law — Refusal to pay the fare in default of producing ticket.

A bye-law made by a tramways company provided as follows: "Each passenger shall show his ticket (if any), when required so to do, to the conductor or any duly authorized servant of the company, and shall also, when required so to do, either deliver up his ticket or pay the fare legally demandable for the distance travelled over by such passenger;" another bye-law imposed a penalty for breach of any of the bye-laws. A passenger, who had already paid his fare, was unable to produce his ticket, having inadvertently torn it up, and refused to pay the fare a second time. He was summoned under the penalty bye-law.

Held, that the magistrate was bound to convict him.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

The bye-law in question was made, in pursuance of the Tramways Act, 1870, by the North Metropolitan Tramways Co. Another bye-law imposed a penalty of £2 for the breach of any of the bye-laws of the company.

A summons was taken out against the respondent under the bye-laws for refusing to deliver up his ticket or to pay the fare. It appeared that the respondent had already paid his fare, but he had inadvertently torn up his ticket.

The magistrate found that the respondent had no fraudulent intent, and dismissed the summons, but stated a case.

C. W. Mathews, for the Tramway Co.—The bye-law was made for the purpose of protecting the company from the dishonesty of their servants. The case of Heap v. Day, 34 W. R. 627, 51 J. P. 213, is exactly in point, in which it was held that a bye-law in exactly similar terms was a valid bye-law, and that a person who refused to deliver up his ticket or pay the fare was rightly convicted under it.

The respondent was not represented.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The appeal must be allowed. One sees the reason for a bye-law of this kind. It is not very happily worded, but the appellant's construction of it is right. It is quite obvious that it would be destroying the utility of the bye-law to follow the suggestion I made—namely, that a person could not be called upon to pay the fare twice over. The case does not find whether the respondent had the means to pay. If he had lost not only his ticket but his money too—if, for instance, he had had his pocket picked—I do not know what effect that would have. But here there was nothing to show that he had no money, and he ought to have paid.

KAY, L.J.—This bye-law has the force of an Act of Parliament. The respondent ought to have paid the fare demanded. If he had already paid it before, he might, perhaps, have recovered back the second payment; but to refuse to pay was to commit an offence against the bye-law.

Inland revenue—Inhabited house duty—Tenements—Lessee dividing premises into a dwelling-house and a shop respectively—Lessee retaining the shop and subletting the dwelling-house—Assessment made on the whole of the premises—House Tax Act, 1803, s. 10—48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B, rr. 3, 6, 14—Land Tax Act, 1851—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 15), s. 13 (1) and (2).

A trading company became the lessees of a house, which they had divided, before taking possession, into two distinct and separate tenements. The lower tenement they retained themselves, but used it solely as a shop for the purposes of their trade, the upper tenement they let for residential occupation to a tenant, who was not a servant of the company.

The whole of the premises having been assessed to inhabited house duty:—

Held, that the assessment was right, as the exemption conferred by section 13 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1878, in respect of business premises, was intended to extend only to the case of a person who let the whole of a house in separate tenements, and did not apply where the landlord or lessee retained the occupation of part of the premises for the purposes of his own business or trade.

Appeal by the surveyor of taxes for the Finsbury Division of the county of Middlesex against a decision of the Commissioners for General Purposes.

The facts, as set out in the special case stated by the commissioners, were as follows. The Home and Colonial Stores, Limited, the respondent company, was a company with a registered office at No. 114, Paul-street, Finsbury, having some 270 branch establishments at various places in London and the provinces. In 1892 they wanted to open another branch shop in Finsbury, and, being unable to find a shop only to let, they decided to take, on a twenty-one years lease, the whole of 152, Stroud Green-road. This house consisted of a shop and parlour on the ground floor, with a side door and passage from the street, and two floors over. Before they took possession they had the premises divided into two portions, by putting up a matchboard partition and barring and screwing up two doors, so as to cut off entirely the residential part of the house from the shop and parlour. That portion so divided off for residence, they sublet to a Mr. Hawke, who was in no way connected with the company, at a weekly rental of 15s., which included all rates and taxes. The other part of the house the company retained for their own use, occupying it in the daytime only, and then solely for the purposes of their business. Each part was thus an entirely separate tenement, there being no internal communication or means of access between the two portions, which had each a separate entrance from the street and separate sanitary arrangements.

The company had been assessed for inhabited house duty for the year 1894-5 on the full value of the whole of the premises, 152, Stroud Green-road. The company, considering they were not liable to pay inhabited house duty on the whole of the premises, but only on the residential portion of them (under the agreement to pay all rates and taxes with their sub-tenant), appealed to the commissioners. The commissioners allowed the appeal, and reduced the assessment from £100 at 6d. in the £ to £32 at 3d. in the £.

The surveyor of taxes appealed against this decision.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the Crown.—The question here is whether the whole or only a part of these premises are chargeable with inhabited house duty. No question arises as to the party by whom that duty is to be paid. I submit that the company is liable to pay duty on the value of the whole house, for it is neither "divided into nor let in different tenements" within the meaning of section 13 (1) of 41 & 42 Vict. c. 15 (Inland Revenue Act, 1878). That exemption does not apply to the case of a special letting off of any part of the premises by a person who has the right to occupy the whole, so long as he actually occupies the premises himself: Russell v. Coutts, 19 Sco. L. R. 197, 1 Tax Cas. 469. The mere barring and screwing up of internal doors does not constitute a structural separation or division.

The following cases were referred to: The Yorkshire Fire and Life Insurance Co. v. Clayton, 29 W. R. 539, 6 Q. B. D. 557, 1 Tax Cas. 336; on appeal, 30 W. R. 174, 8 Q. B. D. 421, 1 Tax Cas. 479; The Attorney-General v. Mutual Tontine Investment Chambers Association, Limited, 24 W. R. 9, L. R. 10 Ex. 305; In re Cowan and Strachan, 17 Sco. L. R. 314, 1 Tax Cas. 245.

R. M. Bray (A. Clarke Williams with him) for the respondent company. — Whether the structural dividing in this instance is sufficient to satisfy the statute or not, is a question of fact. It has been found by the commissioners that there was a physical and bonâ fide dividing of the premises, and that point of evidence cannot again be gone into. In Chapman v. The Royal Bank of Scotland, 30 W. R. 81, 7 Q. B. D. 136, 1 Tax Cas. 363, Hawkins, J., said: "I do not apprehend that any particular mode of division is essential, provided that there is an actual division into separate tenements. It does not matter whether the division is by brick wall or by lath and plaster, or by matchboarding; but there must be such a division that anyone going over the premises would say, 'This is one tenement; that is another.'" [WRIGHT, J.—We are agreed that the structural dividing in this case may be assumed to be sufficient.] Then, the premises being divided into two rateable distinct tenements, the exemption given by section 13 of 41 & 42 Vict. c. 15 is rightly claimed for that part used solely for business purposes. In Allan v. Thomson, 21 Sco. L. R. 741, 2 Tax Cas. 52, where, in a common tenement, the same person occupied, as a dwelling-house and as a shop respectively, two separate tenements, the value of the shop was not included in the assessment value of the premises. [WRIGHT, J.—The difficulty you have to get over is the question of letting.] That is so. The exemption has been granted to the freeholder where premises have been let under similar circumstances to the present, and the exemption is by inference intended to be extended to the leaseholder.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., in reply.—In all the Scotch cases the whole of the premises were "let," and they are no authority in support of the respondent's case. The only exception is the case of Allen v. Thomson; but that is distinguishable, and was decided on other grounds applicable to Scotch law only.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case there was a building which was a dwelling-house unquestionably, and was inhabited at the same time as a dwelling-house. The respondents, desiring to take the benefit of the exemption conferred by the Inland Revenue Act of 1878, barricaded off a portion of the building which was properly speaking the inhabited part, and kept for themselves the part of the building which they desired to use for a shop; and they let to a weekly tenant, or, at any rate, to a tenant paying a weekly rent, the other or upper part; and the question is whether that brings them within the exemption.

The liability to the inhabited house duty depends in the first place upon the Land Tax Act of 1851, which fixes the amount to be paid on inhabited houses, and enacts that the provisions of the former Acts shall be applicable. Then the provisions of the former Acts that are applicable are, first, the 10th section of the House Tax Act, 1803, which says that every dwelling-house, and so forth, shall be brought into charge; and the next Act is the Act of 1808, Schedule B, the schedule of duties made payable on all inhabited dwelling-houses according to the value thereof. Rule 1 directs that "The duties are to be charged annually on the occupier or occupiers for the time being of every such dwelling-house." Then by rule 3 all shops and warehouses which are attached to a dwelling-house, or have any communication therewith, shall, in charging the duties, be valued together with the dwelling-house, and so forth. Passing by rule 6 for the moment, I need only refer to rule 14 in order to exclude it. It was contended that rule 14 applies in this case, but it clearly has no application whatever, because rule 14 applies only where the different tenements in the dwelling-house are distinct properties. Therefore there remains only rule 6 to mention. Rule 6 is the only rule providing for different parts of a house being let to different tenants. It says: "Where any house is or shall be let in different storeys, tenements, lodgings, or landings, and shall be inhabited by two or more persons or families, the same shall nevertheless be charged as if such house was inhabited by one person or family only, and the landlord or owner shall be deemed and taken to be the occupier of such dwelling-house, and shall be charged with the said duties." So the law stood until 1878. If it had stood there, it seems to me to be plain that the respondents here would have been liable to the duty which the Crown claims. They were occupiers of that which was an inhabited dwelling-house. By rule 3 the part used as a shop was to be valued in with the inhabited part, and as it seems to me rule 6 would have been inapplicable. Whether or not rule 6 means by the words "where any house shall be let in different storeys," where the whole house shall be let in different storeys, I do not know, and it is not necessary to decide. But rule 6 taken by itself does not require that there shall be more than one set of inhabitants in order for it to apply at all, and therefore whether that rule applied or not the respondents would be liable. Then comes the Act of 1878, which says (section 13): "Where any house, being one property, shall be divided into and let in different tenements, and any of such tenements are occupied solely for the purpose of any trade or business . . . the person chargeable as occupier of the house shall be at liberty to give notice in writing . . . and after the receipt of such notice by the surveyor the commissioners acting in the execution of the Acts relating to the inhabited house duties shall, upon proof of the facts to their satisfaction, grant relief from the amount of duty charged in the assessment so as to confine the same to the duty on the value according to which the house should, in their opinion, have been assessed, if it had been a house comprising only the tenements other than such as are occupied as aforesaid or are unoccupied."

On this and the applicability of this enactment various questions have been raised. It is not necessary absolutely to decide whether there was a sufficient division here. Some of the expressions in Yorkshire Fire Assurance Co. v. Clayton no doubt indicate that there must be what is called a structural division, whatever that is. I should think that such a division as existed in this case might be sufficient. I believe my brother Hawkins, in the case of Chapman v. Royal Bank of Scotland, said he could not see why a carpentry division may not be just as effectual as a bricklayer's division of the premises. I certainly should not, therefore, be inclined to decide the case in favour of the Crown on that point.

But then there comes another question. There has been a division of judicial opinion as to whether this section has any application so long as the lessor remains in occupation of any part of the house. It is very difficult to discover the real meaning of the Legislature on the subject. I am inclined myself to think, with the majority of judges who have expressed opinions upon it, that the section ought to be construed according to its strict literal meaning, where the whole of the house, being one property, is altogether divided into and altogether let out into different tenements. The respondents actually occupy a part of this building, though not the part which is actually inhabited; and, as it is an inhabited dwelling-house and they substantially occupy the house, they are liable, unless they bring themselves strictly within the terms of the exemption. I do not think the exemption relied on is applicable to this case, as I think the words "let in different tenements" mean let to different persons by the general lessor, and do not include a case where the general lessor has let the whole of the premises to one tenant, and that tenant sublets a part and occupies the rest as here. If you read the section as if it referred to the letting by the superior landlord, then it does not apply, because the superior landlord has neither divided the house nor let it to different tenants. If you read the section as referring to the inferior landlord—the respondents—then it cannot apply, because they have not let nor tried to let the shop at all. The exemption asked is for a shop in the case of a person who does not become chargeable to the inhabited house duty as occupier, by reason of his letting out the whole of the building which is called a house. In my opinion, neither rule 6 nor section 13 applies in cases where the whole of the building is not let out in separate lettings; and the case of a landlord taking part of the premises for himself is not a case within section 13 at all. It is conceded, and, indeed, must be conceded on the facts, that that part retained by the respondents is not let as a different tenement from the other part of the house; it is retained by the landlord, and was never let as a different tenement, and only came into his occupation as part of the letting of the whole house. It was not, therefore, "such a tenement as was occupied solely for the purposes of trade," because "such a tenement" means a tenement which has been divided from the other tenement or tenements in the house, and has not only been divided but has itself been let as a separate tenement. But this shop has not been let by the party claiming the exemption, and that it should be let as well as divided is a condition to the claim being allowed. For these reasons judgment must be for the Crown.

KENNEDY, J., in concurring, said: — It is unnecessary for me to express any opinion whether the dividing was a sufficient structural division of the house to satisfy the statute or not, and I prefer to assume that it was. On that assumption, I think that the case does not come within either rule 6 of Schedule B of the Act of 1808 nor within section 13 of the Act of 1878. I agree with the very clear and definitely expressed opinion of Lindley, L.J., in The Yorkshire Fire Assurance Co. v. Clayton, and with the view that Huddleston, B., stated he was very much inclined to take in Chapman v. The Royal Bank of Scotland, that neither that rule nor section 13 are applicable to cases where the landlord occupies part of the premises for his own business or trade.

ness of which was carried on at an office at 53, Fleet-street.

The appellant Joseph Stoddart, her husband, was the owner of the office at 53, Fleet-street; and the appellant Frederick Brandon was the publisher of the paper, and jointly with Joseph Stoddart managed the business.

In connection with the paper the appellants organized competitions called "coupon competitions," which consisted in their offering a prize of a large sum of money to anyone who should correctly fill in a coupon published in the paper with the names of the winners of two or more specified horse races about to be run. Twenty-five blank coupons were supplied with each copy of the paper, and the purchaser was entitled to send in one of them free of charge; and he might use any number of the remaining twenty-four on payment of one penny for each one sent in.

The competition in respect of which the summonses were issued was announced in the issue of the 26th of March. The prize was £100, and competitors were invited to attempt to fill in the coupons with the names of the first four horses in the Grand National Steeplechase, which was to take place during the ensuing week.

Carson, Q.C. (Grain and Kershaw with him), for the appellants.—To be a lottery no room must be left individual skill, as was held in Barclay v. Pearson, [1893] 2 Ch. 154, 41 W. R. Dig. 83, the "missing word" case, where the missing word was arbitrarily chosen, and was not necessarily the most appropriate one. It cannot be suggested that naming the winner of a horse race is a matter of mere chance.

He also cited Caminada v. Hulton, 60 L. J. M. C. 116, and Taylor v. Smetten, 11 Q. B. D 207, 31 W. R. Dig. 115.

R. D. Muir, for the respondent. — Caminada v. Hulton is distinguishable on the ground that in that case one 'price was 'paid for the paper and the coupon, and the competition could justly be described as only a device to increase the sale of the paper; but here, after the first coupon was exhausted, a separate sum was paid for each coupon used. Though the selection of one winner might afford opportunity for the exercise of skill, yet when it came to naming three winners, it could be nothing more than chance; the very fact of twenty-five coupons being supplied for twenty-five separate attempts showed this.

POLLOCK, B.—I am satisfied as to the question of a lottery that there was no contrivance or device to obtain money by chance. Naming the winners of horse races is not necessarily a matter of chance. I am clear that this is not a lottery.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 28.—BRUCE, J.—In this case I have come to the conclusion that I ought to decree the sale of the ship. I do so upon the ground that it seems to be beneficial to the interests of the parties generally that the ship should be sold. The majority of the owners have, by constituting themselves a limited liability company, made it impossible that the ship can be profitably employed in the general interests of the owners, unless the dissenting owners, the minority of the owners, agree to come into the company. In my opinion the majority of the co-owners of the ship have no right thus to change the character of the ownership, except with the consent of all persons concerned. I am satisfied that the course taken by the majority must be ruinous to the interest of the holders of the twenty-four sixty-fourth shares now applying to me, unless they consent to come into the company. That the court possesses power to direct the sale is beyond question. It is true it has been given by a recent Act, but the reason why the power was given was because it was found that without that power the court was often unable to adjust disputes between part owners. No rules are given in the statute as to how this power is to be exercised. It is left entirely to the discretion of the court; but it is clear from the decision of Sir Robert Phillimore in The Nellie Scheneider, 3 P. D. 152, 27 W. R. Dig. 202, that the power may be exercised on the application of the minority of part owners; and it seems to me that when part owners of a ship are unable to agree as to what is to be done with their common property, and there appears to be no way of preventing the sacrifice of the property except by a sale, the court ought to direct a sale.

I was impressed by what counsel for the majority owners said as to the reluctance the court must always have in directing the sale of a man's property against his consent; and I agree that the court ought to be very cautious in directing a sale against the wish of the majority of the part owners; nor should it do so unless it is well satisfied that it is to the interest of all concerned.

In order to guide me in the exercise of my discretion I have tried to find some analogy in other branches of the law. I do not mean to say that the case of the sale of real property is in all respects similar to the case of the sale of ships; but there is some analogy. In the case of Pitt v. Jones, 29 W. R. 33, 5 App. Cas. 651, a sale of real property on the application of only three-sixteenths of the owners was directed by the Court of Appeal, and sanctioned by the House of Lords, on the ground that it was for the general interest.

One of the matters which guide the discretion of the court in acting under its statutory power is that the majority of the owners are, as in this case, unwilling to purchase the interests of the minority; and when I find that the statute has given general power to decree a sale I do not think I can be wrong in saying that the court may at least exercise that discretion where it is satisfied that it is to the general interests of all persons concerned that the property should be sold.

At the same time, while I make such a decree, I think it is right to give time to see if the parties cannot come to terms. It may be that the majority of the co-owners will be willing to purchase the interests of the minority; and therefore I shall direct that the order lie in the registry for four days.

In re HUBBUCK.
HART v. STONE. (a.)

Will—Tenant for life and remainderman—"Property not actually producing income"—Debt due to testator—Realized security insufficient to pay capital—Apportionment.

A testator, after directing his property to be converted and the income to be paid to his wife during widowhood, gave his trustees power to postpone the conversion, and declared that the income produced by his estate previously to conversion should be applied as income under his will. The will then proceeded as follows: "But no property not actually producing income which shall form part of my estate shall be treated as producing income or as entitling any party to the receipt of income."

At the death of the testator there was a debt owing to him, in respect of which the trustees subsequently took from the debtor a mortgage of certain policies of assurance as security. These policies, while the tenant for life remained the testator's widow, were realized and produced a sum insufficient to pay the capital of the debt. There were also arrears of interest due.

Held, reversing the decision of Stirling, J., that the sum realized being, according to the well settled rule of the court, partly capital and partly interest, the widow as tenant for life was entitled to have the sum apportioned between capital and income.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Charles A. Hubbuck, by his will dated the 26th of August, 1890, gave his residuary, real, and personal estate to his trustees upon trust to sell, call in, and convert the same into money, and to invest the moneys produced thereby upon the securities therein mentioned, and to pay the income thereof to his wife during her widowhood; and if she should marry again, in trust out of the said income to pay her an annuity of £750 per annum; and after the death or second marriage of his wife, subject to the said annuity, in trust for the persons therein mentioned. The testator gave his trustees power to postpone the conversion of his estate, and declared that the income produced from his estate previously to conversion should be applied in the same manner as income arising from investments therein authorized. The will then proceeded as follows: "But no property not actually producing income which shall form part of my estate shall be treated as producing income, or as entitling any party to the receipt of income."

The testator died on the 23rd of December, 1890. At the time of his death two sums of £2,000 and £1,500 were owing to him from one Ernest Hart, sen.

On the 1st of April, 1892, the trustees of the testator's will took a third mortgage of three policies on the life of Hart as security for his debt.

Hart died in November, 1894; and on the 9th of January, 1895, the trustees realized from their security the sum of £3,669 14s. This sum, after certain necessary payments had been made out of it, was insufficient to pay the capital of Hart's debt, and there were besides large arrears of interest. The testator's widow subsequently married again.

On the 10th of April, 1895, the trustees of the testator's will other than the widow, who was also a trustee, took out an originating summons against the widow and one of the persons entitled in remainder for the determination of the following, among other, questions—viz., How and on what principle, having regard to the terms of the will, the sum of £3,669 14s. was to be apportioned as between capital and income of the estate, and what part of the said sum was to be paid to the testator's widow as income, and what part was to be retained by the trustees as capital?

On the 13th of November, 1895, Stirling, J., made an order on this summons whereby, after directing certain sums to be paid out of the £3,669 14s., he declared that according to the true construction of the testator's will the testator's widow, as formerly tenant for life under the will, was not entitled to any part of the residue of the said sum of £3,669 14s., and that such residue formed part of the capital of the testator's estate.

The widow appealed.

O. L. Clare, for the appellant.—Except for the clause relied on by the respondent, the circumstances of this case are the same as those of Turner v. Newport, 2 Ph. 14, and the widow is entitled to have this fund apportioned between capital and income. The clause was intended to meet the case of a reversionary interest, and does not apply here at all.

He also referred to Cox v. Cox, 17 W. R. 790, L. R. 8 Eq. 343; Ackroyd v. Ackroyd, L. R. 18 Eq. 313; In re Earl of Chesterfield's Trusts, 32 W. R. 361, 24 Ch. D. 643; In re Duke of Cleveland's Estate, [1895] 2 Ch. 542; In re Morley, Morley v. Haig, ante, p. 140, [1895] 2 Ch. 738.

W. M. Cann, for the respondent.—The rule laid down in Turner v. Newport is an arbitrary one, and should not govern a case like the present. It is impossible to describe the policies as property "actually producing income." At any rate, the fund should only be apportioned as from 1892, the date of the mortgage, and interest at 3 per cent. only should be allowed.

O. L. Clare.—As to interest, that will be at the mortgage rate: In re Foster, Lloyd v. Carr, 39 W. R. 31, 45 Ch. D. 629.

Stallard, for the plaintiffs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I confess at first I did not quite grasp the case, but now that I understand it I am bound to say I think Stirling, J.'s, decision is erroneous. By the will the testator directs his property to be converted, and the income to be paid to his wife so long as she shall remain his widow; and if she shall marry again, he directs that she is to have an annuity of £750 a year. Then there is a power enabling the trustees to postpone the sale and conversion, and then there follows this clause respecting what is to be done with the income. [His lordship read the clause dealing with the income of the estate prior to conversion, and continued:—] That is a provision to get rid of Howe v. Lord Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137, and to let the widow take the income whatever it is. Then come these words: "But no property not actually producing income which shall form part of my estate shall be treated as producing income, or as entitling any party to the receipt of income." What does that mean? That is put in evidently for the protection of the remaindermen, to prevent the tenant for life requiring any income not actually earned to be made good at the expense of capital. It would protect the remaindermen, for instance, in the case of the income not being sufficient to pay the annuity. The effect of Stirling, J.'s, order is to take from the tenant for life that which according to the rules of the court is income, and give it to the remaindermen, and to produce a result which is just the reverse of what was intended or contemplated.

The position of affairs to which we have to apply this clause is this. The testator had a debt owing to him of £3,500. That debt could not be got in when he died, and the trustees, doing the best they could, obtained a security from the debtor. They took some policies as a security, and there being some charges on them they took subject to these charges. After the testator's death, and before the widow married again, they realized the security, and, after paying off the first charge, the security produced a sum of somewhere about £3,000, that is to say, less than what was due by the security, less by all the interest and by a portion of the capital. Now, what does that sum realized by the security represent? If you asked any commercial man or any accountant or lawyer, he would say that it represented both the arrears of income and capital, and that it ought to be apportioned, so much for the amount of interest due at 5 per cent., and the rest for capital. In that state of things, but for this clause in the will, so much of that money as represents income would go to the tenant for life, and the security would have actually produced it. It produces the money, and if some of the money has to be treated as income, it produces income. It is said on behalf of the respondent, that so much of that money as is income is to go from the tenant for life to the remaindermen, to whom it does not belong; but it appears to me that Mr. Clare, on behalf of the appellant, is right when he says that this money which the security has produced is income, and is income produced during the life of the tenant for life and before she married again. It appears to me that we must allow this appeal, and make an order such as is asked for in the notice of appeal, and declare that the appellant, the widow, is entitled to have the residue of that sum of money apportioned between capital and income in the proportion of what was due in respect of income and what was due in respect of capital.

KAY, L.J.—From respect to Stirling, J., from whom we are differing, I will add a very few words. The sum which has been realized from the security taken by the trustees after the testator's death for a debt due to the testator is not sufficient to pay the capital of that debt.

The debt was £3,500, and the sum realized is only about £3,000. What was due was not merely the sum of capital, but an arrear of interest which accrued during the lifetime of the tenant for life. The ordinary rule of the court is to be applied to that first of all. What is that sum which has been recovered? Is it capital, or is it income, or is it partly capital and partly income? By the settled rule of the court that sum recovered is partly capital and partly income. You cannot possibly alter that. That is the ordinary rule, and it is a very well settled rule. That is independent of the will, and without looking at the will at all. In that state of things you have to apply the will. Now, I find that the will gives to the widow the income produced by the testator's residuary estate, of which this debt formed part, whatever it may be. Whether any portion of the estate is a wasting security or not, the actual income of the whole residue is given to the widow as long as she remains the testator's widow, and if she marries again then she has an annuity. As I have already said, this sum was realized while she was a widow, and the whole arrear of income is an arrear of income which accrued due while she was a widow. Therefore primâ facie it cannot be denied for a moment that the widow, the tenant for life, is entitled to so much of this sum as represents income. Is there anything in the will which alters that? If there be, the effect of it is, as has already been said, to give to the remainderman that which is income, and which primâ facie belongs to the widow. Where is there anything in the will which does that? The clause relied on is in these words: "But no property not actually producing income which shall form part of my estate shall be treated as producing income or as entitling any party to the receipt of income." Did this sum produce income or not? Here is this sum realized during the lifetime of the widow and tenant for life, part of which is income and part of which is capital. If that is not "producing income," I do not know what the words mean. That security, being realized, has produced income; and you cannot say that this clause applies, on the ground that the security did not produce income. Then does this clause mean that if the security does produce income, although it does not produce it year by year, but produces it after a delay and a lapse of time during which there was no income made, can you say the effect of this clause is to give the income to the remainderman and take it away from the tenant for life? I cannot find a word in the will to that effect. The clause seems to me to be intended as a protection to the remainderman in cases of this kind; suppose there was some investment which could not well be realised and which produced no income at all, and suppose the widow were to say: "I am entitled to have that valued as from the death of the testator, and have 4 per cent. out of the capital as my income on that," the clause, I think, is meant to meet such a case as that. The tenant for life would not be entitled, where the investment produced no income whatever, to have an imaginary income paid to her out of capital at the expense of the remainderman. But that is not this case. Another mode of illustrating the case is this. Suppose the mortgage money realized produced enough to pay both principal and all the arrear of interest, could the remainderman say, "I will take the whole fund, both principal and interest"? It seems to me impossible. If he could not in that case, why should he take that part of the fund which is a portion of the income to which primâ facie the tenant for life is entitled? With very great deference to the judgment of Stirling, J., I think this will does not touch the particular facts that have happened in such a way as to deprive the tenant for life of this income, which by the rule of the court she is entitled to, and give it to the remainderman. It would be totally contrary to the meaning of the provision of this particular will. I therefore agree that the decision of Stirling, J., must be reversed.

SMITH v. SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Negligence—Railway company—Level crossing—Contributory negligence.

The plaintiff's husband was killed by a train at a level crossing on the defendants' line. The crossing was one for vehicles, and also for foot passengers. A man was stationed there by the defendants, and occupied a cottage close to the crossing. It was the duty of this man to go out and signal the trains as they passed, to show that the line was clear. The plaintiff's husband, who was acquainted with the man and lived in the neighbourhood, called at the cottage, and almost immediately after he left it was run over and killed by a passing train. The man gave no warning to the plaintiff's husband that a train was approaching, and did not go out to signal the train. There would have been no statutory duty for the defendants to have a man at the crossing if it had been a crossing for foot passengers only.

Held, that there was evidence to go to the jury of negligence on the part of the defendants.

Held, also, that there was evidence from which the jury might infer that the plaintiff's husband had not been guilty of contributory negligence, and that the evidence was not such that the circumstances were equally consistent with the accident having been caused by the plaintiff's husband's negligence as by the defendants'.

Motion by the defendants that judgments, which had been entered for the plaintiff, should be entered for the defendants, on the ground that there was no evidence proper to be left to the jury; or for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

The action was a claim under Lord Campbell's Act for damages for the death of the plaintiff's husband, which was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants.

On the 16th of December, 1894, Thomas Clark Smith, the plaintiff's husband, was killed at a level crossing on the defendant's railway, called the "Stone Crossing," by a passing train. There was a cottage on the down side of the crossing occupied by a man named Judges, whose duty it was to open and shut the gates for the purpose of allowing carriage traffic to pass. It was also his duty on hearing a gong sound, which announced the approach of a train, to go out and signal to the driver if the line was clear. The only way of getting to Judges' cottage was across the line. Smith, who lived on the opposite side of the line to that on which the cottage stood, on the night in question came to the cottage to inquire whether his wife was there. On being told that she was not, he went out again. Within a very short time after he had left the whistle of the up train was heard. Judges did not go out to signal the train, and the engine-driver did not slow down. The latter, however, whistled 200 yards before he came to the crossing. He was travelling at the rate of thirty-five to forty miles an hour. A man named Skinner, the son of the former attendant at the crossing, was in the cottage at the time of Smith's visit. When this man heard the whistle he looked out of the window, and when the train had passed he went out with a lantern and found the mangled remains of Smith two or three rods beyond the crossing, on the up side. The night was dark, but clear. There were no circumstances of peculiar danger at the crossing. On the gates, or on one of them, there was a lantern which showed a red danger signal up and down the line when the gates were opened across the line. The line was straight for a mile and a quarter one way and for 500 yards the other way. The negligence alleged was the omission of Judges to come out to signal the train.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages £200 for the widow, and £200 for each of the children, and judgment was entered accordingly.

Willis, Q.C. (W. Peel and W. O. Willis with him), for the appellants, the railway company.—The judge ought not to have left the case to the jury. There was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants. The defendants were under no obligation to have a man at the level crossing for the protection of foot passengers. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, contains the statutable requirements with regard to level crossings. Section 61 deals with the requirements in the case of crossings for foot passengers. These were to supply and maintain good and sufficient stiles or gates. That was done in the present case. Judges was placed at the crossing to comply with the requirements of section 47, which deals with crossings for carriage traffic. Those requirements were, among others, to maintain gates of a certain size, which shall communicate with a servant of the company who shall be employed to open and shut the gates and to keep them constantly closed across the line, except during the time when carts, &c., were passing. Stubley v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 14 W. R. 133, L. R. 1 Ex. 13, and Cliff v. Midland Railway Co., 18 W. R. 456, L. R. 5 Q. B. 258, were authorities for the proposition that unless there were circumstances of peculiar danger the defendants were under no obligation to keep a man at the crossing as far as foot passengers were concerned, and they were not bound to continue a voluntary precaution: Skelton v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 15 W. R. 925, L. R. 2 C. P. 631. Moreover, assuming the negligence of the defendants to have been proved, in the course of the plaintiff's case evidence came out which went to show that the plaintiff's husband must have himself been guilty of negligence, and that was a ground for a non-suit: Davey v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 12 Q. B. D. 70, 32 W. R. Dig. 172. Smith had fifteen feet to walk before he came to the up line. Either he looked along the line or he did not look. If he looked, he ought not to have crossed till the train had passed; if he did not, he was obviously guilty of negligence. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that the accident was due solely to the defendants' negligence. In order to do that he must give some primâ facie evidence that he himself was not guilty of negligence; and where, at the end of the plaintiff's case, the facts proved or admitted in cross-examination are equally consistent with the accident having been caused by the plaintiff's negligence as by that of the defendants, the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited: Wakelin v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 35 W. R. 141, 12 App. Cas. 41, and Cotton v. Wood, 29 L. J. C. P. 333, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 59. The plaintiff must not only give evidence of the defendants' negligence, but also evidence connecting that negligence with the accident. For that purpose he must show that the accident was not due to his own negligence. Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Co. v. Slattery, 27 W. R. 191, 3 App. Cas. 1155, shows the sort of facts which ought to lead the judge to the conclusion that the accident was as much due to the plaintiff's as to the defendants' negligence.

Crispe (A. Bassett Hopkins and G. K. T. Purcell with him), for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The minute and able argument of Mr. Willis in this case has left me without any doubt at all as to what it is right to do. The judge was asked to hold, as a matter of law, that there was no evidence in this case of negligence on the part of the defendants; and, secondly, if there was negligence on the part of the defendants, that there was no evidence of the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the plaintiff, and on that ground he was not asked to non-suit, but, as it is said now, to direct the jury to find a verdict for the defendants. The argument dealt with a great many points of law. With respect to such a matter as this it is obvious that the question is one of law. The question was whether the judge was bound in law to do that which he was asked to do.

Now, I shall not enter into a discussion of what the different points of law were, for, assuming them all to be as argued by Mr. Willis—not that I agree to them—in my opinion there was not sufficient ground upon which the judge was entitled, as a matter of law, to direct that the verdict should be entered for the defendants.

Upon the question of whether there was evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants, Mr. Willis did not argue that there was not. The whole stress of his argument was directed to the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff's husband. Now, in one way or another, if there is contributory negligence in such a case as this on the part of the plaintiff, contributory negligence which conduces to the accident, I think nobody doubts that the plaintiff cannot recover. On whomsoever the burden of proof lies, if it is true that, although the defendant was negligent, the plaintiff was also negligent, and both contributed to the accident, it must be admitted on all hands that the common law of England is that the plaintiff cannot recover. He has not made out his cause of action. You may describe that in many phrases: he has not made out that the negligence of the defendant was the sole cause of the accident which happened; he has not made out that the negligence of the defendant was the cause, because upon that finding it would be evident that it was not the negligence of the defendant, but the joint negligence of the plaintiff and defendant, which was the cause. Therefore the question here is reduced to this, Could the judge properly direct the jury in this case, as a matter of law, that the negligence of the plaintiff was proved, or ought to be taken as proved?

I must go further; I must say that it is an admitted proposition of law also that if there is not evidence of any material fact, then the judge is bound to direct the jury so; and therefore it is the duty of the judge to consider whether, upon the facts, he can really say that there is no evidence to go to the jury.

Now, we must look to these facts for the purpose of determining what is the state of the facts as to the alleged want of reasonable care on the part of the plaintiff's husband. There was a level crossing, which seems to be a marked and paved crossing going from one side of the railway to the other, and that level crossing was a highway for the public. It was a highway for carts, carriages, and vehicles, and also for foot passengers. There seems to have been one causeway, upon which carriages and foot passengers would have crossed. There were two gates on each side of the railway. There was a wide gate, and there was a smaller gate; and through the wide gate, when it was free, carts and carriages would go. But, even when that gate was shut, still there was this small gate which would let a foot passenger go on to that causeway. That being the case, a foot passenger had a right to go across. Now, it was proved that this foot passenger was—at least there was evidence before the jury that he was—a respectable man, and that he was on that night an absolutely sober man, and there was evidence upon which a jury might come to the conclusion that he had come across the railway, and had gone to this house or cottage to ask whether his wife was there. He was told she was not. At that time he found the man Judges in the cottage by the fire, I believe reading. When he was told that his wife was not there, and after some conversation, he went out of the cottage. The jury would be of opinion most undoubtedly, from what happened immediately afterwards, that he went out of the cottage with the intent, then and there, to cross the railway again; and they might think that he, in truth, did immediately go on to this causeway to cross the railway.

Some suggestion was made that he was not sober. That would be a question for the jury, not for the judge. The judge cannot say, as a matter of law, whether a man is drunk or not.

Then there is another fact. Judges had a duty to perform, and that was—at all events a jury might come to that conclusion—that when a train, either by day or by night, was to pass over the level crossing, he ought to be outside and ought to signal. Signal for what? To assist the driver of the engine to do that which would be necessary. There was evidence that he habitually did it. Now it is immaterial, for the purpose for which I use it, whether that duty was a duty to the public. It was a duty, at all events, to the railway company, whose servant he was. The plaintiff's husband, therefore, who had been at that cottage before, and who lived in the neighbourhood, the jury might well come to the conclusion, knew—not to whom the duty, according to law, was owing—but knew that that man was in the habit of doing that thing for the railway when a train was approaching; and the jury might very well, therefore, come to this conclusion—that such a man, with such knowledge, had a right to consider that there was no train coming, and that therefore he might go across the causeway in the ordinary way without any great attention, and that, under the circumstances, even if he did not look up or down the railway, but did neither, yet he was not guilty of a want of reasonable care. They might act upon the very view stated by Lord Cairns in Wakelin v. The London and South-Western Railway Co., where he said that the plaintiff, the man who was crossing, had a right to suppose from the practice of the railway company—not from their duty, but from their practice—that if there was a train coming, it would whistle; and that if there was no whistle, the jury might then reasonably come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was thrown off his guard, as it were, and was left in a state of mind in which it was not unreasonable that he should not look to see if there was a train approaching. So here the jury, as it seems to me, might well think that the fact of Judges staying in his cottage when the plaintiff's husband would know that, according to his practice, if there was a train coming, he would not stay in the cottage, but would go outside, the jury might very well think that that would produce in this man's mind a state of partial security, which would prevent it being a want of reasonable care, that he did not look either to the one side or the other for a train, and that he came to the conclusion in his own mind, though in fact it was erroneous, that there was not a train coming; and therefore the jury might be satisfied, as they were satisfied in this case, that the plaintiff's husband was not guilty of a want of reasonable care. I think, therefore, without entering into all the various points which were so ably argued, that this is sufficient to determine the case, and to permit us to say that the judge was right in declining to direct, as a matter of law, that the verdict be entered for the defendants.

I ought to have said that as to the misdirection I cannot see a symptom of it.

I will only say one more thing, which has nothing to do with this judgment really, but with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in that case that went to the House of Lords: Wakelin v. London and South-Western Railway Co. The judgment of the Court of Appeal in that case, delivered by me, was an effort to state what this court considered that the law as to all these points was at that time. I heard that judgment read yesterday, and, as far as I myself am concerned, I think that it was absolutely correct in every part. It is very minute, it is very carefully stated, and I take notice that that judgment was agreed to by Lord Bowen and by Fry, L.J., who sat beside me; and I only say that I wish that it had been reported, and I wish it now, and I think it would be useful to the profession if it were reported now in some note to some case of this kind.

LOPES, L.J.—There are two grounds upon which the defendants ask for a new trial. One is the ground of misdirection. Perhaps I ought almost to have said that there is properly only one ground, because if the learned judge permitted the case to go to the jury where there was no evidence to go to the jury that was a misdirection; but the misdirection was put on other grounds, and I allude to it for this reason, that on reading the summing up I can see no other ground of misdirection that can for a moment be relied on, except this ground of misdirection, in permitting the case to go to the jury when, as it is said, he ought not. That is the only ground of misdirection that I can see. It is said that the judge ought to have withdrawn this case from the jury as a matter of law. It is said there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants; and if there was negligence of the defendants, then that there was no evidence of the negligence producing the mischief—by which I mean that it led to the death of Smith, and that his death was attributable as much to his own negligence as to any negligence of the defendants. That is how it is put.

Very interesting and difficult questions have been discussed in the course of this case; but I do not propose to express any opinion with regard to them. I am satisfied to say that the plaintiff who brings an action of this kind must give evidence of the negligence of the defendants causing the injury to the plaintiff. Again, what the duty of a man stationed at a level crossing might be when there is a free passage for foot passengers and closed gates which have to be opened for vehicles, whether the duty he has to discharge is a duty to his employers or a duty to the passengers and to those who drive vehicles over the causeway—all that is unnecessary to decide.

Now, the first question is whether there was any evidence of negligence of the defendants. What was the duty of the defendants? Their duty was this: to use reasonable care and apply proper precautions in the management of their railway at that particular spot; and it seems to me that they have determined for themselves what was the reasonable and proper precaution they ought to adopt at that particular spot, because they put there a man whose duty it was to signal each train as it passed. If that was so, I think it may rightly be said that it would not be only a warning to the engine-driver, but would also be a warning to the general public, including in that description not only those who came with vehicles to cross the way, but also foot passengers using it.

On the night in question there was a man placed there, called Judges. I do not desire to say much about Judges. He was not very competent; he was a man of considerable age, and, moreover, he was very decrepit, and he does not appear to have had much experience in the duties he had to perform. What did he do? It being his duty to signal the passing train, he remained in his lodge reading, and did not signal.

Now, if it was the duty of the railway company to use reasonable care and proper precautions, and if they thought that this was a reasonable and proper precaution, it is clear to my mind that their servant failed in doing that which he ought in order to observe that care and precaution. He failed to do that, and he was the servant of the company, and the company therefore are responsible. It seems, therefore, to me, with regard to this part of the case, that there clearly was evidence which ought to be left to the jury as to whether the defendants had used reasonable and proper care and proper precaution in the management of their railway or not.

But then it is said, in the circumstances of this case, nothing is known as to how Smith came by his death; and the case of Wakelin v. The London and South-Western Railway Co. is relied on. I quite agree with my lord, and I think it was a great pity that that case was not reported. It seems to me that it does lay down very important propositions of law. It is said here that what happened to Smith was fully as consistent with want of reasonable and proper care on his part as it was consistent with the want of reasonable and proper care on the part of the defendants. It is said this train had lights, it whistled, and could be seen for 760 yards; and that Smith must have contributed to his own misfortune by the heedless and reckless way in which he crossed the line with the danger before his eyes. If that could be established, of course the argument which Mr. Willis laid before the court, relying on the case of Wakelin v. London and South-Western Railway Co., would be fully sustained. Can it be said that what happened to Smith was equally consistent with his as with the defendants', negligence having caused it? That is a matter on which I do not hesitate to say that in the course of the case I felt a difficulty, and I have given it the best thought and attention which I can, and it strikes me in this way. Smith knew the crossing; he knew the practice at the crossing; he knew that generally and habitually trains were signalled. Then may not the jury have thought, and may they not be justified in thinking, that Smith, seeing Judges in the lodge, making no attempt to signal any approaching train, might have thought, and might reasonably have thought, that he might safely cross the line without taking such proper precautions for his own safety—namely, looking upwards and downwards, and listening for a whistle, as he would have done if he had not been misled by the conduct of Judges? Now, it seems to me, after careful consideration, that that is a view which a jury might reasonably take, and had I tried this case, and the matter had occurred to my mind as it does now, I feel I could not have withdrawn the case from the jury. It was a matter in respect of which they were entitled to give an opinion, and in respect of which their opinion ought to be asked. It was asked, and they have found for the plaintiff. Therefore I think their verdict cannot be disturbed.

KAY, L.J., after refering to the facts, proceeded:—Now, the gates which closed the carriage way, or one of them, had upon the middle of it a lamp, and when the gate was open it would open across the railway; and then at night the lamp would show up and down the line a red light, which was the danger signal, I understand. Therefore it could not be—at least, I will assume that the jury might say it could not be—only for the sake of the vehicle traffic that the man was to be on the side of the line when a train passed, and show his white light. The jury was surely justified in inferring that that was to show that the line was clear of any kind of obstruction either by vehicles, or by people passing, or by any other danger which might well occur upon a level crossing. In argument this point was put by me: Suppose a school of children were passing across this line on a dark night, and the man was there, and saw them passing, and saw that they were in danger, would it not be his duty to signal the train that there was danger, and to try, if he could, to prevent the train running over those children? I should suppose that the jury might well infer that that was part of his duty. [After continuing the recital of the facts, his lordship proceeded:] The misdirections alleged were these. The first was that "the railway company put persons on the level crossings to take care of them." What misdirection is there in that? It may perhaps be indefinite. It may mean "Judges was placed at this level crossing to take care of the level crossing." Then the second thing objected to was this—that "if the company had not kept, as they ordinarily do, persons at level crossings to take care of them and protect the public, they must necessarily go slowly." Is there any misdirection there? They are bound to take reasonable care and caution; and if there is no man at a level crossing, surely they are bound to take all the more care and caution then that they do not interfere with people who may be crossing there. I see no misdirection in that. The third is this: "The railway company, being obliged to protect the gates as far as vehicles are concerned, are necessarily obliged as far as foot passengers are concerned to protect them also, if they keep persons there as they do. The man who has to protect the carriages will also protect the foot passengers." Is that a misdirection? I confess it seems to me to be absolutely accurate, and that there is no misdirection in it at all. Now, the fourth and last was this: After describing what Judges' duties were, as to which there was no conflict, the learned judge says: "Any neglect of duty on the part of Judges is, I tell you, a neglect of duty on the part of the railway company, for which the railway company is responsible." Can it possibly be said that where an official, like Judges, is placed at a level crossing like this, and neglects his duty, that neglect of duty is not attributable to the railway company? Is it possible to deny that?

The next point is: Was there any evidence to go to the jury of neglect of duty on the part of the railway company in this case? The duty of the railway company was acknowledged to be to have a man on the line with a light whenever a train passed. That they assumed to be their duty, and they had a man there whose duty it was to be always present when a train passed. The learned judge in his summing up does not accuse the engine-driver of any neglect of duty whatever. I am not sure that the jury would agree with him in that, because the engine-driver says in his evidence that he did observe that the man was not there when the train was passing. He missed the light which the man ought to have shown him, and which he might have seen a long distance before he came to the crossing, because the line, as is shown by the photograph, is perfectly straight for some distance on the side on which the train was approaching. Now, what was the duty or what might the jury fairly think was the duty of the engine-driver when he saw that the man was not there and there was no light shown? If the man had not a red signal to show, the danger signal would be the absence of the white light, and he did not show the white light, and yet the engine-driver drove this train at from thirty-five to forty miles an hour past the level crossing. Might not a jury say that that was some evidence of want of proper caution and care on the part of the engine-driver? I should think they might, at any rate it is a matter to be left to them.

Then the default of Judges was a thing which cannot be denied for a moment, and the only way in which Mr. Willis sought to meet it was this. He said that he had no duty whatever towards the foot passengers, his duty was only with regard to vehicles and horses. I utterly deny that. When a man is placed, as Judges was, with the duty of signalling when any train passed, night or day, to show, as Mr. Willis said again and again, that the line was clear, that is a duty as much for the safety of the foot passengers as for the safety of carriages and horses or the safety of the train, or at any rate the jury had a right to infer that. Therefore it seems to me that there was evidence upon which the jury might well infer a neglect of duty on the part of the railway company.

Then it was said that the facts are equally consistent with a want of due precaution on the part of the man himself, and that the law is that the judge should say: "These facts are equally consistent with either hypothesis, and therefore there is nothing for the jury to decide." I venture to say, with all possible respect to those who hold a different opinion, that as long as we have juries in these cases, and as long as they are to be the judges of fact, it must be a very remarkable case indeed in which a judge will take upon himself to say: "I will weigh these circumstances and draw inferences from them, and say that they weigh exactly the same on the one side as on the other, and therefore I will withdraw the case from the jury." There may be such a case, and the House of Lords seems to have considered in one case which was before them, that it was such a case. I can only say that those cases must be very rare indeed, and it does not seem to me that this is that case, and I entirely agree with what has fallen from both the other members of the court. In this case it was a fair inference that Thomas Clark Smith, who was familiar with this crossing and with the lodge, and knew Judges, and would know what Judges' duties were, as he found that Judges gave him no warning, and did not go out upon the line—it was a fair inference that he was misled by that neglect of duty on the part of Judges, and did not take such precautions as he ought to have taken if Judges had gone upon the line and had done his duty by warning him that a train was coming.

It is said: "The engine-driver began to whistle ten seconds before he reached the crossing." Whether the man heard the whistle or not in the hurry of leaving the cottage—for it seems to have occurred just as he was leaving the cottage—was all for the jury to consider.

It seems to me that there was not that even balance of evidence which would justify any judge in withdrawing this case from the jury and saying that the circumstances were equally consistent with this accident having been caused by the negligence of the poor man himself as with having been caused by the negligence of the company, and that therefore there was no case for the jury. To my mind this was not such a case, and no judge would have been justified, in the present state of our legal proceedings, in withdrawing this case from the jury on that ground.

On the question whether the verdict was against the weight of evidence, I need say little. This is not a case to which it is possible to apply that principle, and it is applied very rarely in any case.

I wish to guard myself entirely against its being supposed that I agree to the view that it is any part of the plaintiff's duty, in a case of this kind, either by pleading or defence, to make out a primâ facie case that the plaintiff has not been guilty of contributory negligence. I reserve my opinion upon that point entirely, and I do so for this reason: I see that there is very considerable conflict of judicial opinion on the subject. In the cases in the House of Lords which have been cited very eminent judges indeed have expressed a contrary opinion. I myself rather incline to the opinion, as at present advised, of those learned judges who have expressed their opinion in the House of Lords; but I reserve my opinion on that subject until the question comes before us for decision.

Gaming — Partnership — Action for account—Illegal business — Bookmaker's business — Betting — Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), s. 3—Place used for betting.

In an action by a turf commission agent or bookmaker against his partner, who was the active partner and transacted the business at race meetings, for an account of the profits of the business,

Held, that, inasmuch as the conduct of a bookmaker's business did not necessarily involve any violation of the provisions of the Betting Act, 1853, and it appeared that the plaintiff contemplated that the business would be carried on in conformity with the rules of Tattersall's enclosure at meetings, and not in such a manner as to come within the prohibition of the statute, the plaintiff was entitled to relief at the hands of the court, and the order must go for an account, notwithstanding that the defendant might have acted illegally at meetings.

Action.

This was an action by a turf commission agent or bookmaker for an account of a bookmaking partnership entered into with the defendant, who was also a bookmaker and the active partner in the business. The partnership was an oral one, made on the 21st of August, 1894, by the terms of which the plaintiff contributed one-fourth part of a capital of £1,000, and was to receive a proportionate net share of the defendant's book. The defendant having attended some four or five race meetings, the plaintiff on the 12th of September, 1894, wrote a letter terminating the partnership, and asking for his £250 to be returned. The defendant wrote in reply, enclosing a cheque for £250. The plaintiff alleged large profits, and claimed a fourth share. The defendant offered the plaintiff about £20, and, this being declined, paid the sum into court.

The main defence to the action was that the partnership business was an illegal one.

The defendant adduced evidence to show that the plaintiff was well aware that the business of a cash bookmaker—which appeared to be the turf description of this business—could not be conducted in Tattersall's enclosures without contravening the Betting Act, 1853, and that, whereas it was the custom of the "large men" who booked principally credit commissions to conduct their business without display or ostentation, it would be the custom of men like the defendant, who sought cash bets, to attract as much of the attention of the public as they could by their get up and appliances, such as a large book with owner's name on it, a bag, and betting tickets, and, above all, a portable, collapsible box to be used in Tattersall's enclosures in contravention of rules, for the bookmaker to stand on. It appeared that the defendant confined his operations at race meetings to betting in the enclosure, and that he did not bet on the course.

Levett, Q.C., and Moyses, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to the usual order for an account of profits.

R. Younger, for the defendant.—First, the circumstances show accord and satisfaction. Secondly, the business is within the prohibition of the Betting Act, 1853, and the court will not aid the plaintiff. Any person using a place for the purposes of betting is within section 3, and the plaintiff must have known or be taken to have known that the business intended to be carried on by the defendant, the active partner, would bring him within the prohibition of that enactment.

CHITTY, J.—The plaintiff and defendant entered into a partnership in a business, which was that of a bookmaker. The partnership was at will, and there was no writing. It began on the 21st of August, 1894, and was terminated by notice by the plaintiff on the 12th of September, 1894. The plaintiff received back from the defendant the £250 which he advanced as his share of capital in September, 1894. The plaintiff now asks for an account of profits. The first defence was accord and satisfaction. [His lordship held that that defence failed for reasons which do not call for a report.]

The second and most important defence was that the partnership was illegal, being for a purpose forbidden by the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. The first question that arises is: Is the business of a bookmaker necessarily illegal, must it be so carried on as to fall within the provisions of the statute? That question must, I think, be answered in the negative. The statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, as is well known, does not make betting illegal. It merely avoids the wagering contract. A man may make one bet or many, or carry on a betting business, provided the business as carried on does not fall within the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. That a betting business may be carried on without coming within that statute is conclusively shown by Doggett v. Catterns, where the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the habitual use of a particular spot in Hyde Park for the purpose of making bets with persons resorting thereto was not the using of a "place" for the purposes of betting within the meaning of the Act.

The next question is: Did the parties intend or contemplate that the business should be carried on in a prohibited manner? If they did, it was illegal, though nothing definite was said at the time that the partnership was entered into. It is plain that the case is not within section 1 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. The partners were not the owners or occupiers of any "house, office, room, or other place" for the purpose of carrying on business. The point for the defendant turned on section 3, which is aimed not only at owners or occupiers but at persons using a place within the prohibition of the Act. The plaintiff's evidence was to the effect that he contemplated that the business would be carried on in the ordinary way in which the business was carried on by a bookmaker in Tattersall's enclosure at race meetings. With reference to the practice of bookmakers standing on what are called "boxes," the object of which was to elevate the bookmaker above the heads of other persons in the enclosure, the plaintiff's evidence was that he had frequented some races, and that the rules of Tattersall's enclosure were that such "boxes" were not permitted to be brought in, and there was no substantial controversy as to this. But the defendant said that there were bookmakers who, notwithstanding the rules, by "squaring" or bribing the gatekeepers managed to get their boxes through, or otherwise smuggled them in.

The plaintiff's evidence was that a "box" was not used by the defendant during the plaintiff's acquaintance with the defendant previous to the partnership or at the meetings which the plaintiff had attended. The result of the evidence is that though the defendant himself may have contrived to bring in and use a "box," he being the active partner, yet the plaintiff did not anticipate that mode of carrying on the business.

The gist of all this dispute as to the use of a "box" or like contrivance is that it brings up the question which has often been mooted, What is a place for the purposes of betting within the meaning of the statute of 16 & 17 Vict.? It is obvious that, betting or not betting, a man must be in some place. But in the construction put upon the Act it is plain that the word "place" there is not used in its most general sense. The court has frequently been asked to decide this question. The Act is part of the legislation against gaming houses. The question here turns on section 3. A place must in some sense be fixed and ascertained to be within section 3, but the courts have wisely refrained from defining a meaning, the Legislature having given no definition beyond such as is afforded by the context of the enactment. The court has to apply the Act to the circumstances of each particular case. A place may unquestionably be an uncovered place: Eastwood v. Miller, a case under section 1. It may be a little bay or hoarding supported by stays on a quay side, as was decided in Liddell v. Lofthouse by Lindley and Kay, L.JJ., in the Divisional Court. It may be a temporary wooden structure erected on a strip of ground bounded by an iron railing with a line of desks fronting both ways: Shaw v. Morley. The court held the structure, although open to the air, to be both an office and place within section 3. Again, in the well-known umbrella case—Bows v. Fenwick—where the bookmaker fixed an umbrella in the ground, capable of sheltering seven or eight persons, and kept it up all the day, the day being only a showery one, the court had no difficulty in saying that the umbrella was a place within the Act.

To come back to the question here, Was it the intention of the parties that the betting business should be carried on at a place within the meaning of the Act, and did the plaintiff contemplate that it should be carried on by means contravening the rules as to Tattersall's enclosures? I am satisfied that the business of bookmaking as carried on by the "large men," as they were called in the defendant's evidence, in Tattersall's enclosures can be carried on without violating the Act. Did the plaintiff intend that the business should be carried on illegally? No doubt some cunning bookmakers carry on business in the way described by the defendant. I, however, am not satisfied on the evidence that the plaintiff intended the business to be so carried on. There is another alternative—namely, that the plaintiff might have become aware that the business was in fact being carried on illegally. But no case of that kind is made. The result, therefore, is that the plaintiff is entitled to an account, with costs up to and including judgment. Further costs reserved.

In re CAREW.
CAREW v. CAREW. (a.)

Will—Reversionary interest — Forfeiture clause—Gift over in case of legatee being under any legal disability on death of life tenant—Meaning of "legal disability."

Testator gave property to B. for life, with remainder to C., but in case of C.'s being at the time of B.'s death under any legal disability in consequence whereof he could be prevented from taking the same for his own personal and exclusive benefit, then over to others.

During B.'s life C. mortgaged his reversionary interest, and also executed a voluntary settlement of his equity of redemption in the premises. In B.'s lifetime also, an order was made on the further consideration of an action for the administration of the testator's estate, that C. (who was also one of the executors) should pay to the trustees of the testator's will a large sum of money representing assets of the testator received by C. as executor, and that C.'s reversionary interest was liable to make good the money so found due by him as executor.

Afterwards B., the life tenant, died, and on the day of B.'s death, but previous to the death, C. was, on his own application, adjudicated bankrupt; but the order of adjudication was afterwards annulled, on the ground that it ought never to have been made.

Held, that the words "legal disability" as used in the will indicated a disability imposed by act of law, rather than a disability arising simply from the voluntary act of C.; that upon the above facts C. was not at the time of B.'s death under any disability imposed by act of law, and consequently that the event upon which the gift over was to take effect had not occurred.

The testator, George Carew, by his will, after giving his wife a specific and a pecuniary legacy, made the following residuary bequest: "And as to all other my worldly estate and property of every description, I give the income arising therefrom to my said wife for her life, and subject thereto I give one equal moiety thereof to my son Henry George Carew; but if he should predecease either my said wife or me, or in case of his being at the time of the death of the survivor of my said wife and me under any legal disability in consequence whereof he could be hindered in or prevented from taking the same for his own personal and exclusive benefit, I give the same, subject as aforesaid, unto his widow or wife and children (other than his daughter Jessie Carew) living at the death of the survivor of my said wife and me, to be made over to them respectively on their respectively attaining twenty-one, the income arising from the shares of such children to be in the meantime applied for their benefit, and I appoint my said wife and son executors."

On the 11th of January, 1886, the testator died, leaving a widow, and she and the son Henry George Carew proved the will. On the 8th of August, 1892, the usual judgment for the administration of the testator's estate was given in this action.

By deeds dated the 24th of March and the 2nd of June, 1893, H. G. Carew mortgaged his interest under the will to Francis Dashwood to secure two sums of £600 and £300 respectively. By a deed dated the 15th of March, 1894, H. G. Carew and Emma, his wife, mortgaged their respective interests under the will to the Legal Reversionary Society to secure £100. By a deed dated the 7th of July, 1894 (which recited the claims made against H. G. Carew in the administration action), he assigned to a trustee all his interest under the will upon trust to raise a sum of £2,500 for the benefit of his wife and children, and subject thereto upon trust for himself.

On the 29th of July, 1894, the chief clerk's certificate was made, finding a sum of £5,188 16s. 10d. due from Henry George Carew. On the 30th of January, 1895, an order was made on further consideration whereby H. G. Carew was ordered to pay the said sum of £5,188 16s. 10d. to the plaintiffs as the present trustees of the testator's will, and it was declared, without prejudice to any claims of the wife and children of H. G. Carew to or in respect of the share or interest (if any) given to Henry George Carew by the will of the testator, that the interest (if any) coming to H. G. Carew under the testator's will was liable to make good to the testator's estate the said £5,188 16s. 10d.

On the 16th of March, 1895, Mrs. Carew, the widow of the testator, died. On the same day, and before the death of Mrs. Carew, a receiving order and an order of adjudication in bankruptcy were, upon his own application, made against H. G. Carew. On the 26th of March, 1895, an order was made staying proceedings in the bankruptcy until after the 4th of April following; and on the 4th of April a further order was made, whereby the receiving order and order of adjudication of the 16th of March, and all subsequent proceedings, were annulled on the ground that the said orders ought not to have been made.

Under these circumstances a summons was taken out by the surviving trustees of the testator's will, asking that it might be declared who, according to the true construction of the will and in the events which had happened, were entitled to the moiety of the testator's estate given to H. G. Carew, subject to the life interest thereby created in favour of the testator's widow.

STIRLING, J., having stated the facts as above set out, continued:—It was suggested in the first place that the gift in favour of the wife and children of H. G. Carew was one which took effect by defeating an absolute interest in the first instance given to him, and was consequently bad for repugnance. I am unable to take this view of the gifts, which appear to me to be alternative, that is to say, I read the will as if it had been expressed thus: "In case the said H. G. Carew shall survive both my said wife and myself, and shall not at the time of the death of the survivor of my said wife and myself be under any legal disability; but if he should predecease either my said wife or me, or in case of his being at the time of the death of the survivor of my said wife and me under any legal disability . . . then I give, &c. . . ."

The question then arises, which of the two alternatives has occurred; and the answer depends on the true meaning of the words "being . . . under any legal disability in consequence whereof he could be hindered in or prevented from taking the same for his personal and exclusive benefit." "Of disabilities," says Lord Coke (Inst. 2,206), speaking of disability on the part of a feoffee to perform a condition annexed to the feoffment, "some be by act of the party, some by act in law." The distinction has been repeatedly recognized. Thus, in cases somewhat similar to the present, it has been held that a limitation for life determinable on alienation by the tenant for life is not determined by alienation by act of the law: see Lear v. Leggett, 1 Russ. & M. 690; Pym v. Lockyer, 12 Sim. 394; and Rochford v. Hackman, 9 Ha. 484; and I apprehend that a limitation for life which on its true construction was made determinable by act of the law would not be determined by a voluntary alienation. What I have to decide, therefore, appears to be whether the language of the testator, fairly construed, extends to both classes of disability, or is to be confined to disability arising by act of law.

The event on which the limitation in favour of Mrs. H. G. Carew and her children arises is that of Mr. Carew "being at a particular time" under a legal disability involving certain consequences. Now, a man is more appropriately said to be under a disability when that disability is imposed in invitum than when it arises from a voluntary act by which he has disabled himself.

Again, the words are under a legal disability. Some force ought to be given to the word "legal," and it seems to me to indicate a disability imposed by law rather than one simply arising out of a voluntary act. A person who has assigned away a particular property is, no doubt, thenceforth prevented from taking the same for his personal and exclusive benefit; but I do not think that he would, according to the ordinary use of language, be described as under a legal disability in consequence whereof he is so prevented, though he might well be described as having so disabled himself. In my judgment, therefore, the disability contemplated by the testator was not one arising simply from the voluntary act of H. G. Carew, but one imposed by act of law.

I have, then, to consider whether H. G. Carew was at the death of the testator's widow under such a disability. At that time he was bankrupt, and bankruptcy certainly appears to me to be a disability imposed by law. The adjudication, however, was obtained on H. G. Carew's own application when his mother was in extremis; it was annulled within three weeks afterwards, and that on the ground that it never ought to have been made. I am unable to treat this as a valid and effectual bankruptcy. The order of the 4th of April, 1895, expressly states the ground assigned by the court itself for the annulment.

In conclusion, however, apart from this, I should be of opinion that the facts show it to be a mere contrivance on the part of the bankrupt probably resorted to in order to procure a benefit for his wife and children. I think, therefore, that at the death of his mother H. G. Carew was not under any real disability arising out of bankruptcy.

It is further said that the large sum of £5,188 16s. 10d. has been found due from the defendant H. G. Carew, and has by the order on further consideration been charged on the interest of H. G. Carew under his father's will. If an ordinary creditor of H. G. Carew had recovered judgment against him, and then obtained an order for payment out of his beneficial interest under his father's will, I should have thought that there was much force in the contention that H. G. Carew had come under a legal disability in consequence of which he would be hindered in or prevented from taking such interest for his own personal and exclusive benefit. In the present case the defendant H. G. Carew was an executor of the will, and he has received assets of the testator to the amount mentioned, for which he is unable to account. Under these circumstances the court treats him as having taken the sum which came to his hands in respect of his beneficial interest, and the true meaning and effect of the order on further consideration is simply to preclude him from receiving any further part of the trust property for his own benefit until the other cestui que trust has received as much as himself. This view of the position appears to me to be laid down by Lord Romilly, M.R., in Irby v. Irby (No. 3), 6 W. R. 853, 25 Beav. 632, see pp. 637 and 638, and by Sir George Jessel, M.R., in Jacubs v. Rylance, L. R. 17 Eq. 341, 22 W. R. Dig. 251. The disability which has thus arisen on the part of H. G. Carew is therefore, in my opinion, one which has arisen from his own voluntary act, and is not one imposed by the act of law.

In my judgment, therefore, the event on which the limitation arises in favour of Mrs. H. G. Carew and her children has not occurred. But unless all parties are agreed as to the priorities of the persons claiming under H. G. Carew I cannot now decide who are entitled to so much of the fund as may be coming to him.

In re WASSELL.
WASSELL v. LEGGATT. (a.)

Married woman — Separate use — Trustee — Husband taking possession before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, of property settled to separate use of married woman — Notice of trust — Constructive notice — Statute of Limitations — Acquiescence — Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59).

A husband taking possession before the Married Woman's Property Act, 1882, of property coming to his wife under circumstances that should put him on his inquiry as to whether it is settled to her separate use, becomes a trustee of such property for her; and if the husband has retained such property for his own use, neither he nor his executors can rely on section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, as a defence.

Trial of action.

This was an action in which the plaintiff, Susannah Wassell, widow of Mr. Charles F. Wassell (who died on the 12th of December, 1894), claimed as against the defendants, the executors and trustees of the said C. F. Wassell, a declaration that the said C. F. Wassell was a trustee for her of the sum of £291, and payment of that sum with interest thereon at 4 per cent. from the 1st of October, 1894. The facts of the case were as follow.

The plaintiff was married to the testator on the 9th of January, 1854, and lived with him up to a month or so of his death. The plaintiff and her husband had several disputes over money matters, and there was evidence that he had taken possession of several sums of money bequeathed to his wife not to her separate use, and to which, therefore, under the existing law he was entitled. On the 29th of November, 1875, Sarah Willats, an aunt of the plaintiff, died, and left her under a will a sum of £300 for her separate use, according to a promise previously made to her. One of the executors of this will, to whom probate was granted, wrote to the plaintiff asking her to call on him at his office for the money, which she did, and without informing her husband. This executor placed in her hands coins and notes for the value of £291 (being the legacy of £300 minus the duty), and told her that it was hers. On reaching her home after this interview, the plaintiff placed the money and notes in a wardrobe in her bedroom. Her husband then came in from his adjoining dressing-room and demanded the money from her, saying, according to her statement in the witness-box, "You have been for that money, and I'll take it; it is mine." She took the money from the wardrobe and refused to give it him, saying that it was hers; whereupon he violently seized her and took it from her by force. No one was present at the time; but the plaintiff subsequently told one of her daughters of the facts, and wrote to the executor to ask if the money was really hers. He replied that it was. She several times asked her husband for the money, but he always refused to give it her. The last time that she asked him was six months before his death, when he again refused it her. The plaintiff abstained from taking any action in her husband's life, partly on the ground that she was persuaded by some of her friends that he would repay her the money by his will. By his will, dated the 17th of November, 1894, the husband bequeathed to the plaintiff an annuity of £350, and furniture to the value of £200.

The defendants in their statement of defence generally denied the liability of the husband's estate to make good the sum claimed. They further submitted that if the testator received the sum it was as a voluntary gift from the plaintiff; and, further, that the claim was barred by lapse of time by the Statute of Limitations and the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8.

The plaintiff's cross-examination showed that on some points her memory was defective; but his lordship held that she had established the main facts of her case, and her evidence was to some extent corroborated by other witnesses. It was also elicited in cross-examination that the husband maintained the plaintiff liberally out of his own money.

Oswald, Q.C., and Stallard, for the plaintiff.—When money is given to a married woman for her separate use, it is given in trust for her. If her husband or any other person takes it into his possession, he constitutes himself a trustee of it for her, and is practically in the same position as if he had been a trustee for her under the will. [ROMER, J.—Primâ facie it ought to be shown that he did take it as a trustee.] A person who meddles with trust property become a trustee of it: Rich v. Cockell, Rich v. Hull, 9 Ves. 369; Green v. Carlill, 4 Ch. D. 882, 25 W. R. Dig. 124; In re Flamank, Wood v. Cock, 37 W. R. 502, 40 Ch. D. 461.

Robson, Q.C., and Sims Williams, for the defendants.—It cannot be shown that the husband was a trustee of the wife, nor can it be shown that he knew that the legacy was given to her for her separate use. The husband must be a trustee or not, he cannot be partly a trustee and partly not. Further, the Statute of Limitations can now be pleaded in favour of a trustee: Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8. [ROMER, J.—I do not see how you can get out of this claim, under the Trustee Act, 1888. The only question is whether you were a trustee.] Suppose a stranger took the money, he might be a trustee if he knew that the money was given to the wife to her separate use; but to make a man a trustee he must have some sort of notice, that he may know what his duty is, and so may perform the trust. A man cannot be made a trustee against his will. If he is not told his duty, he cannot perform it. [ROMER, J.—In this case was not the husband put on his inquiry?] The wrong done, at the outside, was a mere civil wrong, and the remedy, which was one at common law, is now barred by time. It cannot, however, be said that the husband in any sense converted the money to his own use. The money was handed to him by the wife, and spent for the mutual benefit of both of them, an arrangement in which the plaintiff acquiesced, Thorne v. Heard, ante, p. 155, [1895] A. C. 495.

Oswald, Q.C., in reply.—The separate use was a creation of equity, and has always been protected by courts of equity, which, if there was no other trustee, before the Married Woman's Property Act made the husband a trustee for the wife. It is clear from the evidence that the husband was, at least, a constructive trustee for the wife. He knew that she had taken the legacy under a will, and that is sufficient to fix him with constructive notice of the contents of the will. The plaintiff distinctly told him that the money was hers, and, considering that he knew that she said this, it is not open for his executors now to assert he did not know that it belonged to her for her separate use. If such a thing were permitted, the separate use could easily be got rid of. The rights of the plaintiff are in no way touched by the provisions of section 8 of the Trustee Act, nor by the Statute of Limitations, nor by lapse of time, nor by acquiescence. He referred to Hartford v. Power, 16 W. R. 822, Ir. Rep. 2 Eq. 204; In re Flamank, Wood v. Cock. At the time the money was taken the plaintiff had no right to an action at law. Her right was solely to a suit in equity against her husband as a trustee.

ROMER, J.—Although the plaintiff's memory was not on all points reliable, she has established the material facts of her case, and her evidence was in some respects corroborated. In my opinion, the husband knew when he took the £291 that it belonged to the wife for her separate use. At any rate, he knew that there was a will, that there was a legacy, and that his wife had obtained payment on her separate receipt and claimed that the money was her own. If he did not know that it was her separate estate, he was put upon inquiry if he wished to rely on his marital right, as to the circumstances under which she took it. He must therefore be taken to have acquired the money with notice that it belonged to her for her separate use. The occurrence happened before the Married Woman's Property Act, 1882, and he became a trustee of the money for her. She was entitled to recover it; but how could she do so? She had no right to it at common law, but in equity he was a trustee for her, and I do not know how it would be possible to put her rights otherwise. The Statute of Limitations never ran against the wife, the husband never ceased to be a trustee for her; and his executors cannot now avail themselves of the Trustee Act of 1888, because the husband retained the money and never accounted for it or gave up possession of it. The Statute of Limitations cannot, therefore, be relied on as a defence.

But then it was said that there had been such an acquiescence by the plaintiff as deprived her of her right to sue. As a matter of fact, however, she never gave up her claims to the money. There were quarrels between the husband and wife on that subject down to a short time before the husband's death. He appears to have thought that he was entitled to the money; but he was not the less a trustee because he had strong notions as to a husband's rights, and the plaintiff never lost her right to hold him or his estate liable to replace the money. It is not necessary for me to go into the question of the graciousness of such a claim. As the executors admit assets, all I have to do is to declare the plaintiff entitled to be repaid the £291, with interest at 4 per cent. from the date of her husband's death, and to be paid the taxed costs of the action.

BIRCHALL AND OTHERS v. BULLOUGH. (a.)

Stamp—Practice — Evidence — Unstamped promissory note—Document used for purpose of refreshing memory —Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 38 (1).

In an action for money lent an unstamped promissory note may be put in the hands of the defendant for the purpose of challenging his memory as to whether he had signed the note and had received the money, although such note could not be used as evidence, and notwithstanding that by section 38 of the Stamp Act, 1891, it is provided that a promissory note not duly stamped shall not be "available for any purpose whatever."

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of the Lancashire County Court Judge, sitting at Bolton.

The action was originally brought in the High Court, and was remitted to the county court.

The plaintiffs in the action were the executors of one Peter Brindle, deceased, and they sought to recover from the defendant a sum of money which they alleged the deceased had lent to the defendant. The plaintiffs administered interrogatories to the defendant, one of which was in relation to a promissory note for the sum of £30 15s., signed by the defendant. This note was insufficiently stamped, having only a penny stamp on it. The defendant objected to answer this interrogatory, on the ground that the promissory note being insufficiently stamped was not admissible in evidence. At the trial of the action a daughter of the deceased stated in her evidence that there had been money transactions between her father and the defendant, and the defendant was thereupon cross-examined as to his interrogatories, and the promissory note was put into his hands and he was asked to look at it. This document was in writing on paper, and only stamped as aforesaid. It ran as follows:—

"Westhoughton, June 3, 1889.

"I, Peter Bullough, of Church-street, Westhoughton, joiner and builder, promise to pay to Peter Brindle, of 505, Chorley-road, Westhoughton, the sum of £30 15s. in one month from this date, for money lent on this date, June 3rd, 1889.

"(Signed) PETER BULLOUGH.

"(Witness) J. BULLOUGH."

Objection was taken by the defendant's counsel that the promissory note could not be looked at by the defendant in order to ascertain whether he signed it, nor be used in any way. The judge overruled the objection, and allowed the defendant to look at it. The defendant then said: "It is my signature to the document of the 3rd of June, 1889. I have no recollection of paying the £30 15s. back. I have no recollection of borrowing that sum, but will not swear anything about it. Refreshing my memory on reading the document of the 3rd of June, 1889, I do not believe I should have signed that document if I had not received the money. I cannot give a case of signing a document for money which I had not received."

The judge found that the defendant had received the £30 15s., and entered judgment for the plaintiffs for that amount.

The defendant appealed, on the ground that the judge was wrong in allowing the insufficiently stamped document to be used on behalf of the plaintiffs, and that there was no evidence to support the finding.

Section 38 of the Stamp Act, 1891, provides that any person who takes or receives a promissory note, not being duly stamped, "either in payment or as security or by purchase or otherwise, shall not be entitled to recover thereon or to make the same available for any purpose whatever."

R. V. Bankes, for the defendant.—A promissory note not duly stamped cannot, under section 38, be used in any way whatever: Ashling v. Boon, 39 W. R. 298, [1891] 1 Ch. 568; Jacker v. International Cable Co., 5 Times L. R. 13.

H. W. Loehnis, for the respondents, was not called upon.

WRIGHT, J.—We are both of opinion that in substance and in effect the judge's note means to say that the promissory note was put into the defendant's hands in order to challenge his recollection, and that no use was made of the note by the learned judge himself as evidence. The judge then had before him the admissions made by the defendant himself after looking at the note, and I am of opinion that there was sufficient evidence in such admissions to support the plaintiffs' claim.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the promissory note was only handed to the defendant to look at. It could not, of course, be used in any way in evidence. But the defendant, having looked at it, said: "I do not believe I should have signed that document if I had not received the money."

Appeal dismissed.

HUNTINGTON v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue — Stamp — Equitable mortgage—Foreclosure—Conveyance by order of court—"Conveyance on sale"—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), ss. 54, 57.

A conveyance executed by order of the court by a mortgagor, the equitable mortgagee having obtained a foreclosure decree, is a "conveyance on sale" within the meaning of section 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and as such is chargeable with an ad valorem duty, vide "Conveyance or Transfer on Sale" in the schedule to the Act; and by section 57 the debt is the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable.

This was an appeal on a case stated from the decision of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who held that a deed of conveyance by a mortgagor, executed by him in pursuance of an order of the court, the equitable mortgagee having obtained a foreclosure decree, was a "conveyance on sale" within the meaning of section 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

The facts as set out in the stated case were as follows.

On the 4th of April, 1895, an instrument was presented on behalf of Mr. Joseph Huntington to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the provisions of the 12th section of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), for the opinion of the commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The instrument was dated the 26th of March, 1895, and was made between Alexander Fletcher Knox and William Ernest Taylor of the first part, James Thompson of the second part, and the said Joseph Huntington of the third part; and was a conveyance to the said Joseph Huntington of certain property in Liverpool, of which he was a mortgagee, freed and discharged from all right or equity of redemption. The instrument contained recitals with respect to dealings with the said property, to the effect that the property had by an instrument dated the 30th of September, 1899, been mortgaged by the said James Thompson to the said Alexander Fletcher Knox and William Ernest Taylor to secure the sum of £1,000 with interest thereon at the rate of £4 10s. per cent., that the said sum and all interest thereon had long since been paid off, and the title deeds relating to the property had been returned; but that no reconveyance of the property had been executed, and that on the 26th of June, 1893, the said title deeds were deposited by the said James Thompson with the said Joseph Huntington by way of equitable mortgage to secure the sum of £1,680, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 per cent. The instrument contained also recitals (a) of a judgment of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, dated the 14th of June, 1894, whereby it was declared that the said Joseph Huntington was a mortgagee of the said property, and it was ordered that an account should be taken of the amount due to him for principal and interest and costs; and it was declared that if default were made by the said James Thompson in payment of all sums certified to be due to the said Joseph Huntington within six calendar months after the date of the district registrar's certificate, the said Joseph Huntington would be entitled to the property free from all equity of redemption, and to have an absolute conveyance thereof accordingly; (b) that by a certificate dated the 29th of June, 1894, the district registrar certified that there was due to the said Joseph Huntington for principal, interest, and costs the sum of £1,784 13s. 11d., which sum would be increased on the 29th of December then next to £1,825 9s. 5d.; (c) that default had been made in payment of the said sum of £1,825 9s. 5d., and that by an order of the said division dated the 16th of February, 1895, it was ordered that James Thompson should stand absolutely debarred and foreclosed from all equity of redemption in the property, and should execute an absolute conveyance of all his estate and interest therein to the said J. Huntington; and (d) that it had been agreed that the said Alexander Fletcher Knox and William Ernest Taylor should concur in the conveyance.

Neither of the two orders of court above mentioned had been stamped with any ad valorem or other stamp duty payable under the Stamp Act, 1891. The commissioners were of opinion that, inasmuch as the property referred to in the instrument, and by the said orders directed to be conveyed, was so ordered to be conveyed by reason of the non-payment of the said debt of £1,825 9s. 5d. by the said James Thompson to the said Joseph Huntington (which debt was, in conformity with the order of the 14th day of June, 1894, to be considered as a charge upon the said property), the property was conveyed to the said Joseph Huntington in consideration of the debt of £1,825 9s. 5d. due by the said James Thompson to the said Joseph Huntington within the meaning of section 57 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and that by reason of such section the instrument was a conveyance on sale within the meaning of section 54 of the said Act chargeable with ad valorem duty under the head "Conveyance or Transfer on Sale" in the first schedule to the said Act; and that, inasmuch as the property was at the date of the said order subject to and charged with the payment of the said sum of £1,825 9s. 5d., that sum must by virtue of the said section 57 be deemed to be the consideration in respect whereof the ad valorem duty was chargeable. The commissioners accordingly assessed upon the instrument the duty of £9 5s., being the ad valorem duty of 5s. for every £50 of the said sum of £1,825 9s. 5d., and the instrument was stamped in conformity with the assessment.

The questions for the opinion of the court were (1) whether the instrument was chargeable with the duty of £9 5s., in accordance with the assessment of the commissioners; (2) if not, with what duty the instrument was chargeable.

J. E. Bankes, for the appellant.—There was not a sale here at all, and therefore there was not a sale on conveyance within section 54; and even if there was a sale, it was not made in consideration of the original debt. But there was no sale, for there was neither a vendor nor purchaser, nor was any price mentioned. There was no instrument here whereby any property on the sale thereof was transferred to or vested in a purchaser: Denn v. Diamond, 4 B. & C. 243; Anderson v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 6 Court Sess. Cas., 4th series, 56. If any sale did take place, it did so by the order of the court itself, and not by virtue of the conveyance, which followed the order of the court and was a separate transaction, therefore this could not be a "conveyance on sale." Section 57 is relied upon by the commissioners as supporting the contention that the sum of £1,825 due to Huntington was the consideration for the transaction; but that cannot be so, for the instrument was not made in consideration of the money advanced on the equitable mortgage. Therefore there had been no sale; and if there had been, it was not a sale on conveyance, nor was there any consideration for it.

Counsel also referred to the following cases: Marshall v. Shrewsbury, 23 W. R. 803, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 250; Lockhart v. Hardy, 9 Beav. 349; Foster v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 42 W. R. 259, [1894] 1 Q. B. 516.

Sir R. Webster, A.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the respondents.—There was a conveyance here of property in such a manner and under such circumstances as to amount to a sale, and the consideration for such conveyance must be taken to be the old debt of £1,825 due from Thompson to Huntington, and therefore, there being a transfer of property for a valuable consideration, there was a "conveyance on sale" within the meaning of section 54: Heath v. Pugh, 29 W. R. 904, 6 Q. B. D. 345, see judgment of Lord Selborne at p. 357.

Counsel also referred to Foster v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Great Western Railway Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 42 W. R. 211, [1894] 1 Q. B. 507; Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank, 8 Court of Sess. Cas., 4th series, 389.

WRIGHT, J.—This is a case which seems to us to be one of some difficulty; but on the whole I think that the Crown ought to succeed.

The question depends upon sections 54 and 57 of the Stamp Act of 1891, and the question is whether this document amounts to a conveyance on sale within the meaning of section 54, and what the amount is on which the duty ought to be paid, as to which we do not think that the Crown is altogether entitled to succeed.

On the first question the section says: "The expression 'conveyance on sale' includes every instrument . . . whereby any estate or interest in any property upon the sale thereof is transferred to or vested in a purchaser." This document is clearly an instrument whereby "property" or an "estate or interest in" property is transferred to the purchaser, unless anything turns on the word "purchaser." I do not think that it does; and the only question is whether the transfer was a transfer "upon the sale thereof."

Now, it seems to me that the transaction here, taken as a whole, does amount to a sale within the meaning of the section. The root of the whole matter is in a contract of equitable mortgage that is worked out by the court, and therefore I think there is a succession here resulting from the contract and made for monetary consideration; and when that is the case there is a sale, and it is not the less a sale because the contract as applied to the events which have occurred is worked out by or under the order of the court.

Then was this an instrument "upon the sale"? It was argued that the sale, if any, took place by order of the court, and was a separate transaction. I do not think that is so. The words "upon the sale" do not appear to me to be limited to any particular part of the transaction of sale. Conveyance is a necessary part of the action of the court in giving effect to a mortgage, and I think that a conveyance executed under the order of the court may properly be held to be "upon the sale," and the two together turn what was in equity, and also in the present case in law, a mere security into an absolute title; and if there was consideration for that, then section 54 applies. What was the consideration? There are two answers to that; one is that if you look at the transaction as a whole following from the original contract, then the money which was advanced on the equitable mortgage may be regarded as the consideration for which the ultimate sale, following from that contract, was effected. But if not, I think section 57 applies to the consideration. That section says: "When any property is conveyed to any person in consideration, wholly or in part, of any debt due to him," the debt "is to be deemed the whole or part, as the case may be, of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable." I think that section makes the debt a consideration in a sufficient sense to enable us to regard the transaction, as a whole, as a sale.

Then comes the question whether the right amount of duty has been claimed. I do not think that the whole amount of the debt can be right measure of what the duty ought to be charged upon. What the amount ought to be may be a very difficult matter to settle, but I should think that it ought not to exceed the value of the property.

KENNEDY, J.—I have come to the same conclusion, though, I confess, with considerable hesitation.

The question here is whether the document should be stamped as a conveyance on sale. There are various heads given with regard to conveyances in the Stamp Act of 1891: a conveyance on sale, a conveyance in the case of mortgage, and conveyance on other occasions. Now, the position of things is this. There had been an equitable mortgage by deposit of deeds given by Thompson to Huntington. Then, in 1894, proceedings were taken in the Chancery Division by the equitable mortgagee, and he obtained a foreclosure declaration or order to Thompson to stand absolutely debarred and foreclosed from all equitable redemption of the property, and to execute an absolute conveyance of all his estate and interest in the mortgage. Where there is a legal mortgage, all that is needed is a foreclosure order to make the title of the mortgagee perfect; where there is only an equitable mortgage, there has not only to be a foreclosure order, but an order for the execution of the conveyance. To make that title perfect there is required, in the case of an equitable mortgage, there being no mortgage deed, that there should be not merely an order of the court declaring the right of the mortgagee, but an order of the court directing a conveyance to give that right its perfection. The question, therefore, is, there being a conveyance executed by order of the court giving a real value to Huntington, whether that is a conveyance on sale. He gets that which is described by Lord Selborne in Heath v. Pugh, quoting the language of Lord Hardwicke, Sir William Grant, and Sir Lancelot Shadwell in earlier cases (at p. 360), as being, in effect, a vesting of "the ownership of and the beneficial title to the land for the first time in the person who previously was a mere incumbrancer." A conveyance is needed for the purpose of giving to Huntington what is so described in that case. It is a conveyance by order of the court. Is it less a conveyance on sale within the meaning of the statute? It seems to me that it is a conveyance of a valuable interest to Huntington. Then, is there a consideration for that? By reason of that conveyance the person conveying gets the satisfaction, at any rate, of an equivalent portion of the old debt, which, under section 57, may be a consideration in such a case as this; it is referred to as one of the forms of consideration "where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration wholly or in part of any debt due to him." The effect of this conveyance under the foreclosure order is that if there is any further right as regards the debt secured by the deposit of deeds, it is a right confined to the excess, or the claim, if any, of Huntington for the amount of his loan beyond the value of the mortgaged property. The case of Lockhart v. Hardy, 9 Beav. 349, 15 L. J. Ch. 347, seems to me to treat the matter as settled by the then Master of the Rolls; that is to say, that Huntington, having got this conveyance, could not make a further claim upon the estate against the person who had conveyed it to him except for the balance. It seems to me pro tanto that there has been a satisfaction practically of an equivalent portion of the debt which is gained by the person who conveys. If that is so, then there was a debt which, at any rate in part, may be said to be the consideration for this conveyance; and if that is so, there is a transfer of title by it—a transfer for consideration which, looking at the other provisions of the Stamp Act, ought to bring it within section 57.

Therefore I think that judgment should be for the Crown.

STERN v. REG. (a.)

Inland revenue—Probate duty—Certificate of shares held in foreign companies—Realizable asset of estate—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12), s. 27—Probate Court Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, s. 92.

An English testator was possessed of share certificates of a foreign company, being documents necessary to establish the legal title to the shares; the holder of the certificates having an equitable title which would enable him to obtain registration of the shares in his own name in the foreign company. Delivery of the certificates was sufficient to transfer this equitable title, and the certificates were marketable on the London Stock Exchange.

Held, that probate duty was payable in respect of the certificates.

Special case.

The suppliants, the executors under the will of the late Baron Herman de Stern, duly proved the same and paid probate duty on the personal estate.

After probate, but during the administration of the estate, they were advised that probate was not properly payable on certain stocks and shares in foreign companies which belonged to the baron at the time of his death.

The suppliants, in the form of a petition of right, claimed a return of £8,187, paid as probate duty in respect of these shares.

The special case set out that Baron de Stern died in England on the 20th of October, 1889, leaving a will dated the 17th of August, 1881, and three codicils.

At the time of his death Baron de Stern was an English subject, and was domiciled and resident in England.

In due course probate was granted to the executors on the personal estate of the testator situated in the United Kingdom, which was sworn by the executors at the net value of £3,541,366 19s. 11d., and paid duty to the amount of £106,242.

Subsequently the suppliants alleged that there had been erroneously included in the affidavit required by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, from persons applying for probate, a portion of the personal estate of the deceased which should not have been included therein, and which was not liable to probate duty. They thereupon lodged a corrected affidavit as to the true value of the estate on which duty was payable, in which they stated that certain American railway shares specified in the schedule thereto were at the date of the original affidavit thought to be property in England; but it had since been discovered that they were not so, because they were transferable only in the books of the several companies in New York, and were therefore not liable to probate duty.

The commissioners declining to return the duty alleged to have been overpaid, the suppliants lodged a petition of right claiming the return of the sum of £8,187, the amount of the alleged overpayment.

On issue joined, the Attorney-General pleaded a demurrer, which was subsequently waived, and the application came before the court in the form of a special case.

The portion of the estate alleged to have been included in error consisted of shares in various railway companies constituted under the law of, and domiciled in, the United States. The certificates, however, in respect of the shares certified that the person named was entitled to the number of shares specified in the capital stock of the company, and certified as to the manner in which the shares were transferable. Upon every certificate there was indorsed a form of transfer and power of attorney in blank.

It was agreed that the American law stated in evidence in The Colonial Bank v. Cady and Williams, 39 W. R. 17, 15 App. Cas. 267, should be applied to this case. A statement giving the effect of that evidence, taken from the judgments of Lord Watson and Lord Herschell (who said there was no difference between the English and American law on this point), formed part of the case, and was to the effect that where the indorsed transfer had been duly executed by the registered owner of the shares, the name of the transferee being left blank, delivery of the certificate in that condition by him or by his authority with intent to transfer transmitted his title to the shares both legal and equitable; the person to whom it was delivered could effectually transfer his interest by handing the certificate to another, and the document might thus pass from hand to hand until it came into the possession of the holder who thought fit to insert his own name as transferee and obtain a new certificate in his own name from the company. Delivery did not invest him with the ownership of the shares in the sense that no further act was required in order to perfect his right; but the holder had an equitable title which enabled him to have the shares vested in himself by registration in the books of the company. The company, upon the request of the holder for the time being of the certificate and on its production, was bound to register the name of such holder or of his nominee, and to issue a new certificate in such name in exchange for the old certificate. As between the parties to the transaction the transfer was entirely completed by the delivery of the certificates.

The securities in question were negotiable in this country, and were commonly dealt with on the London Stock Exchange.

At the date of the death of Baron de Stern the certificates for these shares were in England, either in his possession or that of his agent or trustee, and the whole beneficial interest in and title to these securities belonged to him and passed under his will. None of them, however, were registered in his name in the books of the companies, but stood in the names of certain persons all of whom were not resident in England.

The suppliants had dealt with the shares by sales effected in England, with the exception of two sets of railway shares the sales of which were effected in New York.

Arthur Cohen, Q.C., Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., and A. T. Lawrence, for the suppliants.—The question here is whether or not these shares form part of the English estate of the testator, and as such would properly be administered by his executors in this country. These certificates are not negotiable instruments, for the transferee's title is not completed until the transfer has been registered in America in the books of the several companies. Probate duty is only chargeable on shares in foreign companies (a) where the certificate is itself a negotiable instrument, and (b) of such a character that the property passes by mere delivery. Shares held in a foreign company by a testator dying in England are not property situated in this country for the purposes of probate duty, although administered by the executors in this country: Attorney-General v. Dimond, 1 Cr. & Jer. 356, and Attorney-General v. Hope, 1 Cr. M. & R. 530. Simple contract debts due from persons are not in the eye of the law property situated here. The case of Attorney-General v. Bouwens, 4 M. & W. 171, does not apply to the present case, because the bonds in that case were completely negotiable. The following cases were also referred to: Commissioners of Stamps v. Hope, [1891] A. C. 476, 40 W. R. Dig. 162; Yeoman v. Bradshaw, 3 Salk. 70; In the Goods of Ewing, 29 W. R. 474, 6 P. D. 19; Laidlay v. Lord Advocate, 15 App. Cas. 468, 39 W. R. Dig. 196; In re Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East Fernandes Executors' case, 18 W. R. 202, 411, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 314. On these authorities the suppliants are entitled to the relief sought.

Sir R. Webster, A.G. (with him Sir R. B. Finlay,

S.G., Vaughan Hawkins, and Danckwerts), for the Crown.—I submit that the case is governed by the reasoning in Attorney-General v. Bouwens. That was decided in 1838, and has been frequently recognized as good law to the present time. The certificates of these shares can be dealt with on the London Stock Exchange. They are therefore a realizable asset, and must be included in the value of the estate in the same way as any other chattel. [He was stopped.]

Cohen, Q.C., replied.

WRIGHT, J., after stating the facts as set out in the special case, said:—I think that the true inference to be drawn from these facts is that the duty which the suppliants contend was paid in error was properly claimed and paid in respect of all the certificates of the American railway shares that were in this country in the possession of the baron at the time of his death. These certificates were documents the existence of which vouched and were necessary for vouching the title of the holder to the shares they represented. Indeed, without them no one could establish his right to the shares at all. It is found in the case as a fact that the delivery of the certificates was sufficient to pass all the interest of the holder to his transferee. It follows, therefore, that the certificates have of themselves an operative power up to a certain point, and, although the mere delivery did not invest the transferee with the ownership of the shares in the sense that no further act was required to perfect his title in law, still the delivery gave the transferee an equitable title which enabled him to have the shares vested in him at any time by registration in the books of the company. It was found in the case also that these shares were marketable on the London Stock Exchange. That seems to me conclusive evidence that these certificates are documents of value in the hands of the executors, and as such formed a realizable asset of the estate, liable to the payment of duty in the same way as any other asset. For these reasons I am of opinion that the petition of the suppliants fails.

Administration—Residuary legacy for benefit of convent—Death of legatee and executor—Grant to head of convent—Charity—No scheme required.

Where a residuary legacy was given by a will to C. H. "to be disposed of as she shall think fit at her discretion for the benefit of" a certain convent, and the only executor of the will and C. H. both died during the testatrix's lifetime, the court granted letters of administration with the will annexed to the Reverend Mother the head of the convent, on being satisfied of the permanence of the institution and the fitness of the Reverend Mother, having regard to her powers, to receive and apply the legacy in question, the court being satisfied that it was not necessary to require a scheme to be propounded on the authority of Walsh v. Gladstone, 1 Ph. 290.

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion for a grant of letters of administration with the will annexed of the personal estate of Hannah McAuliffe to Maria Blount, the Rev. Mother and Head of St. Edward's Convent, Blandford-square, as residuary legatee.

Younger, in support of the motion.—The bequest is good, the only question is in what capacity the applicant shall take. If under the 73rd section of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, that would necessitate applying to the Chancery Division for a scheme. The amount of the property is small, about £450; and there is no necessity for a scheme: Present v. Goodwin, 1 Sw. & Tr. 544, 8 W. R. Prob. Dig. 4; Cole v. Wade, 16 Ves. 27, at p. 47; Burrough v. Philcox, 5 Myl. & Cr. 72. In Chancery, if the court can find someone to give a receipt, it will pay over the money; otherwise it is paid into court to a separate fund. In Walsh v. Gladstone, 1 Ph. 290, no scheme was required.

July 17.—JEUNE, P.—The question in this case relates to the form of the grant of administration which it is proper to make.

By her will, dated the 17th of December, 1885, the deceased Hannah McAuliffe appointed the Rev. Philip Cavanagh executor, and, after giving a legacy of £11 5s. to Catherine Headon, bequeathed the residue of her property to the said Catherine Headon, "to be disposed of as she shall think fit at her discretion, for the benefit of the Convent of St. Edward, Blandford-square." The Rev. Philip Cavanagh and Catherine Headon died in the lifetime of the testatrix.

A grant of administration is asked for in favour of Maria Blount, who holds the office of Reverend Mother of the Convent of St. Edward.

The convent in question is a community of Roman Catholic sisters. There is no instrument prescribing the objects of the society, and no formal allocation of funds to specific purposes. But, in fact, the society devotes itself to four charitable works—the teaching of the children of the poor, the visiting of the poor in their homes, the visiting of the sick and infirm at hospitals and workhouses, and the sheltering and training of young women for domestic service. The property of the community is vested in a council consisting of the Reverend Mother and three sisters, and is subject to their absolute discretion in the disposal thereof for the purposes of the community. The bank account stands in the name of the Reverend Mother and two of the said three sisters. The other members of the council concur in the application for a grant of administration to Maria Blount.

There can, I think, be no doubt that this would be a proper case for a grant under section 73 of the Probate Act, 1857. But what is asked is a grant to Maria Blount as residuary legatee, the object being that she shall not take the grant in a capacity which would imply the necessity of an application to the Chancery Division. I had considerable doubt whether this could be done. As confidence was obviously placed by the testatrix in the personal discretion of Catherine Headon, no doubt a trustee cannot be appointed in her place; and, as several objects of the convent are not so well defined as to admit equal distribution amongst them, it would seem to be doubtful whether a scheme is not necessary. But I have been referred to a case of Walsh v. Gladstone, where the circumstances closely resemble those in the present instance, which appears to me to show that no scheme is required. There a legacy was given to a certain person to be applied to the use of a Roman Catholic college; and, the legatee having died in the lifetime of the testator, it was argued on behalf of the Attorney-General that a scheme was necessary. But the Lord Chancellor, affirming the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, held that, though the legatee might have had a discretion if he had been living as to the application of the fund, yet it would have been a fair exercise of that discretion to have paid it over to the president of the college, and that if the court was of opinion that the funds would be safe in his hands it would be justified in doing the same.

I am satisfied in this case as to the permanence of the institution, and the fitness of the Reverend Mother, having regard to her powers, to receive and apply the legacy in question. I think, therefore, that a grant may be made to her as residuary legatee.

Practice—Trial—Motion for new trial—Enlargement of time—Imposition of terms—Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44), s. 1—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 64, r. 7.

A motion for a new trial or to set aside the verdict of a jury is, since the passing of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890, to be made to the Court of Appeal, and not to a Divisional Court. Consequently, on the hearing of any such motion the Court of Appeal has power, by virtue of ord. 64, r. 7, to enlarge the time within which to move for a new trial, and to impose such terms as the justice of the case may require.

Original motion.

This was an application to the Court of Appeal in a divorce action by the husband for an extension of the time for appealing, or for moving for a new trial to set aside the verdict of the jury at the trial on the 18th of January, 1895.

In February, 1854, George Rickard and Emma Hand were married at Plymouth. Rickard was at that time a ship's carpenter in the Royal Navy, serving on board the Magicienne. A few days after the marriage the Crimean War broke out, and the Magicienne was ordered out to the Baltic. Rickard remained on the Magicienne until the conclusion of the war in 1856. He then returned home and lived with his wife.

In 1857 he joined the Indus, and was sent out to the West Indies. He soon deserted, and returned to England in 1858, living for one day with his wife at Plymouth. In order to avoid observation, he then went to the United States, and was never seen or heard of again, by his wife until quite recently.

On the 13th of May, 1865, Emma Rickard married John Wilkins (the petitioner), the period of seven years since she had last seen her first husband not having quite elapsed. Wilkins was aware that his wife had been previously married, but was informed and believed that the first husband was dead. There were no children by the first marriage, but there were eight by the second. Wilkins and his wife separated by mutual consent in January, 1883.

On the 16th of December, 1892, the wife presented a petition for judicial separation, on the ground of her husband's adultery.

On the 15th of April, 1893, the husband filed his answer, denying the adultery and pleading unreasonable delay, and that the marriage was invalid, the wife being already married and her first husband being still alive.

In May, 1893, the wife traversed these pleas.

In July, 1893, the husband filed a cross-petition for nullity of marriage.

The two suits were consolidated, and came on for trial before the President and a special jury in January, 1895.

The cross-petition was by leave withdrawn.

The jury found that Wilkins had committed adultery, and that the first husband was not alive at the date of the second marriage. A decree for judicial separation was accordingly made.

In September, 1895, Wilkins received a letter from Rickard's brother saying that Rickard had arrived in this country, and was staying at his house. Wilkins having satisfied himself of the identity of Rickard, on the 20th of October, 1895, presented a petition for nullity of marriage.

On the 4th of December, 1895, the wife filed her answer, denying that George Rickard was alive, and pleading the previous suit as a bar.

On the 14th of January, 1896, the trial came on before Barnes, J., without a jury. George Rickard was called and gave evidence, and his identity was established.

Barnes, J., adjourned the further consideration until an application had been made to the Court of Appeal either for a new trial or to set aside the verdict of the jury in the first action.

Bayford, Q.C., H. A. Forman, and F. O. Robinson, contra.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We have come to the conclusion that in point of law this case is governed by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890, and that we have power to enlarge the time for a motion for a new trial by virtue of ord. 64, r. 7. Obviously this is a case in which, if there is to be further litigation, we ought not to refuse leave. There must be some method of getting rid of the difficulty created by the verdict in the first suit, and the proper way is by a new trial. We are all impressed with the extreme hardship of granting leave without imposing terms on the husband. It would be nothing short of inhuman that, after the wife has lived with her second husband for eighteen years, she should now be left with her eight children without means of support. The husband says he is willing to give an undertaking to continue the allowance of 12s. a week which he covenanted to pay under the separation deed of 1883. But circumstances have altered since then, and we think that 12s. a week is not enough now, seeing that the wife is now sixty-four years of age. We shall not give leave unless the husband undertakes to secure to his wife £1 a week during their joint lives.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I have not the slightest doubt that the court has power to enlarge the time for moving for a new trial; and leave ought to be given in this case in order that the verdict of the jury may be set aside. I am also clearly of opinion that leave should only be given on terms: the question is, on what terms? I quite agree the proper amount to be secured is £1 per week. On those terms the application should be granted.

KAY, L.J.—This point of practice arises on the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890. The questions whether a new trial ought to be granted and whether leave should be given to move for one are clearly questions of practice. This is a case in which we are all agreed leave should be given on terms; for there seems to have been no negligence on anybody's part. . . . I think there is jurisdiction to enlarge the time, and that this is a case in which it should be enlarged. . . . £1 per week is a proper provision for the appellant to make for his wife, and he ought not to have leave except he properly secures that sum to her.

Application allowed. The order was to the effect that the petitioner and respondent being satisfied that the first husband was still alive, the verdict and decree in the first suit should be set aside by consent.

THE "RED SEA." (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Constructive total loss—Chartered freight—Bill of lading freight—Advanced freight—Delivery of cargo at port of destination—Rights of underwriters.

A ship, which was chartered for a particular voyage, was insured by the owners. The cargo was shipped under bills of lading, which provided that the cargo was to be delivered at the port of destination to the order of the shippers or their assigns, they paying freight as per charter-party. Part of the charter-party freight was prepaid before the commencement of the voyage. During the voyage the ship became a constructive total loss, and notice of abandonment was given to, and accepted by, the underwriters. The ship and cargo were subsequently brought to the port of destination and the cargo was delivered, and the shipowners received the amount of the freight, less the prepaid freight, from the consignees of the cargo.

Held, that the underwriters were only entitled to the freight earned by the delivery of the cargo after the ship became their property; that the freight so earned was the difference between the total freight and the prepaid freight; and that therefore they were not entitled to recover the balance.

Appeal from the judgment of Bruce, J. ([1895] P. 293).

The action was brought by the underwriters on the hull and machinery of the steamship Red Sea against the Sea Steamship Co., the owners of the Red Sea, to recover a balance of freight, under the following circumstances:—

The Red Sea was chartered to carry a cargo from Pensacola to a port in the United Kingdom as ordered on signing bills of lading.

The charter-party provided that "sufficient cash for the ship's ordinary disbursements at port of loading should be advanced the master by charterers or their agents, ship paying 2½ per cent. commission, including insurance. Master to give his draft on owners or consignees as required and customary to cover same, which shall be paid out of the first freight collected."

The freight was to be paid one-third on arrival of the ship, and the rest on delivery of the cargo.

The cargo was shipped by the charterers under a bill of lading which provided that the cargo was to be delivered at West Hartlepool to the order of the shippers or their assigns, they paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party.

The bill of lading was indorsed to Wade, Sons, & Co., of West Hartlepool, to whom the property in the cargo passed.

The charterers made disbursements for the ship at Pensacola amounting to £1,677 19s. 10d., and in respect of this sum the master signed and gave to the charterers a note promising to pay it in a bill on London five days after the arrival of the ship at the port of destination, for the payment of which he pledged the ship and freight. This note was subsequently indorsed for value to Wade, Sons, & Co., the consignees of the cargo.

The ship took the ground when endeavouring to cross the bar at West Hartlepool, and became a constructive total loss, notice of abandonment being given to and accepted by the plaintiffs, the ship, however, being lightened and towed into port and her cargo delivered by the captain.

The defendants received from Wade, Sons, & Co. the amount of the gross freight due under the bill of lading (which was the same as the chartered freight) less the above-mentioned sum of £1,677 19s. 10d.

The question of law raised was whether, as the plaintiffs contended, the defendants were bound to account to them for the gross bill of lading freight, or whether, as the defendants contended, the plaintiffs were only entitled to the balance of the freight after deducting the £1,677 19s. 10d.

Bruce, J., held that the defendants' contention was right.

The plaintiffs appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, for the plaintiffs.—Assuming, first, that the £1,677 19s. 10d. was advanced freight, the underwriters are entitled to the bill of lading freight on delivery of the cargo. The master was bound to collect the bill of lading freight payable by the consignees for the carriage of their cargo, and to hand it over to the underwriters; and the fact that the consignees had previously purchased the master's note cannot affect the rights of the underwriters, who were no parties to any contract between the shipowners and charterers. He referred on this point to Case v. Davidson, 5 M. & S. 79: Sea Insurance Co. v. Hadden, 32 W. R. 841, 13 Q. B. D. 706. Secondly, the £1,677 19s. 10d. was not advanced freight, but merely a personal loan by the charterers to the shipowners.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (T. G. Carver with him), for the defendants.—The judgment of Lord Ellenborough in Case v. Davidson shows that the underwriters, on a constructive total loss happening, are entitled to what the shipowners are entitled to receive. They cannot have a higher right than the shipowners. The captain collects the bill of lading freight, and hands over the amount of the chartered freight to the shipowners, less any prepaid freight, and holds the balance, if any, as trustee for the charterers. The underwriters, who step into the shoes of the shipowners, are therefore only entitled to the chartered freight less the prepaid freight.

(He was stopped.)

J. A. Hamilton replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In Case v. Davidson Lord Ellenborough, it seems to me, has pointed out what are the rights of the underwriters and shipowners when there is a constructive total loss of the ship, and notice of abandonment is given and accepted. The ship is considered as having passed to the underwriters as from the time when the damage, which entitled the owners to abandon her, occurred. The underwriters are entitled to whatever is earned by the use of the ship from that time. They are not entitled to anything earned by the use of the ship before it became their ship. In the ordinary case of freight payable on the arrival of the ship and delivery of the cargo, the ship has earned no freight, according to the law of England, unless it has been prepaid, before the ship's arrival and delivery of the goods. Therefore in that case the ship would have earned no freight up to the time of a constructive total loss occurring, but he who is the owner of the ship when she arrives with her cargo is entitled to the freight for the whole voyage. In the present case the underwriters were entitled to receive all the freight earned by the ship by delivery of the cargo at the port of destination. Prepaid freight cannot be recovered from the shipowners, and therefore that is not freight which the ship earns by delivery of the cargo. The shipowners would be entitled, on delivery of the cargo at the port of destination, to the difference between the whole charterparty freight and the prepaid freight, for I cannot doubt that the sum of money in this case was advanced in respect of freight. The whole ship was chartered, and the master was bound to sign bills of lading for the cargo. The master would collect that bill of lading freight from the consignees of the cargo, and he would pay over the amount of the charterparty freight to the shipowners, and hold the surplus, if any, as trustee for the charterers. In this case the charterparty freight and the bill of lading freight were the same, and so there was no surplus. Therefore, when the ship arrived the sum to be received was the difference between the total charterparty freight and the prepaid freight. The shipowners had ceased to be the owners when that difference was earned; the underwriters owned the ship at that time, and they became entitled to that sum, and to that sum only. I may add that the note signed by the master when the freight was advanced does not affect the case in any way. For these reasons I think that the judgment of Bruce, J., should be affirmed.

Where the Committee of the Incorporated Law Society, upon an application under section 13 of the Solicitors Act, 1888, alleging professional misconduct against a solicitor, are of opinion that the affidavits disclose no primâ facie case of misconduct, they need not hear any further evidence or take any further proceedings in the matter, or make any report.

An application was made to the Incorporated Law Society that two solicitors might be required to answer allegations of professional misconduct contained in an affidavit of the applicant. The committee of the Law Society, having considered the allegations contained in the affidavit, and without calling on the solicitors charged to appear and answer the allegations, were of opinion that the applicant had not made out a primâ facie of professional misconduct against the solicitors, and declined to hold further inquiry in the case.

The court discharged the rule nisi for a mandamus obtained by the applicant as above.

The applicant applied for leave to appeal, notwithstanding that the time for appealing had expired.*

LORD ESHER, M.R.—Under section 13 of the Solicitors Act, 1888, and the rules made under the Act, an applicant has to put his charge on affidavit, and to state in the affidavit the facts in support of the charge. He must then send the affidavit to the Law Society. The Committee of the Law Society appointed under the Act of 1888 read and consider the affidavit. If upon so doing they come to the conclusion, assuming the facts stated therein to be true, that a primâ facie case of professional misconduct has not been disclosed, they are to stop there and to proceed no further. It is contended that they must call the applicant before them and hear his evidence before deciding whether a primâ facie has been made out, and that they must make a report in all cases, though they need not send it to the court if they think that a primâ facie case is not made out. In my opinion, if the committee, upon reading the affidavit, honestly come to the conclusion that it discloses no primâ facie case of misconduct, they have heard the case, and they can then stop and take no further steps. The applicant is not precluded from taking other proceedings. By the proviso in section 13 he may, upon his own responsibility, apply to the court. The committee of the Law Society are the sole judges whether a primâ facie case of misconduct has been disclosed, and there is no appeal from their decision upon that point.

Therefore the application for leave to appeal must be dismissed, there being no ground shown for giving leave.

BADISCHE ANILIN UND SODA FABRIK v. HENRY JOHNSON & CO. AND THE BASLE CHEMICAL WORKS. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Service out of the jurisdiction—Action for infringement of patent—Injunction—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (f).

Foreign manufacturers supplied goods to an English firm of retail dealers. The plaintiffs, alleging that such goods were an infringement of their patent, commenced an action against the English dealers, and applied ex parte to North, J., in chambers for leave to issue a concurrent writ and serve notice of it on the foreign manufacturers out of the jurisdiction.

Held (reversing the decision of North, J.), that the plaintiffs had made out a primâ facie case within R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (f); and the leave asked for was granted.

Appeal ex parte from a decision of North, J., in chambers.

The plaintiffs were the owners of an English patent for dyes, and applied for leave to issue a concurrent writ in the action, and to serve notice of it on the second defendants at their place of business, Basle, out of the jurisdiction of the court.

By their writ in the action they claimed an injunction restraining the defendants, their servants and agents, from importing into England and from manufacturing, selling, supplying, and using in England dyes manufactured according to the patent, or in any manner only colourably differing from the same, and generally from infringing the plaintiffs' rights under the patent. The plaintiffs also claimed damages and other consequential relief.

The evidence was to the effect that the Basle company manufactured at Basle a dye which was an infringement of the plaintiffs' patent, and imported it into this country, the defendants, Henry Johnson & Co., having so bought some. The first defendants, when served with the writ, stated that they did not intend to enter an appearance, and would submit to a perpetnal injunction.

R.S.C., ord. 11., r. 1, provides: "Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons, or notice of a writ of summons, may be allowed by the court or a judge whenever (inter alia) (f) any injunction is sought as to anything to be done within the jurisdiction, or any nuisance within the jurisdiction is sought to be prevented or removed, whether damages are or are not also sought in respect thereof."

North, J., refused the application to allow notice of such writ to be served, and the plaintiffs appealed ex parte to the Court of Appeal.

Moulton, Q.C., and W. N. Lawson, for the appellants.—The second defendants are proper and necessary parties to the action, and the plaintiffs seek an injunction to restrain acts done within the jurisdiction, so that the case is exactly within the rule. The importation and sale in England of articles manufactured abroad according to the specification of an English patent, being an infringement, can be restrained by injunction: Elmslie v. Boursier, 18 W. R. 665, L. R. 9 Eq. 217. See also Von Heyden v. Neustadt, 28 W. R. 496, 14 Ch. D. 230; and Marshall v. Marshall, 38 Ch. D. 330, 36 W. R. Dig. 161.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In my opinion the plaintiffs have made out a primâ facie case within rule 1 (f) of order 11 for giving leave to issue a concurrent writ, and to serve notice of it on the Basle company abroad. It is clear that the plaintiffs are bonâ fide seeking an injunction to prevent the sale in England of an article infringing their patent. The invoice contains a clause which primâ facie the Basle company were not authorized to insert in it. This is merely a colourable proceeding to conceal the fact that the Basle company sent their goods and sold them in this country. This, however, is an ex parte application, and, of course, if after the Basle company have been served they should come here and ask the court to discharge the order for service, they will not be prejudiced by anything we have said to-day.

I think the leave which the plaintiffs ask for should be granted.

SANGUINETTI v. STUCKEY'S BANK (a.)

Mortgage — Practice — Foreclosure—Judgment—Account —Special circumstances.

Any special matter affecting the state of the account as between mortgagor and mortgagee in a foreclosure action should be brought forward at the trial, and the judgment should direct the chief clerk to have regard to any such matter specifically.

Where the common account was directed in a foreclosure judgment, and there was no special direction to the chief clerk,

Held, that it was not open to the mortgagor on the taking of the ordinary account to bring forward for the first time a claim to redeem on payment of the amount at which the mortgagee had valued his security in the mortgagor's bankruptcy, and that a summons to vary the certificate by the addition of a finding of the claim to redeem must be dismissed.

Summons.

This was a summons by one Denman, a defendant in the above action (which was a foreclosure action), to set aside or vary the chief clerk's certificate.

A receiving order against the mortgagor had been made in February, 1885; and the above action was instituted in January, 1888, and a foreclosure judgment was made in December, 1894. The present applicant was the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor, and his object was to be allowed to redeem on payment of £2,400, being the amount at which the plaintiff in the above action had valued his security in the bankruptcy proceedings against the mortgagor.

In June, 1888, a settlement made by the mortgagor was set aside in the bankruptcy, and the present applicant had thereupon maintained that the benefit of the order setting aside the settlement was confined to the unsecured creditors, but the contrary was decided at the hearing of the above action, reported on this point 43 W. R.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

154, [1895] 1 Ch. 176. In consequence of this decision the value of the plaintiff's security was greatly increased, and funds in court which formed part of the security amounted, in December, 1894, to £4,800. The foreclosure judgment directed the usual account to be taken of what was due to the plaintiff for principal and interest, after giving credit for the sum the plaintiff had received out of court under the payment schedule; and under the payment schedule it appeared that the plaintiff had actually received out of the £4,800 the sum of £3,528.

Farwell, Q.C., Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Fossett Lock, for the applicant.—The chief clerk's certificate should be varied by adding a finding that the present applicant claims to redeem for £2,400. The foreclosure judgment ought to have shown that he was entitled to do so: see Knowles v. Dibbs, 37 W. R. 378. This judgment as it stands is for an account to be taken of what is due—i.e., of what is due having regard to all the circumstances. [CHITTY, J.—The matter should have been brought forward at the trial.] There is no authority as to what matters are open and what are not at the taking of the account. The applicant could bring in a settled account, and that is really what he wants to do. The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, schedule 2, rule 12 (A), favours the applicant's claim to redeem.

Levett, Q.C., and George Henderson, for the plaintiff.—The applicant cannot be allowed to set up now a case which he did not set up at the trial. It is too late for him to avail himself of rule 12 (A) after judgment has gone for foreclosure, Ex parte Norris, In re Sadler, 35 W. R. 19, 17 Q. B. D. 728. Moreover, the plaintiff's security has increased in value, and rule 13 gives a creditor power to amend his valuation in such a case. But the application is altogether out of time, and ought to be dismissed on that ground.

Farwell, replied.

CHITTY, J., after stating the facts, continued:—The question that has been raised by this summons clearly might have been raised, and ought to have been raised, at the trial. The account directed by the judgment is in the common form for principal and interest; and if there were any special matter affecting the account there should have been a declaration directing the chief clerk, who was only taking an ordinary account as it appears, to have regard to some particular circumstances and facts. Mr. Farwell put several illustrations in support of his argument that he was entitled to redeem now for £2,400. That argument is wholly inconsistent, as I have already shown, with the judgment itself, on the face of which the plaintiff got £3,528. The point was not raised on behalf of the defendant, and I am entitled to consider what Mr. Levett says is correct, namely, that the defendant deliberately abstained from raising it, but perhaps that point is not very material. I take it that he did not raise this point at the trial, and, if he had, there would have been then a declaration limiting the account in this way—an account of what is due under and by virtue of the charges, regard being had to the plaintiff having valued his security in bankruptcy at the sum of £2,400. It seems to me that so far from the rejection of the present application involving any injustice, as was contended for by the defendant, upon mortgagors generally, I should be inflicting on mortgagees a great injury by acceding to such a contention as this. Here the mortgagee gets the benefit of an order of the court that an account is to be taken of what is due on the charges; and there is nothing on the face of the order to cut it down. I quite agree that the object of the account is to find out what is justly owing and what is justly due, and in taking the account the mortgagor can always show what he has paid on account of either principal or interest. I agree that settled accounts are not disturbed; but I do not agree, and there is no precedent for it, that a defence of this kind, which was not brought forward at the right time can be brought forward during what I may term the mechanical operation of taking an ordinary account. Therefore, on the substance of the question, there being no authority to the contrary or one which touches the point, except merely the direction I gave in the undefended case of Knowles v. Dibbs that some words should be put in to the effect I mentioned in the judgment (see 37 W. R. 378), I hold that it is too late, after the judgment has gone, for the defendant, the trustee in bankruptcy, to raise this defence. I therefore decide the question upon the merits.

[There was a controversy as to whether the question of redemption was raised at all before the chief clerk while the certificate was still pending, and it appeared to his lordship that the question was really not raised till after the certificate had gone, and that on that ground also the applicant was too late to raise the point, but the decision on this part of the case does not call for a detailed report.]

JACKSON v. PARROTT. (a.)

Trustee—Discretion of trustees—Maintenance—Accumulations—Order.

A trustee who has, under the instrument of trust, a discretionary power of accumulating and investing as capital any portion of income unapplied for maintenance, does not exercise his discretion if he obeys an order of the court to accumulate the whole of the income of the fund until further order.

Whether a trustee who has exercised his discretion in accumulating income as capital can afterwards apply the capitalized accumulations for maintenance, quære.

Adjourned summons.

William Wise, by his will dated the 19th of October, 1887, appointed W. S. Parrott and James Mortimer executors and trustees, and after giving certain legacies, devised his real estate to his trustees upon trust to receive the rents, and pay his brother George Wise the annual sum of £41 12s. during his life, and his sister Margaret Hine Jackson the annual sum of £208 during her life; and to dispose of any surplus as part of his residuary personal estate. And on the death of the survivor of George Wise and Margaret Hine Jackson upon trust for the child, if only one, or all the children, if more than one, of Margaret Hine Jackson, who, either before or after her decease, should attain twenty-three years (such children, if more than one, to take in equal shares as tenants in common), and the issue of such of the children of his said sister as might then be dead, such issue taking only as tenants in common the share which their respective parents would have taken if living. And the testator bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate unto his trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and to invest the net proceeds and stand possessed of the income arising therefrom upon trust to apply the whole, or such part thereof, as his trustees or trustee for the time being in their or his absolute discretion should think fit in or towards the maintenance, education, apprenticeship, or in any other manner for the benefit of the child or children of Margaret Hine Jackson, until they should respectively attain the age of twenty-three years, and to accumulate any unapplied portion.

The ultimate trusts were for the child, if only one, or all the children, if more than one, of his sister, who, either before or after her decease, should live to attain the age of twenty-three, and the issue of such of the children of his said sister as might then be dead, such issue taking only as tenants in common the share which their respective parents would have taken if living.

There was a gift over if all his sisters' children died without issue in her lifetime.

The testator died on the 25th of February, 1888.

North, J., on the 30th of January, 1889, upon the application of the trustees by originating summons said that the effect of the devise of real estate could not be determined till the death of the annuitants. The bequest of the residuary personalty was void for remoteness, but the persons to take could not be determined until the death of Margaret Hine Jackson. And it was ordered that the trustees should accumulate the surplus income of the real and residuary personal estate until further order.

No part of the income was applied in maintenance, but the whole was accumulated.

Two children of Margaret Hine Jackson now applied for maintenance—viz., Florence Mary, who attained twenty-three on the 10th of March, 1892, and Frederick William, born the 28th of May, 1874.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Dickinson, for the applicants.—The trust for maintenance can be separated from the void gift of capital, and is valid for twenty-one years from the death: Gooding v. Read, 4 De. G. M. & G. 510; In re Watson, W. N., [1892] p. 192. The trustees have never exercised their discretion, and they can use the accumulations of past years: Edwards v. Grove, 2 De G. F. & J. 210, 9 W. R. Ch. Dig. 99.

Stallard, for one of the next of kin.—The trustees have no discretion as to past, but only as to future income: Wilson v. Turner, 31 W. R. 438, 22 Ch. D. 521.

Macnaghten, for another of the next of kin.

NORTH, J.—I thought on reading the will that it was reasonably clear that the trust for the maintenance out of the income of a fund up to the age of twenty-three of persons who are described, was an entirely different and separate trust from the trust of the capital of the fund for the same persons on their attaining the age of twenty-three. Two cases have been cited showing that my opinion arrived at independently on this will, is identical with the view taken by the court in similar cases: Gooding v. Read was very like the present case, and In re Watson was even stronger.

In my opinion, therefore, the trust for maintenance is good. Nearly eight years have elapsed since the testator died, and during the whole of that time the income has been accumulated. I at first thought the trustees had deliberately chosen to capitalize the income, and had exercised their discretion to the effect that it was not required for maintenance, and ought to be accumulated. I had not then given due weight to the clause in my former order. The positive direction to accumulate the income until further order bound the trustees until it was varied, and they had no longer any discretion as to applying any part of the income for maintenance without some further order of the court. Under these circumstances, the trustees, in capitalizing the income, have not exercised any discretion, and it is now open to them to exercise the discretion given to them by the trust in question, and I can see no difficulty in their applying income accrued in past years for maintenance after these years have expired. The question whether, if the trustees had exercised their discretion and capitalized the income they could afterwards resort to the capitalized accumulations does not now arise, for the trustees have not in fact exercised their discretion.

The fact that the daughter attained twenty-three four years ago does not deprive the trustees of the power of exercising their discretion regard to the income which accrued up to the date of her attaining twenty-three. The fact that she was maintained and educated until then is a point to which, however, they would, no doubt, give due consideration.

COLLINSON v. JEFFERY. (a.)

Practice — Time — Enlargement — Redemption action— Order to pay into court—Default—Mistake—Payment in after time specified—Jurisdiction—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 64, r. 7.

In a redemption action an order was made giving leave to the plaintiff to lodge a sum of money in court to cover the amount due to the mortgagee, and directing that in default of payment being made within two months of the date of the order that "the action be dismissed, with costs."

Owing to a bonâ fide mistake on the part of the plaintiff's solicitor, the money was not paid in until after two months from the date of the order, though within two months of the date of the order being entered and passed. No application had been made to dismiss the action.

Held, that the action was still alive, and that the court had jurisdiction to extend the time for payment in.

Motion.

This was a motion in a redemption action asking for an extension of time with respect to an order for payment into court, under the following circumstances.

By an order of the Court of Appeal, dated the 6th of November, 1895, it was ordered that "the plaintiffs be at liberty to make the lodgment into court of £420," and it was also ordered "that in default of such lodgment within two months from the date of this order, the action be dismissed, with costs to be paid to the defendant by the plaintiffs."

Owing to a mistake of the plaintiffs' solicitor, who thought that time began to run from the 17th of December, 1895 (the date on which the order was passed and entered), and not from the 6th of November, 1895 (the date of the order), the money was not paid into court until the beginning of February, 1896.

On the 8th of February, 1896, the defendant's solicitor wrote to the plaintiffs' solicitor, saying that as the plaintiffs had made default in not paying the £420 into court, the action stood dismissed, with costs. The plaintiffs' solicitor replied that the £420 had been paid into court (as was the fact) on the 6th of February, 1896, and, after further correspondence, gave notice of motion for an extension of time for the purpose of putting right the omission to pay in the £420 within the time prescribed by the order of the Court of Appeal.

No application had been made on behalf of the defendant to dismiss the action.

Warrington, Q.C., and C. Johnston Edwards, for the plaintiffs.—This is a case for relief, the mistake being a bonâ fide one, and the defendant having obtained the security he bargained for. No application has been made to dismiss the action: Daniel's Ch. Practice, 6th ed., p. 789.

W. G. Lemon, for the defendant.—The action is dead, and the court has no jurisdiction to relieve by granting an extension of time: Whistler v. Hancock, 26 W. R. 211, 3 Q. B. D. 83; King v. Davenport, 27 W. R. 798, 4 Q. B. D. 402; Script Phonography Co. v. Grey, 59 L. J. Ch. 406, 38 W. R. Dig. 160. And on the merits of the case the court will not extend time in a redemption action unless there is very distinctive reason: Novosielski v. Wakefield, 17 Ves., at p. 418; Faulkner v. Bolton, 7 Sim. 319.

KEKEWICH, J.—I remember a phrase of which Knight Bruce, L.J., was very fond, "a slip in the office"; and he always, where such a slip had occurred, if it was an honest one, attempted to assist the applicant for relief therefrom. In this case I am convinced that there was a "slip in the office," and that it was an honest one. A mistake—a very stupid mistake—has been made, as from the form of the order it was quite clear that the money was to be paid in within two months of the date of the order. However, a blunder was made and the money was not paid into court until too late, but it is now in court and the defendant has the security for which he bargained, and I think it is a case in which the court ought to grant relief. Mr. Lemon says that I cannot grant relief because the action is dead, and if the action is dead it is true that I cannot relieve the applicant. But the action is not dead, it is only comatose or moribund. A final stroke in the shape of an application to dismiss the action is requisite to effect death, and, consequently, if an application for relief is made to me before the final stroke I have the power to grant it. Cases from the Queen's Bench Division have been cited to show that I have no such power, but in all those cases it was ordered that the applicant should take certain steps within a certain time, and in default of his doing so that the action should be dismissed for want of prosecution. That, in my opinion, is a final and peremptory order fixing the time that was to put an end to litigation, the only question being whether the applicant shall have more time in which to contest his opponent's right. That practice has never been applied in such an action as the present, where the question is one of paying money into court as security in a redemption action; and though, no doubt, there is some difficulty in dealing with the question after the time has expired, it has never been the practice to treat the action as dead until an application has been made to dismiss the action. It is true that there is a special form sometimes made use of in these cases that on failure to do certain acts within a specified time the action shall be dismissed "without further order," but these words have not been introduced here.

I therefore grant the application for extension of time in the terms of the notice of motion; but of course it is an indulgence, and therefore the applicants must pay the costs of this application.

real and personal estate upon trust for Martha Ann Chapman (one of the trustees) for life with remainder over, and directed them to invest the same upon "good, real, or Government security," with full power to alter and vary and to reinvest upon like securities without being "answerable or accountable" for any loss occasioned thereby. And he gave to his executors all hereditaments vested in him "upon any trust or by way of mortgage to the intent that they might be better enabled to get in and discharge all such trust estates and moneys secured by way of mortgage."

The testator died on the 5th of April, 1879, leaving property which largely consisted of mortgage securities, which the trustees allowed to remain outstanding.

Subsequently, owing to depreciation in property, the securities became unrealizable except at a loss.

On the 21st of December, 1892, the trustees received a notice from one of the persons interested in remainder, to the effect that the trustees had been guilty of a breach of trust in not having forthwith on the death of the testator invested the trust funds in good and proper securities as directed by the will, and that they would be "held responsible for all losses, costs, and expenses arising to the trust estate by or by reason or on account of such breach of trust," followed by a requisition to invest the trust funds in a proper manner, and to make good any deficiency.

This was a summons taken out by the trustees to determine whether the estate of a deceased trustee and the surviving trustee, or either of them, ought to make good any deficiencies arising on any of the said mortgages.

Warrington, Q.C., and Gatey, for the plaintiffs.—The trustees are not liable. Section 4 of the Trustee Act (1893) Amendment Act, 1894, applies—viz., that "a trustee shall not be liable for breach of trust by reason only of his continuing to hold an investment which has ceased to be an investment authorized by the instrument of trust or by the general law." The Act is retrospective, and sections 8 and 9 of the Trustee Act, 1893, apply. In the next place, this claim against the trustees is barred by the Statute of Limitations: the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8, sub-sections (a) and (b). Sub-section (a) applies to this case: Wolstenholme, 7th edition, p. 188.

Marten, Q.C., and Wilkinson, for the tenant for life and the legal personal representatives of the testator.—The Act of 1894 was an amending Act, and was intended to be retrospective. Sections 30, 41, and 44 of the Act of 1893 are amended by sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Act of 1894. The general principles as to the retrospective effect of an Act are laid down in Attorney-General v. Theobald, 38 W. R. 527, 24 Q. B. D. 557; Ellis on the Trustee Act; Rex. v. Dursley, 3 B. & Ad. 465; Freeman v. Moyes, 1 Ad. & E. 338; Pardo v. Bingham, 17 W. R. 419, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 735; Towler v. Chatterton, 6 Bing. 258. The Act of 1894, section 4, says "a trustee shall not be liable"—i.e., after the passing of the Act, and consequently the trustees are not liable here.

Warmington, Q.C., and Micklem, for the remainderman who had called on the trustees to make good the breach of trust.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question I have to decide is whether section 4 of the Trustee Act (1893) Amendment Act, 1894, is retrospective. In this case, according to the chief clerk's certificate, the trustees ought to have called in these mortgages not later than the end of July, 1881. They did not do so, and have not yet done so; and consequently on the passing of the Act of 1894 had been for thirteen years guilty of a breach of trust, and were liable to make good the deficiency arising from that breach of trust. Then comes the Act of 1894, which says: "A trustee shall not be liable for breach of trust by reason only of his continuing to hold an investment which has ceased to be an investment authorized by the instrument of trust or by the general law." We have in this case a "breach of trust by reason only of his continuing." The question, therefore, is whether when the Act passed it relieved the trustees from an obligation under which they lay up to that time, an obligation not enforced, but enforceable. There are many cases on the general doctrine whether an Act of Parliament is retrospective or not, and many cases on particular statutes; but I have the general doctrine concisely stated by Lord Hatherley in Pardo v. Bingham, where he says, at p. 739 of L. R. 4 Ch. App.: "The general rule of law being that, except there be a clear indication either from the subject matter or from the wording of a statute, the statute is not to have a retrospective construction." In other words, you assume that it is not retrospective, but that assumption might be rebutted. On the next page Lord Hatherley gives a guide for deciding what is the intention of the Legislature. He says: "In fact we must look to the general scope and purview of the statute and at the remedy sought to be applied, and consider what was the former state of the law and what it was that the Legislature contemplated." The first thing I have to do is to construe the meaning of the words before me, which is not so easy as at first sight it appears to be. What is the meaning of the word "liable"? The etymological meaning is not of much service. Regarded by jurists as modern English, the word has not a distinct meaning in ancient law. It is a single word for expressing "under an obligation" or "obliged." A trustee is not under an obligation or obliged. That does not help us; it only explains the word, and does not show whether the word "shall" must be construed prospectively or retrospectively. I must therefore take Lord Hatherley's words as a guide. The statute is remedial. Lord Hatherley says I must look at the remedy sought to be applied. I must see whether the Legislature in passing the Act was minded to relieve trustees of liability to which up to that time they had been subject. I will not fall back upon maxims or rules to construe remedial statutes otherwise than other statutes. I am not entitled to give to the statute an interpretation more favourable to trustees than if it were not remedial. I must give the statute the best meaning I can. I look at the general scope and purview of the statute and at the remedy sought to be applied, and consider what was the former state of the law, and what alterations in the law the Legislature contemplated. The general scope is of no assistance. It is an amending statute for the purpose of amending two or three clauses of the Trustee Act of 1893. This 4th section is the only one which refers to general law; the other three sections are merely amending sections to the Act of 1893. Now, the scope and purview of section 4 is, no doubt, to relieve trustees from liability for breach of trust. The Legislature has for many years turned its attention to that point. The Trustee Act of 1888 was of remedial character, and the Act of 1893, which repealed it (with the exception of sections 1 and 8), re-enacted the other remedial sections. The amending Act of 1894 does not mention the Act of 1888; but the Acts of 1888 and 1893 constitute a code, and of that code the Act of 1894 must be considered as an amendment. Consequently one must look at the Act of 1888, as well as the Act of 1893, in order to find the scope and purview of the Act of 1894, which must be considered as affording relief to trustees beyond that granted by the Act of 1888. Until the Act of 1888 no Statute of Limitations ran in favour of trustees, but by section 8 of that Act trustees may plead the statute. Now sub-section 3 of section 8 of the Act of 1888 says: "This section shall apply only to actions or other proceedings commenced after the 1st day of January, 1890, and shall not deprive any executor or administrator of any right or defence to which he is entitled under any existing Statute of Limitations." The rights of cestuis que trustent were reserved until after the 1st of January, 1890. Turning to the Act of 1893, sub-section 4 of section 8 says: "This section applies to transfers of existing securities as well as to new securities, and to investments made as well before as after the commencement of this Act, except where an action or other proceeding was pending with reference thereto on the 24th day of December, 1888"; and sub-section 2 of section 9 says: "This section applies to investments made as well before as after the commencement of this Act, except where an action or other proceeding was pending with reference thereto on the 24th day of December, 1886," the section being thus expressly made retrospective. I find, therefore, in the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1893, which this Act of 1894 sought to amend, special provision for the commencement of the relief, as regards the relief, and the time at which it shall commence. I have nothing of the kind here, and the language is different. In the Act of 1893, s. 8, the words are: "A trustee shall not be chargeable with breach of trust"—i.e., shall not be made to pay. In the Act of 1894, s. 4, the words are: "A trustee shall not be liable for breach of trust." The words do not give me much assistance; it is curious that "liable" should be used instead of "chargeable," and that no directions should be added as to when liability is to cease. With regard to the general scope and purview of the Act I see nothing retrospective in its operation. Trustees were in the former state of the law liable. It is said that the remedy of the cestui que trust shall be taken away. I cannot assume that the Legislature by one line of the statute intended to do so.

I am therefore unable to hold that section 4 of the Trustee Act (1893) Amendment Act, 1894, is retrospective so as to relieve trustees from an obligation which existed at the date of the Act.

In re GALWEY. (a.)

Extradition—Delivery up of British subject—Treaty with Belgium—Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), ss. 2, 6.

In 1876 a Treaty was signed between England and Belgium for the mutual surrender of fugitive criminals, and by an Order in Council the Extradition Act, 1870, was made to apply to this Treaty. In 1887, by a declaration between the two countries, it was provided that "in no case, nor on any consideration whatever, shall the high contracting parties be bound to surrender their own subjects."

Held, that while the contracting parties are not bound, they may under this Treaty surrender their own subjects; and that therefore the British Government had a discretion to surrender a fugitive criminal in this country, notwithstanding the fact that he was a British subject.

Rule nisi for habeas corpus to bring up F. Galwey and discharge him from custody, on the ground that he was a British subject and not liable to extradition to Belgium under the Treaty.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained calling on the governor of her Majesty's prison at Holloway to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue, directed to him, commanding him to have the body of one Frederick Galwey before the court.

The following are the facts of the case:—

On the 11th of December, 1895, Galwey was brought up before the magistrate at Bow-street for extradition to the Belgian Government, on a charge of fraudulently receiving stolen securities within the jurisdiction of the Belgian Government.

The prisoner was the son of R. Galwey, who was born in Ireland in 1812, and who in 1838 went to Belgium, where in 1845 he was married, having previously declared himself a British subject.

The prisoner was born at Bruges in 1846, and resided there until nearly twenty-one years of age.

In 1870 he came to reside in England, and continued to reside there except for a short period in the years 1888 and 1893, when he was respectively in Brussels and Paris.

The magistrate, being of opinion that a primâ facie case had been established, made, on the 1st of January, 1896, a committal order for extradition.

Thereupon a rule nisi was obtained for the discharge of the prisoner under a habeas corpus, on the ground that he was a British subject and therefore ought not to be delivered up. There was no question about the offence.

By the Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), it is provided as follows:—

Section 2: "Where an arrangement has been made with any foreign State with respect to the surrender to such State of any fugitive criminals, her Majesty may by Order in Council direct that this Act shall apply in the case of such foreign State."

Section 6: "Where this Act applies in the case of any foreign State, every fugitive criminal of that State who is in or suspected of being in any part of her Majesty's dominions, or that part which is specified in the order applying this Act (as the case may be), shall be liable to be apprehended and surrendered in manner provided by this Act, whether the crime in respect of which the surrender is sought was committed before or after the date of the order, and whether there is or is not any concurrent jurisdiction in any court of her Majesty's dominions over that crime."

In 1876 a Treaty, signed the 20th of May, was made between her Majesty and the King of the Belgians for the mutual surrender of fugitive criminals.

Article 1 provides: "It is agreed that her Britannic Majesty and his Majesty the King of the Belgians shall, on requisition made in their names by their respective diplomatic agents, deliver up to each other reciprocally any persons, except as regards Great Britain native-born and naturalized subjects of her Britannic Majesty, and except as regards Belgium those who are by birth or who may have become citizens of Belgium, who, being accused or convicted as principals or accessories of any of the crimes hereinafter specified committed within the territories of the requiring party, shall be found within the territories of the other party."

On the 21st of April, 1887, a declaration was made between the British and Belgian Governments for amending the above article as follows: Article 1.—"The words 'except as regards Great Britain native-born or naturalized subjects of her Britannic Majesty, and except as regards Belgium those who are by birth or who may have become citizens of Belgium,' which occur in article 1 of the Extradition Treaty of the 20th of May, 1876, are suppressed."

Article 2.—The following paragraph is added to article 1 of the said Treaty: "In no case, nor on any consideration whatever, shall the high contracting parties be bound to surrender their own subjects, whether by birth or naturalization."

Sir R. Webster, A.G. (Sir R. Finlay, S.G., and Sutton, with him), showed cause against the rule.—The rule in this case was obtained on the ground that by the terms of the Treaty there is no power to deliver up a British subject; but, although it cannot now be contended that Galwey is not a British subject, yet it is clear that by the said Treaty he can be given up notwithstanding that he is a British subject. In Reg. v. Wilson, 26 W. R. 44, 3 Q. B. D. 42, it was held that British subjects could not be delivered up. That case was decided under a Treaty between the British and Swiss Governments made in 1874, and contained a clause similar to that in the Treaty of 1876 in this case. Owing to that decision the words in the Treaty of 1876 prohibiting the delivery up of British subjects were suppressed, and the clause in the declaration of 1887 substituted. The words substituted are that in no case shall the parties be bound to surrender their own subjects. These are not prohibitive words, but leave a discretion in the Secretary of State. Such a discretion should be exercised in this case. In the interests of justice the prisoner should be handed over when there is clear proof of his crime, although the court is not bound to do so.

F. M. Abrahams, for the Belgian Government.—The Belgian Government desire to have the prisoner handed over to them.

Bower (Farrant with him), in support of the rule.—When it is proved that the prisoner is a British subject the Crown must establish the fact that they are bound to hand him over, before this court will make the order. [LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The Treaty only says that the Government shall not be bound to hand over, and therefore it is left to the discretion of the Government.] Galwey is not confined owing to the exercise of the Government's discretion, but on the committal of the magistrate on the assumption that he is liable to be surrendered under section 6 of the Extradition Act, 1870. There is neither obligation nor right to hand him over. He owes allegiance to the Queen, and he is entitled to her protection.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In my judgment the rule in this case must be discharged. For the purpose of considering the question before us, we assume (for it has not been questioned) that the offence in respect of which the prisoner is detained under an order of committal is one within the Treaty and the statute. We must also assume that he is a British subject; and in my judgment we must further assume that the demand for extradition by the Belgian Goverment is assented to and supported by the executive Government of this country.

The question turns upon the construction of the Extradition Act, 1870, into which, and in connection with which, is to be read the terms of the Treaty. Now, the Treaty originally made in 1872 was modified in 1876, and as modified in 1876 it contained, as it originally stood, this stipulation: that her Britannic Majesty shall, on requisition made in her name by the respective agent of the other Power, deliver to each other reciprocally any persons, "except as regards Great Britain native-born and naturalized subjects of her Britannic Majesty." Now, as the Treaty then was, assuming Reg. v. Wilson, which was decided in 1877, to have been properly decided—and I am far from saying that it was not properly decided—assuming the Treaty to have stood in that position, the Extradition Act would not have authorized the extradition of the criminal, because from extraditions were excepted native-born and naturalized subjects of Great Britain. That Reg. v. Wilson decides, and I think rightly decides. I do not stop at all to consider whether, even if the Treaty did not apply, there might not have been some other steps taken with the view to extradition. Reg. v. Wilson decides that extradition could not be made under the Treaty, and the Extradition Act which applied to the Treaty. That being the original form of the Treaty it was subsequently altered; and, as the learned Attorney-General has suggested, it is quite probable that it was altered because of the case of Reg. v. Wilson, or probably other cases in the same sense, because in that case Cockburn, C.J., expresses regret that this country should not be enabled, under the extradition law then existing, to deliver, in proper cases even, British subjects who have offended against the laws of another country, as to which offences against the laws of another country, even although they might be crimes, and probably would be crimes common to both countries, yet could not be adequately dealt with or punished under the criminal law in this country. Accordingly, in 1887 the Treaty is designedly altered; the excepted words—that is to say, the exception which excluded native-born and naturalized subjects of Great Britain altogether from extradition under the statute and the then existing Treaty are excluded, and these words are substituted: "In no case, nor on any consideration whatever, shall the high contracting parties be bound to surrender their own subjects, whether by birth or naturalization." Now, what does that mean? It means surely that, while they are not bound, they may, under the Treaty and any legal enactment which relates to the Treaty, make such extradition.

Then we turn to the statute in connection with which the Treaty has to be construed. Section 6, a section to which the learned counsel for the prisoner has principally addressed himself, provides that where this Act applies in the case of any foreign State, and it applies in the case of Belgium, every fugitive criminal of that State who is in or suspected of being in any part of her Majesty's dominions, or that part which is specified in the order applying this Act as the case may be, shall be liable to be apprehended and surrendered in manner provided by this Act. The learned counsel says that in the present case the prisoner was not liable to be surrendered. It seems to me he clearly was. One may conceive the case of an application to the Secretary of State—and no particular Secretary of State is referred to in the Act—and that in that application in any given case the facts of which might be notorious, amongst others that the person against whom the application was made is a British subject, and that the circumstances under which he was charged with having committed a crime were such that in the clear opinion of the Secretary of State the executive Government ought not to assent to his extradition and ought not to exercise that power which the Treaty and the Act conjointly give, it clearly would be within his competence to say: "I shall not assist the extradition of this particular alleged criminal." In this case, however, as the learned counsel has pointed out, what he did was to sign a warrant in conformity with the terms of the first form in the second schedule to the Act. This warrant runs in these terms. It is addressed to the chief magistrate of the Metropolitan Police Court, it recites the Treaty arrangement and the Order in Council of the Queen applying the Act, it states that a requisition has been made to one of the principal Secretaries of State by diplomatic representatives for the surrender of a particular person; then it proceeds: "Now I hereby by this my order under my hand and seal signify to you"—that is the chief magistrate—"that such requisition has been made, and require you to issue your warrant for the apprehension of such fugitive, provided that the conditions of the Extradition Act, 1870, relating to the issue of such warrant are in your judgment complied with." It seems to me that that is as clear and distinct an assent on the part of the representative of the executive Government to the demand for extradition as can possibly be; and I decline entirely to give any effect to the argument of the learned counsel, which, as I understand it, may be stated compendiously thus. It is not denied that there might be such a requisition made by the diplomatic representatives of the demanding Power to the executive Government here; but the suggestion is that there must be shown to have been a formal demand, and that the assent must have been given by the Secretary of State in some other way than by his signing the form of order which I have just cited to the stipendiary magistrate. I do not for one moment mean to convey that the Secretary of State having given that order to the chief magistrate of the Metropolitan Police Court may not, when at a later stage he becomes more fully aware of the facts than he previously was, withdraw that assent even at a later stage, and say this is not a case in which the executive Government of this country think that extradition ought to be granted. Nay, more, I am far from saying that even at this moment, or at a later moment, before the accused is handed over to the foreign Government, that, if there be grounds for urging it, it is not perfectly open to those representing the person now in custody to make representations to the Crown, if reasons exist why extradition should not be made. But all those considerations are matters of a political complexion, they are not matters which enter into the duty of the judiciary at all to determine. The man having been taken into custody is brought before the metropolitan police magistrate, and we would, after the order of committal by such magistrate, be entitled to review his decision, not in the sense of entertaining an appeal from his decision, but in the sense of determining whether there was evidence enough to give the magistrate jurisdiction to make the order of committal. I mean evidence of the offence and of other necessary conditions for the application of the Act itself.

The prisoner is now in custody under the magistrate's order. It seems to me that the only ground on which this habeas corpus can be successfully maintained is that the committal order was made without jurisdiction and was illegal. I see no grounds or pretence whatever for maintaining any such contention, and I think this application is not in any sense well founded.

Lastly, upon argument before us, the executive Government of the country appear in the only way in which they can be represented in our courts, by the recognized law officers of the Government of the day. They are here expressing the wish of the Government of the day that this extradition shall take place; and it seems to me it is impossible for us to go beyond that, and to entertain any considerations which may or may not, if they exist, be properly addressed in another quarter. It is quite obvious, without pointing it out in detail, that the whole tenor of the argument of the learned counsel for the accused is in contravention of the argument and of the judgment in the case of Reg. v. Wilson; and, indeed, Field, J., in one passage of his judgment contemplates this very case. He pointed out that in that particular case, as the Treaty with Switzerland then stood—it has since been altered, in 1890—extradition of British subjects was excluded; and he also points out how different would the result of the decision of the court have been, if it had not been an exclusion, but had been a case in which an option, so to speak, was left to the Government, because he says: "Is there not in this very Treaty an exception? It is not that one country shall not be bound to deliver up, but that no subject shall be delivered up to the other country."

On these grounds I think that this rule must be discharged.

SOUTHWELL v. GOVERNORS OF ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE. (a.)

Inland revenue — Inhabited house duty—Exemption—"Charity school"—48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B, case 4—14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, s. 2.

By 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B (repealed by 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 19, but re-enacted by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36), "any hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons" is exempted from inhabited house duty.

An institution is a charity school within the schedule if its primary object is the education of those who cannot afford to educate themselves.

A college was founded with the object of enabling women to continue their education after leaving school with all the advantages of a collegiate life. The college was maintained partly by endowment and partly by students' fees, but the fees alone would not have been sufficient to carry on the college in the manner directed by the deed of trust.

Held, that the college was not a charity school, and the exemption from inhabited house duty contained in 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B, did not apply to it.

Special case stated under 43 and 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59, by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts and for executing the Acts relating to the inhabited house duties.

The respondents had appealed to the commissioners against an assessment to inhabited house duty made upon the buildings used for the purposes of Holloway College. The college was established to enable young women to carry on their studies after they have left school, and provides the instruction necessary for London degrees and for pass and honour examinations at Oxford. The building, which stands in its own grounds and gardens, includes chapel, dining-hall, gymnasium, library, reading-room, museum, lecture theatre and rooms, laboratories, common room, and a picture gallery. Each student has a bedroom and sitting-room to herself, fitted with all necessary furniture, and there are certain rooms such as dining-hall, music-hall, &c., common to the use of all students.

The declaration of trust as to the endowment of the college, the college prospectus, the report of the governors, and statements of accounts formed part of the special case. The material facts appearing from these documents are set out in the judgments.

It was contended for the respondents in support of their claim for exemption from inhabited house duty that the college was a charity school within the meaning of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B, case 4.

The commissioners held that the college was exempt from the duty. The question for the court was whether the decision of the commissioners was right. 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B, case 4 (repealed by 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 19, and re-enacted by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, s. 2), contains an exemption from inhabited house duty in the case of "any hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons."

Cur. adv. vult.

July 12, 1895.—GRANTHAM, J., read the following judgment:—In this case, which is stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, and for executing the Acts relating to the inhabited house duties, we are asked to say whether the buildings belonging to and used by the Royal Holloway College for the education of women come within the exemption from inhabited house duty allowed to charity schools under schedule B of the 45 Geo. 3, c. 55. In other words, we have to determine whether or not Holloway College is a "charity school" within the meaning of that exemption; and whether or not the young ladies enjoying the benefit, and with all the luxuries of a collegiate education, are "charity scholars." The commissioners have held that they are — i.e., that the buildings are exempt as a "charity school."

The first point, a preliminary one, we have to determine is whether or not the question is one of fact or of law. If of fact, we have no power to alter the decision of the commissioners. If of law, we have. If it is one of fact, it is only necessary to read the prospectus and report of the governors to see that the commissioners have decided wrongly, though we could not correct their decision; for it is impossible to contend as a fact of everyday life that a school or college where every scholar or student pays £90 a year can be a charity school, and it can only be so treated by a fiction of law; while, as it is admitted that the Commissioners arrived at their decision in consequence of their application to this case of certain legal decisions on the interpretation of the word "charity," as applied to trust estates, I have no doubt that this is a question of law, and one in which our decision is properly sought. Before attempting to apply the law as laid down in other cases, let us see clearly what the facts are, because if the facts are different in this case, the application of the same law must be wrong. The college was built "to enable young women to carry on their studies after they have left school under specially healthy conditions, and with all the advantages of a collegiate life." And provision is accordingly made for instruction in all the higher branches of education. Now, it may be that, under modern ideas of the higher education of the masses, all these advantages may some day or other be provided for those who are the objects of charity. But can it be said in this case that they are provided for those who are the objects of charity, when we find that the recipients of those advantages have to pay, and therefore can afford to pay, for them £30 a term (i.e., £90 a year), payable in advance, besides extras for doctors, fees for examination, and all the inevitable extras to be found in high-class ladies' schools, the charges for which come to from three guineas to five guineas a term (or nine guineas to fifteen guineas a year), making for the combined advantages the large sum of £146 16s. per annum, and that, too, without the laundress charges, which are also another extra? Surely, the bare statement of these facts answers the question, and no man can be so illogical as to say that legally this is a charity school. I have not forgotten that large sums are given by way of scholarships which reduce the cost of the education to those who obtain them; but they are not given on account of poverty, but on account of intellectual merit, and those least requiring pecuniary aid may, and often do, obtain them, so that the existence of these scholarships does not really affect the question. Why is it, then, that it is suggested that this is a charity school? Because it is said that so large a part of the expenses of the college are met by the endowment fund provided by a generous donor, and that the existence of that fund brings it within the principle of previous decisions on this question, and that we are bound by those decisions. True it is that at present a large proportion is so provided, but that is only temporarily so, and year by year as the college increases in numbers that proportion will diminish. The endowment fund may be taken to be a fixed fund of £7,500 a year, while the fund derived from fees for the year 1893 was also the same—viz., £7,500—and as the gross annual expenditure was about £15,000 in 1892-93 fees provided about one-half. But that was the proportion when the college only had ninety students, whereas with a complement of 200 students, for which the college was created and endowed, the proportion will be—endowment £7,500 and fees £18,000; or, in other words, about a quarter only will be derived from endowment funds, while the annual application of the funds makes the endowment proportion still less important, for I find that even now the fees received are far more than sufficient to pay the whole cost of tuition and household expenses—fees, £7,564; tuition and household expenses, £5,876. Notwithstanding this anomalous state of things, we may, however, be bound by precedent or by decisions of judges in other cases. I can find, however, no case which is applicable to such facts as these. The nearest case to them is the Charterhouse case—The Governors of Charterhouse v. Lamarque—where it was held that the school was not a charity school. I admit that the proportion the income from endowment funds bore to the amount paid by the boys was apparently less than in this case; but the principle was the same. Originally that school was founded for the purpose of providing a gratuitous education entirely. Now its main object is not to provide a gratuitous education, but to provide for those who can pay the necessary fees a high-class public school. And it must not be forgotten that Charterhouse School buildings at Godalming were, as I understand it, originally built out of endowment money in the same way that the buildings were erected at Holloway College, so that free buildings do not make a charity school; and, as the primary object of this college is not free education, but the highest class education combined with the luxuries of college life, it would require a very strong authority to make me conclude that this was a charity school.

I do not forget that I was pressed very fairly during the course of the argument with my own judgment in the case of Commissioners of Income Tax v. Pemsell, which was afterwards upheld in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords—a judgment given by me with a good deal of hesitation, as I was differing alone from the unanimous judgment of three Scotch judges of great eminence, and from the judgment of the then Lord Chief Justice of England, Lord Coleridge; but not only were the circumstances there entirely different, but the section of the Customs Act which we had to interpret and apply was an entirely different section from this. There we had to determine what was a "charitable trust," and the moment you get into trusts you come within the range of innumerable decisions of the Court of Chancery; and the fact that the Income Tax Act had specially relieved property applied to charitable trusts from paying income tax is a long way from showing that buildings in which charitable trust funds are applied in the maintenance of the buildings and partial provision and education of the inmates are not profitably used when the inmates themselves pay annually so large a sum for the advantages they derive as is paid by them in this college. I quite agree with the decision of my brother Charles in the case of Cawse v. Nottingham Lunatic Asylum that the word "poor" in the exemption of a house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons "only applies to the house" so provided; but we must not forget that the other words in the schedule, "hospital or charity school," indicate the buildings for the use of which no pecuniary advantage is obtained, and in interpreting the word "charity" you cannot therefore divorce it from the word school. So that we have not to determine what is a "charity" or what is a charitable purpose, which has been the question in so many of the cases cited during the argument; but what is a "charity school." I have not alluded to the other cases cited during the course of the arguments, because I can find nothing in the judgments there delivered helping us to a decision in this case; but for the reasons above given, in my judgment, this college and buildings are not exempt from inhabited house duty as coming within the exemption of the Act 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B.

CHARLES, J., read the following judgment:—The question in this case is whether the Royal Holloway College, Egham, is exempt from inhabited house duty. The commissioners to whom the governors of the college appealed against the assessment which had been made upon them were of opinion that the college was exempt, upon the ground that it was a "charity school" within the meaning of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B. By that statute, which was repealed by 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 19, but re-enacted by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, "any hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons" is exempted from inhabited house duty.

The cases which have been decided upon the schedule have reference to three classes of institutions—first, institutions wholly self-supporting; second, institutions dependent upon endowments; and, third, institutions partly supported by endowments and otherwise self-supporting. With regard to the first class there is no doubt that they do not fall within the exemption, which it has been held must be restricted to institutions maintained wholly or in part by charity. Thus, in Needham v. Bowers, 37 W. R. 125, 21 Q. B. D. 436, an unendowed hospital for the reception of insane persons founded by charitable donations, but supported entirely out of payments made by the patients, was held not to be exempt. With regard to the second class there is equally no doubt that they do fall within the exemption, whether they be "hospitals, charity schools," or "houses provided for the reception or relief of poor persons." It is in the third class of cases, the class to which Holloway College admittedly belongs, that we meet with points of difficulty. It has, however, been decided that the exemption does apply to an institution possessed of a substantial charitable endowment, notwithstanding the fact that it also derived income from the payments made by inmates sufficient, in some years, to cover the whole expenditure: Cawse v. Nottingham Lunatic Asylum. But the applicability of the exemption can hardly depend upon the exact proportion in any particular year between the income from endowments and that from other sources. It must depend, I think (as was pointed out in Cawse v. Nottingham Lunatic Asylum), not upon consideration of any particular year, but upon the character of the institution. This, moreover, was the test applied in The Governors of Charterhouse School v. Lamarque, where the court held that the modern School of Charterhouse was not a "charity school," although considerable benefit was derived from the funds of the original foundation, especially with regard to scholarships and exhibitions. The question is there treated as one of degree, to be determined upon the facts of each particular case, and this seems to me to be the only satisfactory way of dealing with the matter. The facts of the case must first be ascertained, and then the question of law arises whether these facts bring the particular hospital or school whose liability is under consideration within the exemption clause.

The question, then, to be determined is, What is the character of Holloway College? Can it be said to be, taken as a whole, a charity school? Now, I do not propose to attempt any definition of the word "charity" as used in schedule B, but I think there can be no doubt that the language of the schedule contemplates institutions whose primary object is the maintenance or education of those who cannot in the one case afford to maintain themselves, or in the other to pay for their own education—institutions, in other words, eleemosynary in character. A "hospital" certainly is primarily intended to receive patients who do not pay for their treatment. A "house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons" is a poorhouse, and nothing else. And the words "charity school" must, in my opinion, be interpreted, having regard to the preceding and succeeding words, as "school primarily intended for the supply of gratuitous education." If that condition is fulfilled, then the exemption will be available, even although the pupils who are educated contribute towards the expense of education; just as a hospital remains a hospital entitled to exemption, although in a particular year it may receive fees to a large amount from paying patients. But in the case of Holloway College there does not appear to have ever been an intention to supply gratuitous instruction to any pupil, rich or poor. I say "rich or poor," for I respectfully agree with the observations of Lord Herschell and Lord Macnaghten in Income Tax Commissioners v. Pemsel, to the effect that many charities may exist which are not for the relief of mere pecuniary necessity. The object of the founder of the college was to enable young women "to carry on their sudies after they have left school under specially healthy conditions, and with all the advantages of a collegiate life." Instruction is provided for the degrees of the London University and for the pass and honours examinations at Oxford. The college was opened for work in October, 1887, in buildings erected by Thomas Holloway at his own cost upon land provided by him between the years 1876 and 1883. In the latter year he endowed the college with a sum of £300,000, and directed that sum to be applied for the benefit of the college, in paying off the building debt (if any), in furnishing and equipping the college, in establishing scholarships, exhibitions, and prizes, in paying the salaries of professors and teachers, and otherwise in discharging the domestic and other expenses incurred. The average income from the endowment under that trust and from other benefactions for the last four years has been £7,800 per annum, and is at present largely in excess of the income received from the fees of students, who, however, are rapidly increasing in number. The students pay £90 each a year, which covers all expenses except laundress, medical attendance, fees for university examinations, and individual lessons in special subjects. For this sum each student, no doubt, receives in consequence of the mode in which the endowment fund is used more educational advantages and greater material comforts than could be supplied to her in return for the fees she pays. Does this circumstance make the college a "charity school"? I think not; and I base this opinion, not upon any comparison between the receipts in any particular year from fees and those from endowment, but upon the view which I take of the character of the institution itself. It was not in its origin and never has been of an eleemosynary character, and the mere fact that in a boarding school in which a considerable fee is charged the inmates obtain various advantages and comforts from the endowment is not sufficient, in my opinion, to constitute the school a "charity school." For these reasons I think our judgment in this case must be for the appellant.

Criminal law—Obtaining money by forged instrument—Forged telegram—Forgery Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 98), s. 38.

The prisoner was indicted under section 38 of the Forgery Act, 1861, for obtaining money by means "of a certain forged instrument—to wit, a forged telegram."

It appeared that the prisoner, who was a clerk in a post office, sent to a bookmaker a telegram, by which he offered to bet a sum of money that a certain horse would win a certain race. The telegram purported to have been handed in for transmission before the race was run, and the bookmaker accepted the bet on that footing, and ultimately paid the money. The telegram was in fact sent by the prisoner after the race had been run, and after he had learnt that the horse in question had won.

Held (by Hawkins, Mathew, and Wills, JJ.; Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Vaughan Williams, J., doubting), that the telegram was a forged instrument within the meaning of section 38 of the Forgery Act, 1861, and that the indictment was good.

Case stated by Kennedy, J.

The prisoner Henry Riley was indicted under section 38 of the Forgery Act, 1861, for that he "feloniously did cause and procure to be delivered and paid to one Henry Dorber certain money—to wit, the sum of nine pounds, the property and moneys of George Crompton and Samuel Radcliffe, under, upon, and by virtue of a certain forged instrument—to wit, a forged telegram, that is to say, a forged message and communication purporting to have been delivered at a certain post office—to wit, at Royal Exchange, Manchester, for transmission by telegraph, and to have been transmitted by telegraph to a certain other post office—to wit, the head post office at Manchester, with intent thereby to defraud; the said Henry Riley then well knowing the same forged instrument to be forged against the form, &c."

The prisoner pleaded guilty.

It appeared that the prisoner was a clerk in the telegraph department of the head post office at Manchester. He had obtained from Dorber permission to make bets in his name with Messrs. Crompton & Radcliffe, who were bookmakers with whom Dorber kept an account.

On the 27th of June, 1895, a race known as the Newcastle Handicap was fixed for 2.45 p.m., and a horse named "Lord of Dale" was entered to run in it. On that day the prisoner sent to Crompton & Radcliffe a telegram in the name of Dorber, and in the words "Three pounds Lord of Dale." The telegram was stated on the face of it to have been handed in at the Royal Exchange office at 2.40 p.m., and to have been received at the head office at 2.51 p.m., from which office it was transmitted to Messrs. Crompton & Radcliffe. In fact, the telegram was not handed in at the Royal Exchange office at all, but was sent by the prisoner from the head office after he had received the news that Lord of Dale had won the race.

Crompton & Radcliffe believing that the telegram was sent before the race was run accepted the bet at the current odds of three to one against Lord of Dale, and on hearing that that horse had won credited Dorber with the sum of £9, which would afterwards be paid over by Dorber to the prisoner. No suggestion of fraud was made against Dorber.

Kennedy, J., desired the opinion of the court on the questions: (1) whether the forged telegram was a forged instrument within the meaning of section 38 of the Forgery Act, 1861, and whether the prisoner could be convicted on the indictment above set out? and (2) whether the prisoner by pleading guilty must be taken as admitting the facts appearing on the depositions?

Cur. adv. vult.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Feb. 3.—HAWKINS, J.—The main question for us to decide is whether the telegram upon which this indictment was preferred is a "forged instrument" according to the true interpretation of section 38 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98.

Messrs. Crompton & Radcliffe are bookmakers at Manchester. Their practice is to accept bets on horse races offered them by telegram by persons desirous of backing horses provided that on the face of the telegram it appears to have been handed in by the sender at a time earlier than that fixed for the running of the race upon which the bet is offered.

On the 27th of June last a horse named "Lord of Dale" was about to run in the Newcastle Handicap, and the time fixed for the running of that race was 2.45 p.m. The prisoner, on the afternoon of that day sent to Crompton & Radcliffe in the name of a person named Dorber, a customer of theirs who had authorized the prisoner to use his name, a telegram which on the face of it purported to have been handed in at the Royal Exchange branch post office in Manchester at 2.40 p.m. and to have been received at the head office at Manchester at 2.51 p.m., whence it was sent out to Crompton & Radcliffe. The body of it was in these words "Three pounds Lord of Dale." The starting-price odds against Lord of Dale at the time when the telegram is purported to have been handed in were three to one. This telegram was received by Crompton & Radcliffe at 3.15 p.m. and the bet was accepted by them in the ordinary course. Lord of Dale won the race, and upon the faith that the telegram had been handed in as it purported to have been, Crompton & Radcliffe in due course paid Dorber or allowed him in account the amount won by him—namely, the sum of £9. The telegram was, in fact, not handed in at or sent from the Royal Exchange office at all, but was dispatched by the prisoner from the head office in the form in which it reached Crompton & Radcliffe after the race had been run and won.

It is fair to Dorber to say that it was not suggested that he was a party to that fraud.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 38, "Whosoever with intent to defraud shall demand, receive, or obtain, or cause, or procure to be delivered or paid to any person, or endeavour to receive or obtain or to cause or procure to be delivered or paid to any person any chattel, money, security for money or other property whatever under, upon, or by virtue of any forged or altered instrument whatever, knowing the same to be forged or altered," shall be guilty of felony.

[His lordship then read the indictment, and continued:—] To this indictment the prisoner pleaded guilty, but the learned judge (Kennedy, J.) before whom the case came on to be tried, entertaining a doubt whether the telegram was an instrument within the meaning of section 38, reserved that question for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, and also desired the opinion of the court as to the sufficiency of the indictment.

As to the indictment. Assuming the telegram to be an instrument within the meaning of the 38th section, I think the indictment sufficiently describes it; I consider it would, after a plea of guilty, have been sufficient under section 42 of the Act even had the indictment been for forging the instrument. A fortiori it is so upon this indictment, which is not for forgery but for procuring money to be paid by virtue of a forged instrument. I think it amply sufficient. See Taylor v. The Queen, 43 W. R. 24, [1895] 1 Q. B. 25.

I proceed to discuss the question reserved for our consideration, whether the telegram described in the case constitutes a forged instrument in law, and whether it is such an instrument as is contemplated by section 38?

My answer to both these questions is in the affirmative.

In 4 Blackstone's Commentaries, 8th ed., p. 247, forgery at common law is defined as "the fraudulent making or alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another man's right." I seek for no other definition for the purposes of the present discussion.

That a postal telegram is a writing is to my mind clear. It originates in a written message addressed and signed by the sender and delivered by him into the post office of dispatch for the express purpose that it shall in the very words in which it is penned be transmitted by means of an electric wire to another post office, which I will call the arrival office, and that it shall there, on its arrival, be committed to writing verbatim et literatim, and that such last-mentioned writing shall be handed to the person to whom it is addressed. The writing delivered in at the office of dispatch is the authority of the postmaster to transmit the message, and of the postmaster at the arrival office to commit it to writing and to deliver it to the addressee as the sender's written message to him. This message sent out from the arrival office is, in my opinion, as binding upon the sender as though he had written it with his own hand.

If I am right in this, it follows that an offer by telegram accepted by telegram might well create a contract sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds between the sender and the addressee, and a verbal offer accepted by telegram might create an ordinary contract. For this there is the authority of the Common Pleas so long ago as 1870. See Godwin v. Francis, L. R. 5 C. P. 295, 18 W. R. C. L. Dig. 89.

Assuming the telegram to be such a writing as I have stated, a bare reading of the contents of it, coupled with the admission of its falsity and of the purpose for which it was made, are overwhelming to establish that it was fraudulently made to the prejudice of another man's right—and thus a forgery at common law—for this I need only cite the judgment of Blackburn, J., in Reg. v. Ritson, 18 W. R. 73, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 200: "When an instrument professes to be executed at a date different from that at which it really was executed, and the false date is material to the operation of the deed, if the false date is inserted knowingly and with a fraudulent intent it is a forgery at common law."

In this case, unless the telegram was dated and dispatched before the race was run, it would have been inoperative, the time of dispatch was therefore material; falsely to write the telegram so as to make it appear that it was sent in for dispatch before the race was run when it was not sent in till afterwards, was to make it appear on the face of it to be that which it was not.

The more vexed questions, however, are whether the writing can be treated as an "instrument," and if so, whether it is such an instrument as is contemplated by the 38th section—the contention for the prisoner being that it cannot properly be treated as an instrument at all and that even if it can, the 38th section has reference only to such forged legal or commercial instruments as are mentioned and made felonies in the earlier sections of the statute. After much consideration I have formed an opinion adverse to the prisoner on both these points.

Now, can this telegram properly be called an instrument? I am not aware of any authority for saying that in law the term instrument has ever been confined to any definite class of legal documents. In the absence of such authority I cannot but think the term ought to be interpreted according to its generally understood and ordinary meaning as stated in the dictionaries of Dr. Johnson and of Webster. Both these give definitions first how the word is to be treated when applied to a chattel—viz., as "A tool used for any work or purpose." When applied to a writing Dr. Johnson defines it as "A writing—a writing containing any contract or order." Webster's definition is "A writing expressive of some act, contract, process, or proceeding." When used generally Dr. Johnson speaks of it as "That by means whereof something is done." Webster as "One who or that which is made the means, or caused to serve a purpose." These definitions cover an infinite variety of writings, whether penned for the purpose of creating binding obligations or as records of business or other transactions. Every one of the documents mentioned in the statute is unquestionably an instrument, and intended to be so treated. Throughout the statute it is evident that the Legislature attached no rigid definite meaning to the word, for it is used in a variety of senses all falling within one or other of the definitions of Dr. Johnson and Webster to which I have referred.

Thus in section 1 of the Act, the word is used to signify a document having thereon affixed a counterfeit of the Great Seal. In sections 9-14 the word is used to denote the tool or implement to be used for making a peculiar kind of paper. In sections 16, 17, 18, the word is used to indicate tools for the manufacture of paper plates or implements to be used for carrying out forgeries. In section 21 the expression is "testamentary instrument." In section 29 the word is applied to written or printed documents made evidence by Act of Parliament. In section 33 it is applied to writings purporting to be made by the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, &c. In section 34 it refers to recognizances.

To most of the forged documents mentioned in the sections before section 38, and declared to be felonies, the term "instrument" is not applied at all although no doubt it could be suggested that they are intended to be treated as instruments within the meaning of the Act.

It will not of course be denied that there are very many instruments of an important character, commercial and otherwise, the forgery of which is an offence only at common law. I do not, for instance, find that the forgery of an ordinary written contract (not under seal or specially named in the statute) is a felony. So also a certificate of ordination, though the forgery of it is a mere common law offence, was nevertheless spoken of as an instrument by Blackburn, J., in The Queen v. Morton, 21 W. R. 629, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 22.

I call attention to these undeniable facts for the purpose of showing that there are many written documents of an important character beyond those mentioned in section 38, to which the words "any instrument whatsoever" used in that section, apply in addition to those documents mentioned in the statute.

In my view of the case the telegram in question is an instrument of contract—it is the instrument which completed the wager offered by Crompton & Radcliffe to those who were able and disposed to accept it—see Carlil v. The Carbolic Smoke Ball Co., 41 W. R. 210, [1892] 2 Q. B. 484, [1893] 1 Q. B. 256, and the cases there cited; and thenceforth an obligation was imposed upon each party in honour to fulfil it according to the result of the race. I say in honour, because though it was clearly not an illegal contract it could not be enforced by any legal process.

In virtue of it, and upon the assumption that the telegram was what it purported to be, Messrs. Crompton & Radcliffe paid the £9.

Assuming the document to be an "instrument," I come to the only remaining question, Whether it is such within the meaning of section 38 of the statute. Why should it not be so? It is contended that the section has reference only to such instruments as are mentioned in the earlier sections of the statute, and that section 38 applies only to those forged instruments which are punishable as felonies. Such a construction is, I think, erroneous. There is no definition of the word "instrument" in the statute to fetter us in giving to it the ordinary and general interpretation. It was clearly the intention of the Legislature by section 38 to create a new offence.

If it had been the intention of the Legislature to limit the operation of the section to felonious forgeries, how easy it would have been to use appropriate language for that purpose. So far from doing this the Legislature, having used the term instrument in a variety of senses all falling within one or other of the definitions I have above referred to, proceeds in section 38 to use language which read in its ordinary sense comprises every description of written instrument. What simpler, stronger, or more comprehensive words could they have employed than "any forged or altered instrument whatsoever" to convey an intention that every forged instrument should be covered by it whether the forgery was a felony by statute or a misdemeanour at common law. I think the Legislature intended exactly what it has said, and I feel strengthened in this view by the declaration of Mr. Greaves, Q.C., (who had much to do in the framing of the Criminal Consolidation Acts of which this is one) in that chapter of his work relating to these statutes which treats of the construction of them, wherein he says, "It may be well to add that the word 'whomsoever' is used throughout these Acts in the widest sense so as to include every person capable of becoming a criminal." There is no reason why the word "whatsoever" should not be interpretated in a similar spirit. As to the word "any," he says, "It is also to be used in like manner so as to include every person or thing, or at least every person or thing other than the person or thing previously mentioned." Speaking of the expression "any other" he illustrates its intended interpretation by saying that the words "gunpowder," or any other "explosive substance" in section 19 of the Offences Against the Person Act are intended to include every explosive substance. He points out also in the latter part of that chapter that (for reasons he has given) any argument as to a difference in the intention of the Legislature which may drawn from a difference in the terms of one clause from those in another will be of no weight in the construction of such clauses. Moreover, in a note to the section now under consideration, he says, "This clause is intended to embrace every case of demanding, &c., any property whatsoever upon forged instruments."

I think no argument against the interpretation I have put upon section 38 can be derived from the section immediately following, for it expressly limits the operation of that section to statutory forgeries by enacting that whether such forgeries are created by that or any other Act the person charged with them may be indicted as offenders against that Act. Again, in section 40, the operation of which is confined to statutory forgeries, it is expressly and unmistakably so limited. Section 41 deals with the question of venue in all cases of forgery, expressly stating that it shall apply to all forgeries whether by statute or common law. Section 42 deals with what shall be a sufficient description in an indictment of "any instrument" charged as a forgery, while section 44 which makes it unnecessary to allege an intent to defraud any particular person, admittedly covers forgeries of every description without any exception, and expresses that intention by the very same words used in section 38 "any instrument whatsoever." Is it possible that the Legislature, who were clearly alive to the difference between common law and statutory felonies, can have intended that a different construction should be put on these same words when used in section 38?

The result is that, in my opinion, the conviction ought to be affirmed.

In regard to a question suggested in the case whether a person by pleading guilty to an indictment thereby admits the truth of the fact stated in the depositions, I think it right to express my opinion that he does not. He admits simply that he is guilty of the offence as charged in the instrument, and nothing more.

WILLS, J. — The only question in this case is whether a post-office telegram is an "instrument" within the meaning of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 38.

After a careful study of the Act I am of opinion that it is so. The Act is not very artistically drawn, and the words "instrument," "document," and "writing" are used in a manner which makes it sometimes difficult at first sight to say whether a real distinction is intended by the use of different words. Sections 1-26, 28, 30, 32, 35, 36, 37, and 40 all relate to instruments or documents of various kinds known by definite designations, and so described. They therefore throw no light upon the present question.

Section 27 relates to the forgery of "documents" or "writings" intended to be used in evidence. Any writing so used would, in ordinary legal phraseology, be called part of the documentary evidence in the case, and probably this section would have been construed as including every description of writing so used if the words "or writing" had been omitted.

Section 29 relates to forgery of "instruments" made evidence by Act of Parliament; this could only apply to writings of a more or less formal character, but this limitation follows from the subject matter of the clause rather than from the use of the word "instrument."

Section 31 relates to the forgery of "documents" or "writings" made or issued under the provision of any Act of Parliament. The same remark applies; such "documents or writings" must necessarily be of a more or less formal character, and the phrase "document or writing" in this section would appear to mean exactly the same thing as "instrument" in section 29.

The same remark applies to section 33, where the corresponding phrase is "instrument or writing." In section 34 the word "instrument" must, from the nature of the enactment, refer to writings of a formal character.

In section 39, which relates to the forgery of "instruments or writings" designated in Acts of Parliament by any particular name or description, it is obvious that the meaning of the clause would have been exactly the same if the words "or writings" had been omitted.

Sections 40-45 are a group of enactments for facilitating procedure and obviating mere technical difficulties. There is no reason why they should not have the widestc onstruction and be applied to every kind of offence, which either by statute or at the common law constitutes a forgery. On the contrary, there is every reason why sections inserted for the purpose of advancing justice by getting rid of mere useless technicalities should be applied to forgeries of every description. Some of these sections are older than the Act of 1861. In all that is material to the present discussion, section 42, which makes it unnecessary in the indictment to do more than describe the forged writing by any designation by which it may be generally known, is a repetition of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 5; and section 44, which makes it unnecessary to specify more than an intent to defraud generally, is a repetition of section 8 of the same Act. In section 42 the expression used is "any instrument," and in section 44 "any instrument whatever." My own experience in drawing indictments goes back to 1851, and, in my experience, since that time it has been the practice to treat sections 42 and 44 as applying to forgeries at common law as well as to statutory forgeries. Inquiry has satisfied me that the experience of others widely conversant with the subject agrees with my own. The phrase used in section 38, under which the present question arises, is "any instrument whatsoever." There can be no difference in meaning between this phrase and either of those used in sections 42 and 44. It would be most unwise to throw a doubt upon the correctness of the interpretation put ever since 14 & 15 Vict. upon the words used in sections 42 and 44, nor is there the slightest ground for doing so; and the only question is whether there is any more reason for restricting the meaning of "instrument" in section 38 than there is in those sections. I can see none. It seems to me obvious that the words "instrument," "document," and "writing" have not been selected for any particular logical reason to be used in any particular section, and that whether they are to have a restricted or a general sense must be gathered from the nature of the particular enactment. I have pointed out some sections where the context does necessarily restrict the application, but there it is rather the application than the meaning that is so narrowed.

Section 38 provides that "whosoever with intent to defraud shall demand, receive, or obtain, or procure to be delivered or paid to any person, or endeavour to receive or obtain, or to cause or procure to be delivered or paid to any person any chattel, money, security for money, or other property whatsoever under, upon, or by virtue of any forged or altered instrument whatsoever, knowing the same to be forged or altered, or under, upon, or by virtue of any probate or letters of administration, knowing the will, testament, codicil, or testamentary writing on which such probate or letters of administration shall have been obtained to have been forged or altered, or knowing such probate or letters of administration to have been obtained by any false oath, affirmation, or affidavit, shall be guilty of felony and liable to penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years."

The essence of this section appears to be that where property has been obtained not merely by false pretences, but by false pretences into which forgery or its equivalent enters, the offence shall be constituted a felony, and may involve much severer punishment than either the mere obtaining of money by false pretences or a mere forgery at common law.

I cannot see anything in the nature of such a section which should make it necessary or desirable to restrict the application of the word "instrument" to writings of a formal character, and I think it is meant to include writings of every description if false and known to be false by the person who makes use of them for the purpose indicated.

The severity of the possible punishment has been appealed to as a reason for restricting the application of the section to documents of a mere formal character or documents having in themselves some legal operation. The argument appears to me to have no weight. The section embraces cases involving forgeries which may be of a very heinous nature, such as forgeries of wills or letters of administration. There is no minimum of punishment, and the limits of discretion are not unreasonable. Theoretically a boy may be sent to penal servitude for five years for stealing an apple, and that though it be his first offence, and the limits of discretion in cases of many offences, whether triable at quarter sessions or at assizes only, are equally large. No violence is done by this construction to the use of the word "instrument." In Coogan's case, reported at length in 2 East. P. C. 949, Buller, J., defined forgery at common law as the "making of a false instrument with intent to deceive." Blackstone, J., defines forgery as "the fraudulent making or alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another's right" (4 Com. 246). It is plain that in these definitions "instrument" and writing are synonymous. East, himself a writer of considerable authority, defines forgery in one passage as "a false making, a making malo animo, of any written instrument for the purpose of fraud and deceit" (2 P. C. 852), and in another passage as "the counterfeiting of any writing with a fraudulent intent whereby another may be prejudiced" (ibid. 861). It is obvious that the writer in these passages treats "instruments" and "writings" as for the present purpose synonymous.

For these reasons I am clear that the conviction must be affirmed.

I think, further, that even if the true construction of the word "instrument" required a more restricted meaning, the telegram in the present case would fall within it. It was a writing which, if accepted and acted upon, would establish a business relation, and lead directly to business dealings with another person. It is true that the dealings were of such a nature that they led to no legal rights, and could not be made the foundation of an action. But they were not forbidden by law, and in that sense and to that extent were legitimate. A post-office telegram is issued by a public department in the course of business, and in the present case the telegram appears to me to have sufficient formality, both in its origin and in the use to which it was put, to deserve the name of an "instrument." The only hesitation I have in saying so is lest it should appear to imply any lingering doubt in my own mind as to the correctness of the wide meaning I have given in the principal part of my judgment to the word "instrument." I have no doubt or hesitation about the matter, and I notice the second point only because it was argued before us.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—I have only one observation to make on the two judgments which have been read. It is obvious that the case is not of general importance, though it is of importance to this particular prisoner, because it is clear that the prisoner committed an act of forgery at common law. It is also clear that he committed a serious misdemeanour within the Telegraph Act, and, probably, also clear that he committed the offence of obtaining money by false pretences. I do not dissent from the judgments which have been read, but I share the doubts which are expressed in the judgment of my brother Vaughan Williams.

MATHEW, J., concurred in the judgment of the majority of the court.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I concur in the opinion that the defendant on the facts of this case was guilty of counterfeiting a writing with intent to defraud, and, therefore, of forgery by the common law, but I do not think he was guilty of any statutory forgery or that the telegram sent falls within the description of any of the written instruments, the forgery of which is made felony by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, but I propose to make some observations on the question whether the defendant was guilty of an offence within section 38 of that statute.

This question turns on the meaning in section 38 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98 of the words "any instrument whatever." Do these words mean any writing whatever or ought these words to be read subject to some, and what, limitations? Two possible limitations occur to me. (a) That "instrument" must be read, not as including all writings, but only such writings as contain a contract, order, or legal act of the writer; (b) that "instrument" in section 38 means a writing, the forgery of which is made a felonious forgery in the preceding sections.

The statute is a consolidating and amending Act relating to indictable offences by forgery, i.e., consolidating and amending the statute law relating to offences which are made forgery by statute. The greater part of the sections are culled from older statutes and put as it were on a statutory file. In construing such sections I do not think one ought to let the meaning of a word in one section affect the construction in another section unless the sections are plainly connected.

As to limiting the word "instrument" to contracts, orders, and legal acts, I do not think that the meaning to be attached to the word in the various sections of the Act affords any guide to the meaning of the word in section 38. The meaning is sometimes the limited meaning, sometimes the wide meaning. The meaning, however, in each case is to be derived from the collocation of the word with the provisions of the particular section. The use of the word "instrument" in this Act as a whole does not in any case seem to afford any assistance. I mention this because undue stress seems to me attached to the use of the word instrument in section 42.

I think one must construe the words "any instrument whatever" in section 38 in reference to their collocation in section 38, and not in reference to the uses of the word "instrument" in other sections of the Act; but applying this guide of construction I find nothing to lead me to the conclusion that "instrument" in that section is limited to writings containing a contract or legal act.

Secondly, as to limiting "any instrument whatever" to writings the forgery of which is made felony by the preceding sections, it will be observed that the first thirty-eight sections deal with the forgery of specific instruments, writings, or matters, or with matters connected with each such offence—each group of sections is introduced with a heading—e.g., "as to forging deeds, wills, and bills of exchange." Section 38 itself is headed: "As to demanding property upon forged instruments." The sections following section 38 are headed "as to other matters." Do the words "by virtue of any forged instrument whatever" in section 38 mean "by virtue of any of the forged instruments dealt with in the preceding sections"? Do they refer exclusively to the offences created by the Act? I am inclined to think that this is the true construction, remembering that we are construing a penal statute. The subject of the Act up to section 38 has been statutory—forgery—i.e., felonious forgery. "This section creates an offence with reference to forged instruments," does it not mean any instrument whatever of those the forgery of which is made felony by this Act? One reason for attributing this meaning is that the offence of demanding property upon forged instruments is made felony; this is quite reasonable if the forgery of the instrument itself with intent to defraud is made felony, but it seems unreasonable in a case where the forgery with intent to defraud of the writing itself is not felony, to make the demanding property upon it felony. It seems unreasonable to make what may be the lesser offence felony when what may be the graver offence is not felony. On the whole I think that section 38 is the supplement of the preceding sections, and that "instrument" must be limited to instrument (using the word in its widest sense) the subject of the preceding sections. But although this is the inclination of my mind I am not prepared to differ if the majority of the judges think otherwise.

HARDAKER AND OTHERS v. IDLE DISTRICT COUNCIL AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Negligence—Principal and agent—District council—Contractor—Damage—Remoteness.

A district council employed a contractor to construct a sewer in a public thoroughfare. The contractor in constructing the sewer, negligently left a gaspipe in use unsupported, so that the pipe broke, and gas escaped therefrom into the plaintiffs' house, and an explosion occurred, whereby the plaintiffs suffered damage.

Held, that there was a duty on the district council to so construct the sewer as not to cause damage to the public; that the district council might delegate that duty to a contractor, but if the contractor failed to perform the duty, the district council were liable for the damage resulting from such failure.

Held, also, that the damages claimed were not too remote.

Application by the plaintiffs for judgment or for a new trial.

The action was brought by a husband and wife against the Idle District Council and Abraham Thornton, a contractor, for having in the construction of a sewer been guilty of negligence by omitting to keep a gaspipe supported, so that it became fractured and the gas escaped into the plaintiffs' house and exploded, whereby the male plaintiff's furniture in his house was wrecked and the female plaintiff was injured.

The facts were as follows:—"On the 10th of October, 1894, the district council gave notice, under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 150, to the male plaintiff to make a sewer in Moorfield-place, he being the occupier of a house abutting thereon; and, as the notice was not complied with, the council, as they lawfully might do under the provisions of the section, proceeded to execute the works mentioned in the notice.

The district council employed the defendant Thornton to execute the work.

By the contract made between Thornton and the district council it was agreed that the contractor should execute the works in the most workmanlike and substantial manner, particular attention being paid to any directions or instructions which the inspector appointed by the council to superintend the work might from time to time give as the works proceeded. Power was given to the inspector, in the event of the contractor's foreman or his workmen disobeying his orders, to forthwith discharge them, and also to stop the works at any stage, and to enlarge, diminish, modify, or vary the works, or any part thereof, which, however, was not to annul the contract. It was further agreed that the care of the entire works, until completed, should remain with the contractor, who should be responsible for all accidents and damage to persons or property arising from the works, and that the contractor should protect all gaspipes which might be laid bare or otherwise interfered with.

It was proved that the contractor had been guilty of negligence by insecurely packing the soil around a gaspipe in use after the excavation had been made for the sewer, whereby the gaspipe was broken and the gas escaped.

Wright, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs against the contractor for £45, but held that there was no case against the district council.

The plaintiffs in their present application contended that the district council were also liable.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Longstaffe, for the plaintiffs.

Kershaw, Q.C., and Waugh, for the defendants the district council.

The arguments of counsel and the authorities referred to are fully stated in the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 17.—LINDLEY, L.J., read the following judgment, in which, after stating the facts and reading the material clauses of the contract, and sections 150 and 160 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and sections 22 and 79 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1874, he proceeded as follows:—

The powers conferred by the Public Health Act, 1875, on the local board can only be exercised by some person or person acting under their authority. Those persons may be servants of the local board or they may not. The local board are not bound in point of law to do the work themselves—i.e., by servants of their own. There is nothing to prevent the local board from employing a contractor to do their work for them. But the local board cannot, by employing a contractor, get rid of their own duty to other people, whatever such duty may be. If the contractor performs their duty for them, it is performed by them through him, and they are not responsible for anything more. They are not responsible for his negligence in other respects as they would be if he were their servant. Such negligence is sometimes called casual or collateral negligence. If, on the other hand, their contractor fails to do what it is their duty to do or get done, their duty is not performed and they are responsible accordingly.

This principle lies at the root of the modern decisions on the subject, and the distinction between the two classes of cases is well illustrated by comparing Reedie v. London and North Western Railway Co., L. R. 4 Ex. 244, with Hole v. Sittingbourne and Sheerness Railway Co., 9 W. R. 274, 6 H. & N. 488. In the first of these cases the defendants employed a contractor to build a bridge. One of his men carelessly let a stone fall on the plaintiff, and the defendants were held not liable. In the second of these cases the defendants' duty was to build a bridge which would open and let vessels pass. They employed a contractor, who built a bridge which would not open; the plaintiff was injured thereby, and the defendants were held liable for the consequences. The principle to which I am referring is further illustrated by Pickard v. Smith, 10 C. B. N. S. 470, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 59, the coal-cellar case; Gray v. Pullen, 13 W. R. 257, 5 B. & S. 970, where the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the Court of Queen's Bench, held the employer of a contractor liable for injury caused to the plaintiff by the contractor's failure to make good a pavement under which he had constructed a drain. Blackburn, J., at the trial, and the Court of Queen's Bench, held the defendant not liable, on the ground that he was not responsible for the negligence of the contractor in doing the work. But on appeal it was held that it was the defendant's duty to fill up the drain or to see that it was filled up, and that he was liable for the non-performance of this duty. Lord Chelmsford in Wilson v. Merry, L. R. 1, H. L. Sc. App. 326, expressed doubt as to the correctness of decision, but I cannot find that it has ever been overruled or considered unsatisfactory by any other judge. The same principle was again applied in Tarry v. Ashton, 24 W. R. 581, 1 Q. B. D. 314, the case of the lamp on the defendant's property which fell on the plaintiff whilst passing under it.

So again in Bower v. Peate, 1 Q. B. D. 321, 24 W. R. Dig. 226; Dalton v. Angus, 30 W. R. 191, 6 App. Cas. 740; Hughes v. Percival, 31 W. R. 725, 8 App. Cas. 443, in all of which the defendant's contractor let down the plaintiff's wall. In each of these cases the defendant was held responsible, because it was his duty not to let the wall down, and to take whatever care was necessary to prevent injury from what he was doing.

Black v. Christchurch Finance Co. (Limited), [1894] A. C. 48, in the Privy Council, is the last case on the subject, and there a landowner who had employed a contractor to burn the bush on his land was held liable for his negligence in burning it so as to be unable to stop the spread of the fire on to the land of the plaintiffs.

It is not always easy to avoid mistakes in applying this, or, indeed, any other principle, to difficult cases, as is shown by Gray v. Pullen and Butler v. Hunter, 10 W. R. 214, 7 H. & N. 826, which is inconsistent with Bower v. Peate, but was distinctly disapproved in Hughes v. Percival. Neither is it easy to express the principle in terms which will apply to all cases, as is shown by Lord Blackburn's criticisms in Hughes v. Percival, when referring to Bower v. Peate and Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499, the well-known jobmaster's case. I will take the law, however, as laid down by Lord Blackburn in Dalton v. Angus. Lord Blackburn there said: "Ever since Quarman v. Burnett it has been considered settled law that one employing another is not liable for his collateral negligence unless the relations of master and servant existed between them. So that a person employing a contractor to do work is not liable for the negligence of that contractor or his servants. On the other hand, a person causing something to be done, the the doing of which casts on him a duty, cannot escape from the responsibility attaching on him of seeing that duty performed by delegating it to a contractor. He may bargain with the contractor that he shall perform the duty, and stipulate for an indemnity from him if it is not performed; but he cannot thereby relieve himself from liability to those injured by the failure to perform it. Hole v. Sittingbourne and Sheerness Railway Co., Pickard v. Smith, Tarry v. Ashton." Lord Blackburn in this passage contrasts a contractor's negligence, which he calls collateral, with failure on the part of a contractor to perform the duty of his employer. For the first the employer is not liable; for the second he is, whether the failure is attributable to negligence or not. Lord Blackburn's language in Hughes v. Percival shows that this is what he really meant, for he points out that the employer's duty was to see that his contractor did his work properly. Lord Watson said the same.

I pass now to consider the duty of the district council in the present case. Their duty in sewering the street was not performed by constructing a proper sewer. Their duty was not only to do that, but also to take care not to break any gaspipes which they cut under; this involved properly supporting them. This duty was not performed. They employed a contractor to perform their duty for them, but he failed to do so. It is impossible, I think, to regard this as a case of collateral negligence. The case is not one in which the contractor performed the district council's duty for them, but did so carelessly; the case is one in which the duty of the district council, so far as the gaspipes were concerned, was not performed at all. The case falls within the second of Lord Blackburn's propositions, and not within the first. It was contended for the district council that, although they might be liable to the owner of the gaspipes, they were not liable to the plaintiff as they were under no duty to him. But this is not consistent with Gray v. Pullen nor with Tarry v. Ashton, in neither of which was the defendant under any duty to the plaintiff, except as one of the public. On these grounds I am of opinion that the district council are liable to the plaintiffs.

Mr. Kershaw, on behalf of the district council, contended that the relation of the district council to Thornton was that of master and servant. Of course, if this were so, the liability of the district council would be clear enough. But I am of opinion that this contention cannot be supported. It is not proved that the surveyor gave orders which led to the mischief; and, large as his powers were, Thornton was not, in my opinion, the servant of the defendants. Reedie v. London and North-Western Railway Co., and Steel v. South-Eastern Railway Co., 16 C. B. 550, 3 W. R. C. L. Dig. 154, support this conclusion.

With respect to the remoteness of damage, little need be said. The nature of gas, its certainty to escape and to find its way where ever it can get, and to explode if it escapes in large quantities and comes into contact with fire, all render the breaking of a gas main very dangerous if houses are near. The fact, moreover, that free escape upwards through the surface was greatly hindered by the hardness of the surface after it was left by the contractor would force the gas laterally to some considerable distance, and very probably into some passage or place near a fire. Such an accident as that which eventually happened is only what was reasonably to be expected. Sharp v. Powell, 20 W. R. 584, L. R. 7 C. P. 253, does not, therefore, apply to the present case. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed, and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff for £45 and the costs of the action; and the district council must pay the costs of the appeal.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment, in which, after stating the facts as above set out, he proceeded as follows:—

The question now is whether the defendants, the district council, are liable to the plaintiffs for this negligent act of their contractor and its consequences. In order to render a person liable for an act of negligence which he did not himself commit, it must be shown by the person injured either that the person sought to be made liable authorized the act of negligence complained of, or that it was committed by his servant in the course of his employment, or that he owed such a duty to the person injured that he could not, by delegating its performance to a contractor, rid himself of that duty. I pass by a liability which may be imposed upon an owner or occupier of land for injury to another occasioned by the use of his land, which will be found referred to by Parke, B., in his judgment in Rapson v. Cubitt, 9 M. & W. 710. It was not contended at the bar that this liability had any application to the case in hand; and, indeed, if it had, it would impose a very onerous obligation upon local authorities, which, so far as I know, has never before been attempted to be imposed upon them when executing works by their contractor in a public street.

In the present case, in my judgment, the relationship of master and servant did not exist between the council and Thornton, for the true relationship was that of principal and contractor. It is true that the district council by their inspector had the right of fully superintending and supervising the execution of the works and giving directions thereon, but the cases of Steel v. South-Eastern Railway Co. and Reedie v. London and North-Western Railway Co. show that these circumstances do not of themselves render a principal liable for the negligent act of his contractor unless brought about by the order of the inspector. If the fracture of the gaspipe in this case had been caused by reason of the orders of the district council's inspector, that would have rendered the district council liable; for, as between the district council and the inspector the relationship of master and servant existed, and for his acts within the scope of his employment the council would be liable; but no proof was given that the fracture was occasioned by anything the inspector either said or did. If the inspector was guilty of any negligent omission, that was a breach of duty he owed to his employers, not to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs have not shown that the district council authorized the act of negligence complained of, nor that the contractor and the district council stood in the relation of servant and master.

But the important question still remains whether the plaintiffs have not shown that the district council owed such a duty towards them that the council could not, by delegating that duty to a contractor, thereby escape liability thereon should the contractor be guilty of negligence in the performance of the work he had contracted to execute. In the case of Dalton v. Angus, 6 App. Cas., at p. 829, Lord Blackburn states the law applicable to a case like the present thus—he said: "Ever since Quarman v. Burnett it has been considered settled law that one employing another is not liable for his collateral negligence unless the relation of master and servant existed between them; so that a person employing a contractor to do work is not liable for the negligence of that contractor or his servants. On the other hand, a person causing something to be done the doing of which casts on him a duty, cannot escape from the responsibility attaching on him of seeing the duty performed, by delegating it to a contractor. He may bargain with a contractor that he shall perform the duty and stipulate for an indemnity from him if it is not performed; but he cannot thereby relieve himself from liability to those injured by the failure to perform it."

Lord Blackburn, it will be seen here, points to two distinct cases; the one where the cause of action is founded upon the negligence either of the servant acting within the scope of his employment, or of a contractor; and the other where it is founded upon a breach of duty which a person could not escape the performance of by delegation to another. As illustrations of this duty I refer to that class of cases of which Hole v. Sittingbourne Railway Co., Pickard v. Smith, Tarry v. Ashton, and Gray v. Pullen (in error) are instances in which it was held that a duty was imposed by law upon the defendant towards the plaintiff as one of the public not to interfere with the right which the plaintiff possessed of using a public way so as to impede or injure him when passing; and also to that class of cases exemplified by Bower v. Peate and Dalton v. Angus, in which it was held that a legal duty was imposed upon the defendants towards the plaintiff not to interfere with the right he possessed of having his land supported by that of the defendant. In each of these cases it was held that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for breach of the duty thus imposed upon him, although the act which caused the injury was the act and default of the defendant's contractor and not of the defendant. The ratio decidendi of these cases is that as the duty was imposed by law upon the defendant, he could not escape this liability by delegating its performance to a contractor, for the obligation imposed upon the defendant was to take the necessary precautions to see the duty was performed. If there were no other legal duty upon the defendant council than that which appears in the above-mentioned cases, inasmuch as the defendant council have invaded no right either of transit or of support to which the plaintiffs were antecedently entitled, I should have thought that the plaintiff would have had difficulty in bringing the defendant council within these authorities; but this I need not determine, for there is another duty imposed by law upon the defendant council in the circumstances of this case, which in my judgment settles the question. Lord Watson, in Dalton v. Angus, 6 App. Cas., at p. 831, states it thus: "When an employer contracts for the performance of work, which properly conducted can occasion no risk to his neighbour's house, which he is under obligation to support, he is not liable for damage arising from the negligence of the contractor. But in cases where the work is necessarily attended with risk, he cannot free himself from liability by binding the contractor to take effectual precautions. He is bound, as in a question with the party injured, to see that the contract is performed, and is therefore liable as well as the contractor to repair any damage which may be done." When the decision of the House of Lords in Hughes v. Percival is rightly understood, and the judgment in the Privy Council in Black v. Christchurch Finance Co., Limited, is considered, it appears to me clear that in the circumstances of this case a duty was imposed upon the defendant council which they could not evade by employing a contractor to do the work. What this duty is was thus formulated by the Queen's Bench Division in Bower v. Peate (Cockburn, L.C.J., Mellor and Field, JJ.) in the year 1876, in which the Lord Chief Justice, delivering the judgment of the Court, said: "The answer to the defendant's contention may, however, as it appears to us, be placed on a broader ground—namely, that a man who orders a work to be executed, from which in the natural course of things injurious consequences to his neighbour must be expected to arise, unless means are adopted by which such consequences may be prevented, is bound to see to the doing of that which is necessary to prevent the mischief, and cannot relieve himself of his responsibility by employing someone else, whether it be the contractor employed to do the work from which the danger arises, or some independent person to do what is necessary to prevent the act he has ordered to be done from becoming wrongful."

It must be noted that in Hughes v. Percival Lord Blackburn, 8 App. Cas., at p. 447, doubted whether this duty was not too broadly stated, for he said: "If taken in the full sense of the words it would seem to render a person who orders post-horses and a coachman from an inn bound to see that the coachman, though not his servant but that of the innkeeper, uses the skill and care which is necessary when driving the coach to prevent mischief to the passengers." It is not for me to criticize this statement of Lord Blackburn, but with all respect I would point out that it seems to me not to be in the natural course of things to be expected, when a man hires post-horses and a coachman from an innkeeper, that injurious consequences would arise to his neighbour unless means are adopted to prevent them. In the ordinary course of events no injuries would occur to any one. The driver would drive and the hirer ride in the carriage, and in ordinary course the transit would come to an end without injury to any one. Now, the facts in Hughes v. Percival upon which judgment was given, as ascertained by the House of Lords, were these. The defendant had employed a contractor to take down his house, which stood between the plaintiff's house and the house of B., and to erect a new house for him upon the old site. In performing this work the contractor negligently cut into the party wall between the defendant's house and that of B., which caused the defendant's house to fall, which caused the injury complained of to the plaintiff's house. The question arose whether the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for the negligent act of his contractor. No question of the plaintiff having any right to support from the defendant's house arose in that case. It was held that the defendant was liable upon the ground that the work ordered by the defendant was necessarily attended with risk to the plaintiff's house, and that it was therefore the defendant's duty to see that proper precautions were taken to prevent injury to the plaintiff. Lord Blackburn (8 App. Cas., at p. 447) says: "The question is narrowed to this, Was the operation during which the defendant's duty required him to see that reasonable care and skill should be used, over at the time when those engaged in the work cut into the party wall between the defendant's house and B." Lord Watson, at p. 449, says: "The appellant (or defendant) does not deny that many of the operations which he contemplated, and which he had employed a contractor to execute, were such as would necessarily or possibly imperil the stability of the party wall if no precautions were used, nor does he dispute that it was incumbent upon him to see that these operations were safely carried out by the contractor. What he did (by his counsel) allege and offer to prove before the jury was that these hazardous operations had been brought to a safe termination months before the occurrence which resulted in damage to the plaintiff's house." Lord Fitzgerald, at p. 455, says: "What is the law applicable? What was the defendant's duty? The law has been verging somewhat in the direction of treating parties engaged in such an operation as the defendant's as insurers of their neighbours or warranting them against injury. It has not, however, reached quite to that point. It does declare that under such a state of circumstances it was the duty of the defendant to have used every reasonable precaution that care and skill might suggest in the execution of his works so as to protect his neighbours from injury, and that he cannot get rid of the responsibility cast upon him by transferring the duty to another." The learned lords finding as a fact, as indeed the majority of the Court of Appeal had found, that the hazardous operation was not over, when the negligent acts of the contractor had taken place, held the defendant liable for the negligent act of his contractor, the defendant not having therefore performed his duty to the plaintiff.

The recent case of Black v. Christchurch Finance Co. was decided upon the same principle, and is pertinent to the present case. In that case the plaintiff sued the defendant for damages by reason of having had his crops burnt by a fire lighted upon the defendants' land by their contractor, which spread on to the plaintiff's land. It was found by the court below, which finding was adopted by the Privy Council, that the defendants had contracted with a contractor to clear certain bushes off their lands partly by cutting the bushes and partly by burning them, and that, pursuant to such contract, the contractor lighted the fire which subsequently spread on to the plaintiff's land and caused the injuries complained of. The Privy Council, upon these facts, held the defendants liable upon the ground that the lighting of a fire on open bush land, where it might readily spread to adjoining property was an operation necessarily attended with danger, and a proprietor who executed such an operation was bound to use all reasonable precautions to prevent fire extending to his neighbour's property, and if he authorized another to act for him he was bound not only to stipulate that such precautions should be taken, but also to see that these are observed, otherwise he was responsible for the consequences, and the case of Hughes v. Percival was cited in support of this proposition.

Applying the principle laid down in these cases it appears to me that the district council in the present case owed the above-mentioned duty to the plaintiffs, and they have not performed it. Digging under gaspipes in use must necessarily be attended with risk unless all reasonable precautions are taken to guard against such risk. If a gaspipe be left unsupported it is obvious that it may thus become fractured, when an escape of gas with its attendant consequences will necessarily result, and, indeed, it is obvious from clauses 14, 45, and 46 of the contract in this case that risk was apprehended, for specific clauses were inserted therein so as to obviate the danger. It was not attempted to be proved on behalf of the district council that they had taken any precautions whatever, the sole point taken at the trial on their behalf was that they had delegated the performance of the works to a contractor, and therefore were not liable, and upon that they asked the learned judge to enter judgment for them, which he did.

It was argued before us that even if the learned judge should not have done so and the district council were liable, the damages sought to be recovered were too remote, and the case of Sharp v. Powell was referred to as showing that this was so. In that case it was not known to the defendant's servant (and I apprehend the court concluded that it was not to be held that he ought to have known), who was washing a van in the street, that the water he was using would not as usual run down a grating which was there for that purpose, and so escape; whereas it did not, by reason of a severe frost which existed, so that the grating got blocked with ice and the water overflowed, whereby the plaintiff's horse slipped and was injured. If in the present case it was not in the ordinary course of things if a gaspipe were broken, and the gas allowed to escape therefrom underneath a battered down surface, that it would percolate where it could and escape upwards upon the first opportunity, then the case cited might have some application; but in my opinion the explosion in the present case was the direct consequence of the act of negligence complained of, and occurred in the ordinary course of events attendant thereon which would be known to any one of intelligence who cared to think about the matter.

For these reasons alone the district council are, in my judgment, liable, and the learned judge should not have acceded to their application and entered judgment for them.

This appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the plaintiff against the defendant council with costs here and below.

RIGBY, L.J., read the following judgment:—In my judgment the defendants, the District Council of Idle, are liable to the plaintiffs in this action. I mention, in order to dispose of it at once, the objection that the damages claimed are too remote. The cause of action was an explosion of gas, which escaped from a main broken by the negligence of the defendant Thornton whilst excavating or filling up a sewer. The gas found its way into the house occupied by the plaintiffs and was there ignited. On the question of remoteness the case would have been the same if the gas company had negligently caused the escape. In my opinion the explosion in the plaintiff's house was the natural and probable result of the negligence. Gas will find its way by the line of least resistance, and in this case it was prevented by the ramming down of the earth from escaping into the open air. Where it would go could not have been predicted without examination of the surrounding soil, but that it might find its way to some place, where, being mixed with atmospheric air, it would be in great risk of being exploded, so as to do damage to person or property, was not only possible but in a high degree probable and quite natural. That place happened to be the plaintiff's house, and damage resulted, which, in my judgment, was not too remote.

Apart from the question of remoteness, the only defence set up on the appeal was that the defendant Thornton was an independent contractor for whose negligence the district council were not liable. I will assume, at first, that he was an independent contractor. His interference with the street would have been illegal but for the fact that he was acting as the agent and delegate of the district council of Idle, who, having power to do the work under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and other statutory provisions, employed Thornton to do it for them, so that he entered by reason of their authority and their authority only. If they had done the work by the hands of their servants it cannot be doubted that it would have been their duty to use all reasonable skill and care to prevent damage to any persons arising from their operations. The plaintiffs were, as the event proved, within the range of those operations and not too remotely connected with them, and the duty would have been owed to them among others.

Notwithstanding a great conflict of judicial opinion, many dicta and some decisions to the contrary, I consider it always to have been on the balance of authority and to be now clearly recognised as the law, that no one can get rid of such a duty by imposing it upon an independent contractor. As authorities it is sufficient to refer to the passage from the opinion of Lord Blackburn in Dalton v. Angus, already quoted by Lindley, L.J., the cases therein mentioned, and as approaching more nearly in its facts to the present case and in principle not to be distinguished from it: Gray v. Pullen.

The true distinction between the cases of master and servant, and employer and independent contractor, seems to be that, where the person actually doing the work does something for which he would himself be liable, the master is, whilst the employer is not liable for what is conveniently called collateral negligence, meaning thereby other negligence than the imperfect and improper performance of the work which the contractor is employed to do.

Here the contract in express terms imposed upon the contractor the duty of taking proper precautions against injury to any gaspipe that he might fall in with in the course of the excavation, the very duty (among others) which the law would have thrown upon the district council if acting by the hands of their servants. I am, however, for myself satisfied that under the contract in this case Thornton and his workpeople were for the purposes of the rule of law imposing liability for the negligence of servants on a master, in the position of servants of the district council. Under clauses 7 and 8 of the contract, as I read them, Thornton, his foreman, and workmen are bound to defer to the instructions and opinion of the inspector and obey his orders in every particular. Under clause 11 the inspector has power to stop the works or any part thereof absolutely at any stage and to enlarge, diminish, modify, alter, or vary the works or any part thereof without invalidating the contract. Clause 14 provides expressly that the contractor shall, as between himself and the district council, be responsible for any neglect or carelessness in terms apparently sufficient to cover any breach of duty which would be imposed by law on the district council, including particularly the protection of any gaspipes laid bare or otherwise interfered with; but this would not affect the nature of the relations between the parties. Independently of the wide general provisions before referred to it is made plain by clauses 45 and 46 with regard to gas and water pipes that the inspector is to have full control over the means adopted for the protection of gaspipes. In fact I have not been able to discover any single particular in which the contractor can act with greater freedom or independence than a hired servant could do. It is this unlimited right of control whether actually exercised or not which in my opinion is the condition for conferring the responsibility of a master.

The case is manifestly widely different from Reedie v. London and North-Western Railway Co., where a power of superintendence only, was reserved, coupled with a power to dismiss any workmen not for disobedience to orders, but for incompetence only, a power analogous to that of rejecting improper materials during the progress of work and not depriving the contractor of his right of doing the work according to his own initiative so long as he did it in accordance with his contract. It is distinguishable also from the case of Steel v. South-Eastern Railway Co., where the contract was not produced, but the foreman of the contractor speaking of Mr. Phillips, the company's surveyor, said, "Mr. Phillips was the person who told me what to do, but I was the responsible person to determine in what manner that which Mr. Phillips directed me to do should be carried out." The damage in that case was caused by negligence in doing work that was not only not ordered but positively forbidden to be done.

On all these grounds I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiffs against the district council according to verdict of the jury.

BAYNES v. LLOYD. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant for title—Implied covenant—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Demise.

In a lease for a term of years there is, in the absence of the word "demise," no implied covenant for title. Where there is an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment, such covenant only operates during the continuance of the lessor's estate.

Decision of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., 43 W. R. 524, affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J. (reported 43 W. R. 524).

The plaintiffs in this action sought to recover damages for breach of an implied covenant for title, and, in the alternative, for breach of an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment.

The said covenants were alleged to be implied in a lease under seal of the 31st of March, 1885, whereby the defendants let to the plaintiffs the basement of 21, Bush-lane, for a term of 10½ years, less one day, from the 25th of March, 1885, at a yearly rent of £40, payable quarterly.

The lease provided that "the landlords agree to let and the tenants agree to take" the premises in question.

The lease contained no express covenant for title or quiet enjoyment.

The defendants had as a matter of fact an estate in the premises for 8½ years only, but they acted honestly in executing the agreement and under a bonâ fide mistake.

At the expiration of the 8½ years the defendants' superior landlord brought an action against the plaintiffs and recovered possession of the premises, whereby the plaintiffs lost the benefit of about two years of their term.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action.

At the trial, Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., held that in the absence of the word "demise" in the lease a covenant for title could not be implied, and that, though the law would imply a covenant for quiet enjoyment, such implied covenant determined with the interest of the lessor: see 43 W. R. 524.

He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

July 30.—The judgment of the Court (Lord ESHER, M.R., KAY, L.J., and A. L. SMITH, L.J.) was delivered by KAY, L.J.—The plaintiffs sue in this action for damages for eviction from a house of which they were tenants to the defendants. The tenancy was created by a lease under seal dated the 31st of March, 1885. The operative words of the lease were—the defendants "agree to let." The term was ten and a half years from the 25th of March, 1885. The defendants had only a leasehold interest, which expired on the 29th of September, 1893. The superior landlord after that date evicted the plaintiffs. The lease to the plaintiffs did not contain any express covenant for title or for quiet enjoyment, nor was the word "demise" used in it. The plaintiffs insist that there should be implied a covenant for title, or at least for quiet enjoyment, and that such covenants, or one of them, was broken by the eviction by title paramount.

These facts raise the following questions:—(1) Can any covenant be implied in this case? (2) If any, is such covenant one for title or only for quiet enjoyment? (3) Is such implied covenant an absolute covenant, or is it the ordinary limited covenant? (4) Whatever it was, did it not come to an end with the determination of the lessor's estate? With reference to the first question the law is thus stated in Sheppard's Touchstone at p. 165:—"If one make a lease for years by the words 'demise or grant,' and there is not contained in the lease any express covenant for the quiet enjoying of the land, in this case the law doth supply a covenant for a quiet enjoying of it against the lessor, and all that come in under him by title during the term. . . . But where there is an express covenant in the deed for the quiet enjoying of the land, there the law will not make this implied covenant." The learned author goes on to say that in the case of a lease for life reserving rent the law creates a warranty against all men, and this notwithstanding a warranty expressed in the deed. Nokes's case (4 Rep., 80b) is to the same effect. In this statement of the law three things are noticeable—(1) that the implication arises, not from the mere relation of landlord and tenant, but from the use of the words demise or grant; (2) that the covenant implied is for quiet enjoyment, not a covenant for title; and (3) that it is a limited covenant "against the lessor and all that come in under him by title." At pages 271, 272 it is said that the most usual and proper words for making a lease are "demise, grant, and to farm let," but that other words—"whatsoever word will amount to a grant"—such as "give, betake, or the like," will make the lease, but it is not said that there is any implication of a covenant from any of these other words. In Com. Dig. Covenant, A. 4, it is stated that in a lease for years covenant lies upon the word "demisi" or "concessi," and covenant for rent on the word "reddendo." In Viner's Abridgment, Covenant, F., "Action of covenant lies upon the words demise and grant in an indenture of lease, though there are no other words comprehending a warranty in them." In Bacon's Abridgment, Covenant, B., "There are some words which of themselves import no express covenant, yet being made use of in certain contracts they amount to such, and are therefore called covenants in law, and will as effectually bind the parties as if expressed in the most explicit terms. As if a man makes a lease for years of land by the words 'concessi' or 'demisi,' these import a covenant." In Nokes's case it is said there is a covenant in law on the words "demise, grant, &c."

All these citations are inconsistent with the view that a covenant can be implied from the mere relation of landlord and tenant, or from any words constituting that relation other than the particular words referred to. And this state of the law seems to be recognised by 8 and 9 Vict., c. 106, which in section 4 provides that the words "give" or "grant" in a deed shall not in future imply any covenant at law, but does not take away that effect from the word "demise" in a lease for years.

On the other hand is cited a dictum of Baron Parke in Hart v. Windsor, 12 M. and W., at page 85:—"It is clear that from the word 'demise' in a lease under seal the law implies a covenant, in a lease not under seal a contract, for title to the estate merely—that is, for quiet enjoyment against the lessor and all that come in under him by title, and against others claiming by title paramount during the term; and the word 'let' or any equivalent words (Sheppard's Touchstone, 272) which constitute a lease have, no doubt, the same effect, but not more (Sheppard's Touchstone, 165, 167)." This dictum was cited in the judgment in Mostyn v. West Mostyn Coal Co., 24 W. R. 401, 1 C. P. D. 145. This statement of the law professes to be grounded upon Sheppard's Touchstone. But in that book it is not said that the covenant is implied from any words sufficient to make a lease, only from certain words, nor does the implied covenant, according to that authority, extend to an eviction by title paramount, but is only the ordinary limited covenant for quiet enjoyment. In Bandy v. Cartwright, 1 W. R. 415, 8 Exch. 913, the lease was by parol; it was held that a covenant for quiet enjoyment during the term could be implied, and further, that such covenant was broken by a distress for a rent-charge granted before the parol demise by a predecessor in title of the lessor under whom he claimed by purchase. The reason for this decision is not given in the report. Probably this parol lease was made by the word "demise," or in the absence of evidence that was assumed to be the case. The decision was followed in Hall v. City of London Brewery Co., 2 B. & S. 737, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 86.

The weight of authority is in favour of the view that a covenant in law is not implied from the mere relation of landlord and tenant, but only from certain words used in creating the lease. But, supposing any covenant could be implied, according to Sheppard's Touchstone it is a covenant for quiet enjoyment only. This is also stated to be the law by Lord Eldon in Iggulden v. May, 9 Ves. 325.

In Holder v. Taylor, Hob. 12, a lease for years was made by the word "demise," and the lessee brought an action of covenant against the lessor, because at the date of the lease the lessor was not seised of the land, but a stranger. The lessee had not been ejected; but the court was of opinion that the action would lie, "for the breach of the covenant was in that the lessor had taken upon him to demise that which he could not, for the word 'demisi' imports a power of letting. . . . But if it were an express covenant for quiet enjoying, there perhaps it were otherwise." The case is very shortly reported, and the words quoted seem in the former sentence to intimate that the implied covenant is a covenant for title; but this is contradicted by the last words referring to an express covenant for quiet enjoyment as rebutting the implication.

In Burnett v. Lynch, 5 B. & C. 589, it was said by Littledale, J., that the word "'demise' imports a covenant in law on the part of the lessor that he has good title, and that the lessee should quietly enjoy during the term"; but he does not cite any authority for this. In Line v. Stephenson, 4 Bing. N. C. 678, 5 Ibid. 183, it is admitted somewhat doubtfully by Tindal, C.J., that the word "demise" may import a covenant for title as well as for quiet enjoyment; but it is put by Alderson, B., that it is a fallacy to say it imports two covenants; it imports one, of which, either want of title or eviction would be a breach.

The case of Stranks v. St. John, 15 W. R. 678, L. R. 2 C. P. 376, was referred to, in which there was an agreement in writing to let for seven years. This, by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, could not be a lease for seven years, because it was not a deed. It was therefore treated as an agreement to grant a lease by deed, under which the intended lessee would be entitled to investigate the lessor's title if he had not waived that right. The action seems to have been brought by the lessee on an implied contract to make a good title, the breach alleged being that the lessor never had any right or title to let for the term. Willes, J., said, in his judgment, that a lease for years is really only a sale of land for that period, and all sales of land imply a stipulation that the vendor has a good title. But it is clear law that no action will lie against a vendor for damages for contracting to sell land to which he has not a good title: Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. 1078; Bain v. Fothergill, 23 W. R. 261, L. R. 7 H. L., at p. 210; except, perhaps, to recover the expenses to which the purchaser has been put in investigating such title. The case was decided on demurrer, and is not of any value in the present discussion.

Then, is the covenant absolute or limited? In Andrew's case, 2 Leon. 104, Cro. Eliz. 214, it was held to be limited, and that upon the covenant implied from the word "demise" an action would lie if the lessor himself entered upon the lessee, but not if a stranger entered. This is consistent with the statement in Sheppard's Touchstone. On the other hand, in Holder v. Taylor the implied covenant seems to have been treated as an absolute covenant broken by the fact that the lessor had no title at the date of the lease. This seems also to have been held, as already noticed, in Bandy v. Cartwright.

Sufficient citations have been made to show that upon the first three questions there is considerable conflict of authority. Upon the fourth question there is more uniformity. It seems to be well settled that if the lessor's interest determines during the term, and the lessee is thereupon evicted, no action can be maintained upon the implied covenant. In Swan v. Stransham, Dyer, 257a, the lease was made by a tenant for life by deed using the words "grant and demise." The lessor died during the term, and the remainderman entered and evicted the lessee. The action was brought upon the implied covenant, but it was held "that the executors of the tenant for life should not be charged by this covenant in law, because the covenant in law ends and determines with the estate and interest of the lessor; and if it had been a covenant in fact or expressed, or warranty of the term expressed, it would be otherwise." This was followed in Adams v. Gibney, 6 Bing., 656. This is different to the ordinary limitation of an express covenant for title, which, according to the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, is worded thus—"notwithstanding anything by the" lessor "or anyone through whom he derives title otherwise than by purchase for value made, done, executed, or omitted, or knowingly suffered." Such a limitation would have prevented the lessor being liable for the want of title in Holder v. Taylor, or the interruption in Bandy v. Cartwright, both of which were by title paramount, and could not have been a breach of a covenant so limited.

In the present case the Lord Chief Justice has followed the decisions in Swan v. Stransham and Adams v. Gibney, which seem fully to support his judgment. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

MARA v. BROWNE. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Solicitor—Trustee de son tort — Constructive trustee — Trust funds passing through solicitor's firm—Liability of partner.

It is not within the scope of the implied authority of a partner in a solicitor's business to constitute himself a constructive trustee so as to bind his partner (who is not aware of the dealings by which the constructive trust is established) and make him also, liable as a constructive trustee.

B., a partner in a firm of solicitors, acting as well for the de facto trustees as for the proposed new trustees of a marriage settlement, before the appointment of the new trustees, invested the trust funds on mortgages which resulted in a loss to the trust estate. In an action brought to make the solicitor and his partner liable to refund to the trust estate, losses which had occurred in consequence of improper investments,

Held (reversing the decision of North, J., [1895] 2 Ch. 69), that on the evidence the solicitor had acted throughout merely as the solicitor of the trustees, and that neither he nor his partner could be held liable as a constructive trustee.

Appeal from North, J. (reported [1895] 2 Ch. 69, 43 W. R. Dig. 177), who had held the defendants, two brothers carrying on business as solicitors in partnership, liable to make good losses which had resulted to trust funds from improper investments.

The full statement of the facts will be found in the judgment of Lord Herschell.

The defendants appealed.

Hugh Browne, in person.—I am not responsible for the losses, because I acted merely as the agent of the duly appointed trustees.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Boome, for the defendant Arthur Browne.—If Hugh Browne was not liable, obviously his partner Arthur Browne cannot be liable; moreover, no money passed through Arthur Browne's hands, and he had no control over it. Even if Hugh Browne acted so as to make himself a constructive trustee, he had no authority to do so, and his partner cannot be held liable.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and C. E. E. Jenkins, for the respondents.—A trustee can employ agents, but a trustee de son tort cannot, because he has no authority: Attorney-General v. Corporation of Leicester, 7 Beav. 176. [LORD HERSCHELL referred to Fyler v. Fyler, 3 Beav. 550.] There were no trustees in existence at the time of these transactions, and therefore there could be no ratification of Browne's acts by any person. Where a person stands in a fiduciary position, as a solicitor towards his client, it is his duty to tell the client that his (the solicitor's) interest may conflict with his duty to his client, and that therefore the client should have independent advice.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 17, 1895.—Lord HERSCHELL read the following judgment:—On the 30th of August, 1875, a settlement was executed on the marriage of Mrs. Mara, one as the plaintiffs in this action, with her first husband, Mr. Harold Reeves. The trustees of this settlement were Mr. James Walker and Mr. Bernard James. The latter was a solicitor, and his co-trustee left the management of the trust property almost entirely to him. Towards the end of the year 1883 Harold Reeves consulted the defendant Hugh Browne as to the course that should be taken, as Mr. and Mrs. Reeves entertained grave doubts as to the safety of the trust investments. The amount invested on these securities exceeded £10,000. The defendant Hugh Browne was a friend of Harold Reeves, and was in practice as a solicitor in Nottingham in partnership with his brother Arthur Browne, the other defendant. It was in consequence arranged that Walker should retire from the trust, and that the plaintiff Arthur Reeves should become a trustee in his stead. To this all parties, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Reeves, Walker, and Arthur Reeves, assented. Accordingly a deed was prepared, by which Mr. and Mrs. Reeves, in whom the power of appointment was vested, appointed Arthur Reeves as trustee in the place of Walker. This deed was executed by Mr. and Mrs. Reeves about the 7th or 8th of January, 1884. It was not executed by Arthur Reeves. On the 11th of January a meeting took place between Hugh Browne and James, which left upon the mind of Hugh Browne the impression that the securities were not in order, and, indeed, that some of them were forgeries. James, however, expressed his willingness to take over the securities himself and to pay the amount of the trust funds in cash, expressing himself willing to retire from the trust. A sum of £1,405 15s. was at once forthcoming from James, and this was placed in the bank of Yates & Co. at Liverpool, to the credit of an account opened in the joint names of James and Arthur Reeves. I may state at once that various moneys were from time to time paid by James to the credit of this account until the whole of the trust funds for which he was responsible were accounted for. Sometime in January, 1884, apparently, soon after James had expressed his willingness to retire from the trust, it was arranged that Marian Reeves should become trustee in his place. On the 9th of May, 1884, a deed was duly executed by Mr. and Mrs. Harold Reeves, as well as by the retiring and new trustees, by which Arthur Reeves and Marian Reeves were appointed trustees in the place of Walker and James. The transactions for which it is sought to make the defendants responsible in the present action all took place between the previous month of January and the date of that deed. The defendant Hugh Browne was undoubtedly asked by Harold Reeves, with the full knowledge of Arthur Reeves, to look out for investments by way of mortgage, to which the moneys paid in by James to the bank in Liverpool could be applied. Mr. and Mrs. Reeves were naturally anxious that the money should begin bearing interest as soon as possible. Hugh Browne accordingly suggested a series of investments. I do not differ from the learned judge who tried the case in the conclusion that the investments were not proper ones for trustees to make. The money was to be lent upon building property of a speculative character, and the margin was not satisfactory. If the action had been one charging the defendants with negligence as solicitors, with a view to make them responsible for such loss as the trust estate had sustained owing to the investments made, it may well be that there would have been no answer to the action had it been brought in due time, but any such claim is now barred by the Statute of Limitations. The case sought to be made against the defendants is that their liability is the same as if they had been the appointed trustees of these trust funds, and bound as such to see, not only that the investments were within the terms of the investment clause, but that they were of a proper nature. The learned judge in the court below held that the plaintiffs had established their case. "The moneys," he said, "laid out by him (Hugh Brown) while there were no trustees were advanced upon his own responsibility, he being a principal in the matter, and not a mere agent for persons under whose lawful directions he was acting." I find myself quite unable to take this view of the facts. I becomes necessary now to advert more particularly to the manner in which the trust funds came into the hands of Hugh Browne. In each specific case the particulars of the investment which Hugh Browne had to propose were communicated to Arthur Reeves, and a cheque was drawn for the purpose of being applied to that particular investment, the cheque being signed by both Arthur Reeves and James, in whose names the banking account stood, and the money, when so received by Hugh Browne, was paid over to the intended mortgagors. It is true that in two instances Hugh Browne had himself advanced a portion of the sum which the mortgagor required, and, of course, paid over to the intending mortgagor the balance only, and that he sometimes delayed paying a portion of the sum agreed to be advanced until the mortgagor had proceeded further with the buildings he was erecting, but I do not think these circumstances make any difference. The moneys sent by Arthur Reeves and James were in every case applied to obtaining the investments for the purpose of which they were sent. James, indeed, probably was not made aware, as Arthur Reeves was, of the particulars of the proposed investments, and perhaps did not trouble himself about them, but he undoubtedly knew that the money was being sent for investment on mortgage securities which had been offered, since that very circumstance was employed as a means of putting pressure upon him to complete as speedily as possible payment into the bank of the full value of the trust estate. It was conceded by Mr. Cozens-Hardy, in his argument for the respondents, that, if the transactions now impeached had taken place after the date of the deed of appointment of May, 1884, he could not have maintained that the defendant Hugh Browne was to be regarded as a constructive trustee. North, J., appears to have taken the same view, for he refused relief in respect of advances made when the trusteeship was, as he said, full. In my opinion the distinction made is not a sound one. I do not think that it is correct to say that prior to that date there were no trustees. It appears to me that from the date, at all events, when the account was opened in the names of Arthur Reeves and James, down to the appointment by deed in the May following, those two gentlemen were the trustees of the settlement. It may be quite true that, when the circumstances of suspicion in relation to James's conduct became known to Arthur Reeves after the the 11th of January, he was unwilling to be joined with James as trustee, and that, if he had not intermeddled with the trust in any way, the deed of appointment executed by Mr. and Mrs. Reeves would have been ineffectual. But, in the circumstances which actually occurred, I cannot treat that instrument as a mere nullity. Arthur Reeves actually became a joint recipient with James of the whole of the trust funds, and jointly with him disposed of them at a time when James, though he had expressed his willingness to retire, was still a trustee. It is admitted that Reeves by so doing subjected himself to the responsibilities of a trustee in respect of that trust fund. He became, it is said, a trustee de son tort. But does it not seem strange thus to designate him when he had, immediately before this, been appointed a trustee with his assent by those who were competent to make the appointment? It is surely more reasonable to refer his acts as trustee to this appointment than to treat them as tortious. In my opinion, therefore, the trusteeship was full during the period covered by the transactions in question as truly as it was after the subsequent month of May, and the learned counsel for the respondents made, in my opinion, no greater concession than he was compelled to make when he conceded that, if the money had come into Hugh Browne's hands from duly appointed trustees for application upon specific investments, his responsibility would have been that of a solicitor, and not of a trustee. I think it right, however, to say that I am not satisfied that, even if Arthur Reeves is to be regarded as not having been duly appointed, the result would have been different. Hugh Browne was certainly not purporting or intending to act as trustee, nor was he supposed by any one to be so acting. He purported to act throughout as solicitor, and was understood by all parties to be so acting. Even conceding that he might in some circumstances, notwithstanding this, be held liable as a trustee, what are the circumstances here? James was undoubtedly a trustee, and Arthur Reeves, with the assent of Walker, the other trustee, and of those who had the power of appointing a new trustee, acted as such. Although James may not have troubled himself about the investments, I can entertain no doubt that both he and Arthur Reeves regarded and dealt with Hugh Browne as solicitor to the trust, and as such handed to him the trust funds to be applied to specific investments.

Under circumstances such as these I am not, as at present advised, prepared to hold that Hugh Browne would be liable as a constructive trustee. What I have already said is sufficient to dispose of the action. But I desire to add that, even if in the circumstances of this case Hugh Browne had been held liable as a trustee, I should still have come to the conclusion that the defendant Arthur Browne was not so liable. The only case against him is that, during the period covered by these transactions, he was in partnership as a solicitor with the other defendant. He took no part in them and was ignorant of their nature. In my opinion it is not within the scope of the implied authority of a partner in such a business that he should so act as to make himself a constructive trustee, and thereby subject his partner to the same liability.

I think the appeal must be allowed, and the action dismissed, with costs.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In this case North, J., has held two solicitors, Mr. Hugh and Mr. Arthur Browne, liable as constructive trustees to make good a loss which has accrued to a trust fund by reason of its having been invested in improper securities, and the question is whether either or both of these gentlemen are so liable. The plaintiffs are Mrs. Mara, who has a life interest in the trust funds, her two infant children, and the present trustees of the fund. No case is made against the defendants that they were liable to make good the loss by reason of negligence whilst acting as solicitors, and, had it been, the defendants would have had a good answer to such a claim by either Mrs. Mara or the trustees, under the Statute of Limitations; for the investment of the trust funds, which is the subject-matter of complaint, took place as long ago as the months of February and March, 1884, and the writ in the action was not issued till the 7th of November, 1890; and, as regards the infant plaintiffs, the case in the House of Lords of Rae v. Meek, 14 App. Cas. 558, 38 W. R. Dig. 179, shows that they could not maintain an action for negligence against the defendants; for the breach of duty, if it existed, was to the trustees and not the beneficiaries.

The facts are these: [The Lord Justice stated the facts, which, so far as material, have been already set out in the judgment of Lord Herschell.]

North, J., found, and I agree with him, that eight of the mortgages taken for the trust funds were speculative and risky, and not such as could be justified by a trustee—in fact, these investments constituted breaches of trust. Although this might well render the trustees liable for a breach of trust, it certainly per se does not render their solicitors so liable. But it is said that the facts shew that there should be imputed to Mr. Hugh Browne the character of a trustee, or in other words that he was a trustee de son tort; and upon this ground the learned judge has held him liable. It is not contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that Mr. Hugh Browne has been guilty of any fraudulent or dishonest conduct to the injury of the cestui que trusts, nor, to use Lord Langdale's words in Fyler v. Fyler, 3 Beav. 550, at p. 561, did he, being a solicitor, "take advantage of his position to acquire a benefit for himself at the hazard, if not to the prejudice, of the trust"; but it was said that he had made himself a constructive trustee, which, as far as I know, is the same thing as a trustee de son tort. Now, what constitutes a trustee de son tort? It appears to me if one, not being a trustee and not having authority from a trustee, takes upon himself to intermeddle with trust matters or to do acts characteristic of the office of trustee, he may thereby make himself what is called in law a trustee of his own wrong—i.e., a trustee de son tort, or, as it is also termed, a constructive trustee.

Lord Selborne, when Lord Chancellor, dealt with this question in Barnes v. Addy. He says, "That responsibility (i.e., of a trustee) may, no doubt, be extended in equity to others who are not properly trustees, if they are found either making themselves trustees de son tort, or actually participating in any fraudulent conduct of the trustee to the injury of the cestui que trust; but on the other hand strangers are not to be made constructive trustees merely because they act as the agents of trustees in transactions within their legal powers, transactions of which a court of equity may disapprove, unless these agents receive and become chargeable with some part of the trust property, or unless they assent with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees"; and James, L.J., added, "I most cordially concur in the general principle with which the Lord Chancellor began his judgment. I have long thought, and more than once expressed my opinion from this seat, that the court has in some cases gone to the very verge of justice in making good to cestui que trusts the consequences of breaches of trust of their trustees at the expense of persons perfectly honest, but who have been to some more or less degree injudicious. I do not think it is for the good of cestui que trusts, or the good of the world, that those cases should be extended." In this, if I may say so, I entirely agree.

In the present case Mr. Hugh Browne never became possessed of the trust funds excepting for the purpose of transferring them from the joint account at Messrs. Yates' Bank to the mortgagors, which he faithfully carried out, and which he did with the sanction of Mr. James and of Mr. Arthur Reeves, who had been appointed trustee under the circumstances above mentioned, and no one can suggest any knowledge in Mr. Hugh Browne of a fraudulent design on the part of the trustees, for the simple reason that no such design in fact existed. In my judgment, the true inference to be drawn from the facts of this case is that Mr. Hugh Browne between January, 1884, and the 9th of May, 1884, acted as solicitor for Mr. James and Mr. Arthur Reeves, and that he never assumed to act otherwise, that he never intended to act otherwise, and that, in truth, he never did act otherwise.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy, on behalf of the plaintiffs, admitted, and I think that his admission was well founded, that if the deed of the 9th of May, 1884, appointing Mr. Arthur Reeves and his sister Marian trustees had been executed in January, 1884, he could not have contended that Mr. Hugh Browne was acting otherwise than as solicitor to the trustees in what he did between January and the 9th of May, 1884, for he would then have been acting for principals — i.e., for trustees in transactions within their legal power—but he contended that as the deed was not executed until the 9th of May, 1884, Mr. Arthur Reeves up till then was at the most a mere trustee de son tort, and that Mr. James, although an undoubted trustee, was not permitting Mr. Hugh Browne to act for him, and consequently, Mr. Hugh Browne having no principals, he must be held to have been a principal himself, and therefore a trustee de son tort. But why is it to be said that Mr. Arthur Reeves between January and the 9th of May, 1884, was merely a trustee de son tort? He had been appointed trustee by deed under seal in January, 1884, and he at once undertook the burden of the trust, and the impeached investments did not take place until afterwards—viz., between the 20th of February, 1884, and the 14th of March, 1884. In my judgment it is incorrect to hold that he was acting as trustee de son tort; why is this to be assumed? The learned judge came to the conclusion that Mr. Arthur Reeves never acted under the deed of January, 1884, and he holds that it was abandoned; but why is this to be so held? We find Mr. Arthur Reeves after its execution at once entering upon the business of the trust; and why is it to be assumed and held that he then acted as a trustee in his own wrong rather than as a properly appointed trustee? I can draw no such inference. It is true that in 1890 Mr. Hugh Browne ran his pen through the signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Harold Reeves, lest, as he said, any person should mistake the deed for a living one; but this was many years after it was executed and at a time when it was no longer needed, for the deed of the 9th May of 1884, was all that was then required. The learned judge also held that Mr. Hugh Browne could not say that he was acting as solicitor for James, for he had treated him as a hostile party. But with submission, although this was so at one time, the learned judge appears to me to have omitted to notice the part taken by James, as he made good the trust fund, in drawing the cheques in conjunction with Arthur Reeves upon their joint account at Messrs. Yates' bank with the express object that the moneys so obtained should be invested by Hugh Browne for the trust. Upon these questions of fact I find myself differing from the learned judge. In my opinion, between January, 1884, and the 9th of May, 1884, it has been proved that Mr. Hugh Browne was acting for Mr. James and Mr. Arthur Reeves in making the investment, that they were the de facto trustees, and that he had them as principals, and that in what he did he was not, therefore, a trustee de son tort. This suffices to determine this case; but had Mr. Hugh Browne been acting as a trustee de son tort I do not see how that circumstance renders Mr. Arthur Browne, his partner, liable for the consequences attaching to such a position. It is not, however, necessary to discuss this, nor the point, so much debated at the bar, as to what would have been Mr. Hugh Browne's position if he acted for Mr. James, who was an actual trustee, and Mr. Arthur Reeves, if he had been merely a trustee designated and not actually appointed. For these reasons I think that this appeal should be allowed, with costs, and that the action must be dismissed, with costs.

RIGBY, L.J., stated the facts, and continued:—By the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 31, sub-section 1, Mr. and Mrs. Reeves had power to appoint him (Arthur Reeves) by writing, and their execution of the deed of appointment on the 7th or 8th of January, 1884, followed by his acceptance, operated as a valid appointment. By sub-section 5 of the same section every new trustee so appointed, as well before as after all the trust property becomes by law or by assurance or otherwise vested in him, is to have the same powers, authorities, and discretions, and may in all respects act as if he had been originally appointed a trustee by the instrument creating the trust.

Whatever was, at the time or afterwards, thought by the parties, Arthur Reeves and James were trustees in the interval between the acceptance of the trust by Arthur Reeves and the retirement of James, which followed on the 8th of May, 1884. It was during that interval that all the investments in respect of which relief has been granted were made; the investments themselves, however improvident they may have been, were within the legal powers of the trustees. The defendant Hugh Browne, in all that he did during the interval, acted in the capacity of solicitor for one of the two trustees, whose directions as to investments were accepted and acted upon by the other. The deed executed by Mr. and Mrs. Reeves on the 7th or 8th of January was very naturally left incomplete in order that a deed suitable to the new state of things might be substituted for it, but its effect as an appointment in writing was not in the least altered.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that Hugh Browne cannot be made liable as constructive trustee, and it is too late to make him liable as solicitor. I do not think that the circumstances of the appointment of Arthur Reeves, and the effect of the deed executed by Mr. and Mrs. Reeves as an appointment in writing under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, were so clearly called to the attention of North, J., as they were on the appeal. If they had been, I think that he would have arrived at a different conclusion from that at which he did arrive. I gather from his judgment that he would, if satisfied of the facts, have dealt with the questions of law as this court is now doing. The conclusion to which we have arrived renders it unnecessary to consider in detail the questions of law which might have arisen if Arthur Reeves had only been what was called in argument trustee designate. I wish, however, to reserve for future consideration, whenever the case may arise, how far a solicitor, acting as solicitor for a de facto trustee, can be made liable as a constructive trustee merely by reason of a defect in title of his principal. I think, also, with Lord Herschell, that it is not within the scope of a solicitor's business to constitute himself a constructive trustee, so as to bind a partner and make him also liable as a constructive trustee, although he is not aware of the dealings by which the constructive trust is established.

DENNY v. BENNETT. (a.)

County court—Practice—Action against a county court bailiff—Statutory defence—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 54—Special defence, notice of—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 10, rr. 10, 18a.

The defence afforded to county court bailiffs by section 54 of the County Courts Act, 1888, being a statutory defence, notice must be given as provided by the County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 10, rr. 10, 18a, if a county court bailiff intends to rely on the section as a defence to an action against him.

Appeal of the defendant from the County Court of Lancashire.

The action was brought to recover treble damages and treble costs under 2 W. & M., sess 1, c. 5, s. 4, for proved breach and rescue of certain goods and chattels.

On the 23rd of November, 1894, a certificated bailiff, acting under the instructions of the plaintiff, distrained the goods and chattels of Howe, who was the plaintiff's tenant, for £14 10s. arrears of rent then owing by Howe to the plaintiff.

On the 10th of December the defendant, who was a county court bailiff, seized Howe's goods under three warrants of execution, notwithstanding the protests of the plaintiff's bailiff, and sold them.

At the trial of the action the defendant produced the warrants under which he seized the goods; but he had not given notice of his intention to rely on section 54 of the County Courts Act, 1888, as a defence to the action. The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed. The defendant appealed.

The County Courts Act, 1888, s. 54, is as follows: No action shall be commenced against any bailiff . . . for anything done in obedience to any warrant under the hand of the registrar and the seal of the court until demand has been made or left at the office of such bailiff by the party intending to bring such action, or by his solicitor or agent, in writing signed by the party demanding the same, of the perusal and copy of such warrant, and the same has been refused or neglected for the space of six days after such demand; and in case after such demand and compliance therewith by showing the said warrant to and permitting a copy to be taken thereof by the party demanding the same, any action shall be brought against such bailiff or other person acting in his aid for any such cause as aforesaid without making the registrar who signed or sealed the said warrant defendant, on producing or proving such warrant at the trial of such action a verdict shall be given for the defendant, notwithstanding any defect of jurisdiction or other irregularity in the said warrant. . . . The County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 10, r. 18*a*, provides that: When in any action the defendant relies upon any statutory defence or any defence of which he is required by any statute to give notice, he shall in his statement set forth the year, chapter, and section, or the short title thereof, and the particular matter upon which he relies. Ord. 10, r. 10, requires notice of the intention to rely on the ground of defence mentioned in ord. 10, r. 18*a*, to be filed five clear days before the return day.

Carrington, for the defendant.—Section 54 expressly enacts that no action shall be commenced against a bailiff unless the prescribed formalities have been complied with, and therefore this was not a case in which a notice of a special defence is required by the county court rules.

He referred to Kay v. Atherton Local Board, 42 J. P. 792; Allright v. Perks, 9 Times L. R. 235.

[Other points were also raised in argument, to which it is not necessary to refer in this report.]

Corrie Grant, for the plaintiff.—Any defence based on a statute is a statutory defence within the meaning of ord. 10, rr. 10, 18 a. If the defendant intended to rely on section 54 at the trial he ought to have filed the requisite notice.

WILLS, J., after dealing with the other points in the case, said: Under the circumstances of this action it is clear that section 54 of the County Courts Act, 1888, affords protection to the defendant; but he did not give notice of his intention to rely on that section. It does not seem to me to be possible to draw any distinction between a defence based on section 54 of that Act and the defence of insufficient notice of action under the Police Act, which the court held in Allright v. Perks to be a statutory defence requiring notice. Following that decision, I am of opinion that the defendant could not rely on section 54 unless he had previously complied with the rules as to notice. The county court judge would have had jurisdiction to adjourn the case on terms in order that the notice might be given, but no application was made to him to do so, and the only question for us is, whether he was right on the question before him? For the reasons which I have given I think he was right, and therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

WRIGHT, J.—I entirely agree. I think the case of Davey v. Warne, 14 M. & W. 199, strongly supports the view that this was a defence of which notice should have been given.

PEARSON (Appellant) v. THE BELGIAN MILLS CO. (LIMITED) (Respondents). (a.)

Factory—Cleaning of machinery—Child cleaning fixed part of machine in motion—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16), s. 9.

A child is not allowed, under section 9 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, to clean any part of a machine in a factory—whether such part be fixed or in motion—while the machine itself is in motion by the aid of steam, water, or other mechanical power.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

Special case stated by justices acting in and for the division of Oldham, in the county of Lancaster.

On the 26th of June, 1895, an information and complaint preferred by the appellant, an inspector of factories, against the respondents, was heard and determined by the justices in petty sessions, and was dismissed by them.

The information and complaint was that on the 22nd of May, 1895, the respondents, being the occupiers of a certain factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, did then and there, in contravention of section 9 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, allow a certain child to clean a part of the machinery while the same was in motion by the aid of steam.

The following facts were proved or admitted upon the hearing.

The respondents are cotton spinners, and carry on business at the Belgian Mill, Royton.

The child gave evidence that he was eleven years of age, that he was employed at the respondents' mill as a "little piecer"; that on the day in question he was cleaning the front part of the roller beam when the appellant spoke to him, and that the machine (a spinning mule) was running at the time. A roller beam is a fixed part of a spinning mule.

In cross-examination the child stated that he was using a wire behind the creel to clean, and that he did not think that what he was doing was dangerous; that the piecing is done by the "big piecers" and the "minders," and that besides keeping the floors and the fixed machinery clean and tidy there was very little for him to do.

The secretary of the Master Cotton Spinners' Association and the president of the Operative Cotton Spinners' Association gave evidence that in their opinion this cleaning was not dangerous.

The appellant in his evidence stated that he saw the child in the Belgian Mill on the 22nd of May cleaning part of the machine while the machine was in motion by steam power.

It was admitted, and the justices found as a fact, that the part of the machine that the child was cleaning was not in motion, but that the machine, of which part was being cleaned, was in motion. They also found as a fact that the cleaning in question was not dangerous.

Section 9 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, provides:—

"A child shall not be allowed to clean any part of the machinery in a factory while the same is in motion by the aid of steam, water, or other mechanical power; a child . . . allowed to clean or to work in contravention of this section shall be deemed to be employed contrary to the provisions of this Act"; and by section 96 a "child" means a person under the age of fourteen years.

The justices were of opinion that section 9 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, does not prevent the cleaning of a fixed part of a running machine.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether section 9, paragraph 1, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, applies to the cleaning by a child of a fixed part of a machine in motion by steam, water, or other mechanical power.

Henry Sutton, for the appellant.—The justices were wrong in their construction of the section. The word "same" in the section refers to the word "machinery," and not to the word "part." The section, therefore, ought to be read thus: "A child shall not be allowed to clean any part of the machinery while the machinery is in motion." This clearly prohibits the cleaning of the fixed part of a machine while that machine is in motion; and that must have been the object of the section, as a child may be in as great danger while cleaning the fixed part of a machine in motion as in cleaning the moving part of the machine. The object clearly was to keep a child away from moving machines altogether. The justices have found that this cleaning was not dangerous; but this finding has nothing to do with the construction of the section. The appellant could have called evidence to show that it was dangerous, but he wishes to get a decision on the question of the construction of the section.

The respondents did not appear.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question is an extremely short one, but it is an important one; and it turns on the construction of section 9 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. There was a spinning machine, some portions of which were fixed, and the child was not cleaning any part of that machine which was in motion. The whole machine was in motion—that is to say, all the parts which could move were in motion; but the child was employed to clean the fixed parts, not those in motion. The question turns on the meaning of the word "same" in the section. The word "same" clearly means the machinery, not the particular part; so that the words "while the same is in motion" mean while the machinery is in motion. The section means not merely to prevent children cleaning the parts of a machine which are in motion, but also to prevent them cleaning any part of a machine in a factory while the same—that is, that machine, and not the particular part—is in motion. The magistrates found that this cleaning was not dangerous, and that the child was not injured. But it seems obvious that the object of the section is to prevent children being brought near the moving parts of any machinery, which they must be if they are allowed to clean the fixed part of a moving machine. The broad meaning of the thing is that children are to be kept altogether away from such places.

I think, therefore, that the justices ought to have convicted, and that the case must be remitted to them.

KAY, L.J.—The grammatical construction of the section is entirely against the finding of the justices. According to the grammatical construction, the word "same" refers to "machinery," not to the word "part"; and, when we consider the object of the provision, it seems to me unquestionable that that is the true meaning. If a child is employed to clean a part of the machine which never moves, while the machine itself is in motion, he is exposed to almost as great a danger as if he were touching a part of the machine which was moving. It is no answer to say that the child was not in danger in this particular case. That is not the question. The question is what the statute meant; and, to my mind, it plainly means that while the machine is in motion—that is, while all the movable parts of that machine which should move when the machine is acting are moving, then the child shall not clean any part of that machine, whether such part be fixed or in motion. Any other construction would be to place a child in the very danger which the section intended to provide against.

I therefore think that this case is not only entirely within the mischief contemplated by the section, but is within the very words of the section.

Appeal allowed.

YATES (Appellant) v. HIGGINS AND OTHERS (Respondents). (a.)

Criminal law—Cruelty to animals—Domestic animal, what is—Tame seagull—Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92), ss. 2, 29—Cruelty to Animals Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 60), s. 3.

A seagull had been the property of one A. S. for three years, and was tame. It was kept in a field, with one wing pinioned so that it could not fly, but it could escape by means of a river running through the field. It would come to its owner when called and feed from her hand, and was used by her in her business of a photographer. The respondents were charged on an information with cruelly illtreating the seagull, and were proved to have been guilty of gross cruelty to the bird.

Held, that the seagull was not a "domestic animal" within the meaning of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 29, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60, s. 3, and that the respondents therefore could not be convicted on the information.

Special case stated by justices for the petty sessional division of Buxton, in the county of Derby.

At a court of petty sessions held in the said division the respondents were summoned to appear upon an information preferred by the appellant, in which the appellant complained that the respondents did cruelly illtreat and abuse a certain animal, to wit, a tame seagull.

On the hearing of the said information it was proved that the seagull had been the property of Anne Simpson for three years, and was tame; that it was kept in a field adjoining her residence, one wing having been pinioned and the bird being unable to fly, but that it was able to get out of the field by going down the river which ran through it. It was proved that it would go to Anne Simpson on being called and feed from her hand, and that Anne Simpson, who was a photographer, had used it, together with two other birds, in her business.

The justices found as a fact that the respondents had been guilty of gross cruelty to the bird; but the information was dismissed upon the ground that the justices considered, in point of law, that the facts did not prove the seagull to be a domestic auimal within 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60, s. 3.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the justices were right in so holding. If yea, the dismissal of the information was to stand; if nay, the case was to be remitted to the justices with an order to them to convict the respondeuts.

By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 2: "If any person shall cruelly beat, illtreat, overdrive, abuse, or torture, or cause or procure to be cruelly beaten, illtreated, overdriven, abused, or tortured, any animal, every such offender shall for every such offence forfeit and pay a penalty not exceeding £5." By section 29: "The word 'animal' shall be taken to mean any horse, mare, gelding, bull, ox, cow, heifer, steer, calf, mule, ass, sheep, lamb, hog, pig, sow, goat, dog, cat, or any other domestic animal."

By 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60, s. 3: "The words and expressions to which a meaning is affixed by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, and which are introduced into this Act, shall have the same meaning in this Act, and the word 'animal' shall in the said Act and in this Act mean any domestic animal, whether of the kind or species particularly enumerated in clause 29 of the said Act or of any other kind or species whatever, and whether a quadruped or not."

Colam, for the appellant. — The decision of the justices in dismissing the information was wrong. There was ample evidence on which to hold that this seagull was a domestic animal within the statutes. It was perfectly tame, and also served a purpose useful to its owner—viz., by appearing in photographs. The case, therefore, comes within the principal laid down in Colam v. Pagett, 32 W. R. 289, 12 Q. B. D. 66, in which case linnets which had been tamed and were used as decoy birds were held to be domestic animals. Aplin v. Porritt, 42 W. R. 95, [1893] 2 Q. B. 57, is distinguishable, because in that case there was no evidence that the rabbits had become tame.

He also referred to Harper v. Marcks, 42 W. R. 605, [1894] 2 Q. B. 319.

No one appeared on behalf of the respondents.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In my judgment the magistrates were right in law in holding that on the facts set forth in this case it was not proved that this seagull was a domestic animal within the statutes in question. We might wish that the law were different, but we have no right to extend the ambit of the statutes. It cannot be contended that to bring an animal within the definition it is sufficient merely to show that the animal, being one of a kind ordinarily wild, has been made tame. In this case the facts are that the seagull had been the property of Anne Simpson for some years, and was tame; it would go to its owner on being called, and would feed out of her hand, and the owner had used the bird in the business of a photographer. We find, therefore, that the only fact stated in the case with regard to the bird, beyond the mere fact of tameness, is that a photographer used it in her business. In my opinion that fact does not alter the character of the animal in the slightest degree.

The case of Colam v. Pagett was relied on for the appellant. In that case linnets had been trained so as to be able to be used as decoys. The case, therefore, comes within the definition of domestic animal given by Cave, J., in Harper v. Marcks, [1894] 2 Q. B., at p. 322, where he says: "In some cases, no doubt, animals have been so deal with and altered as no longer to resemble the wild stock from which they came. I do not say that that is essential in order to bring them within the protection of the Acts; but you must at least show that the animal has been sufficiently tamed to serve some purpose for the use of man. The mere caging and keeping in captivity a wild animal is not enough to make it a domestic animal." I do not think that on the facts in this case it is possible to hold that this seagull served any purposes for the use of man.

The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion; but I regret that we are obliged to come to this decision, for I should like to see the class of animals protected from cruelty extended. That, however, is a question for Parliament, not for us. At the same time, I think it would be very difficult to give a satisfactory definition of the class to be protected without interfering with many cases where cruelty is necessarily inflicted.

Appeal dismissed.

SAN PAULO (BRAZILIAN) RAILWAY CO. v. CARTER. (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Profits and gains of English company owning railway abroad—Control in England—Profits received in England—Income Tax Acts, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D, cases 1, 5; 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule D.

An English company, with a registered office in London, was incorporated for the purpose of making and working a railway in Brazil. The directors resided in England, and controlled at the London office the whole conduct and management of the company, but the profits were earned in Brazil.

Held, that the company did not carry on its business exclusively out of the United Kingdom, and was therefore assessable to the income tax under case 1, schedule D —viz., on the full amount of their net profits and gains.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 43 W. R. 339, [1895] 1 Q. B. 580, affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.), reported 43 W. R. 339, [1895] 1 Q. B. 580, which had reversed that of the Divisional Court (Vaughan Williams and Wright, JJ.), reported 43 W. R. 109, on a special case stated under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59, by the Commissioners of Income Tax for the City of London.

The appellants, the San Paulo (Brazilian) Railway Co. (Limited), were an English company resident in England, the control and direction being in London, and the business of the company was carried on under the direction of the directors in London. The directors entered into contracts in England for the purchase of, and sent to Brazil the materials for additions, extensions, and improvements of their property, for repairs thereto, and for new plant, such as engines, waggons, &c. The accounts were kept in London, where the balance-sheets, reports, &c., were made out, all meetings held, and dividends declared and paid. The directors appointed a superintendent who resided in Brazil, and he was a salaried servant of the directors, removable at their pleasure, and bound to obey the orders sent out to him by the directors from London.

With an exception of transfer fees, amounting on an average to £128 per annum, and annual interest on money, amounting on an average to £1,423 11s. 3d. per annum, the whole revenue of the company arose from moneys paid to them in Brazil for the carriage of passengers, goods, merchandise, and cattle on the San Paulo Railway, and for other services and miscellaneous receipts connected with the railway.

The company were assessed under the First Case, Schedule D, of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100 (1), on the sum of £370,122: that is to say, the full amount of the balance of the profits and gains of the company upon an average of three years.

It was contended on behalf of the company that the company was chargeable, not under the First Case, but under the Fifth Case of Schedule D of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100 (1), only upon the sum of £295,070: that is to say, the full amount of the sums received in the United Kingdom upon an average of three years, and that the assessment should be restricted to that amount.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Commissioners were of opinion that the company was chargeable under the First Case, Schedule D, of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100 (1), and confirmed the assessment on the sum £370,122.

The Divisional Court (Vaughan Williams and Wright, JJ.) were of opinion that the case was governed by Bartholomay Brewing Co. v. Wyatt, 42 W. R. 173, [1893] 2 Q. B. 499, and that the company should be assessed upon the sum of £295,070 only.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., and Bigham, Q.C. (A. M. Bremner with them), for the appellants.—The case is within Colquhoun v. Brooks, 38 W. R. 289, 14 App. Cas. 493. Sulley v. Attorney-General, 8 W. R. 472, 5 H. & N. 711; Bartholomay Brewery Co. v. Wyatt, 42 W. R. 173, [1893] 2 Q. B. 499; Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nichols, 25 W. R. 71, 1 Ex. D. 428; and Imperial Continental Gas Association v. Nicholson, 37 L. T. N. S. 717, 26 W. R. Dig. 102, can no longer be considered authorities. Bank of Mexico v. Apthorpe, 39 W. R. 564, [1891] 2 Q. B. 378, has no application.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C. (W. O. Dunckwertz with them), for the respondents.—Colquhoun v. Brooks is clearly distinguishable. The whole control of this business is in England. Cesena Sulphur Co., Calcutta Jute Co., and Imperial Continental Gas Co. are still good law, and govern this case.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—I think one proposition has been conclusively established by the various cases that have come under your lordships' consideration, and that is, that where the trade is wholly or partially carried on in this country the trader is liable to pay income tax on the profits of his trade.

Now, in this case the appellant company is an English company, residing (so far as that abstraction a corporation can reside at all) in England. It has an office in London, and I am disposed to think (though it is unnecessary for the purposes of this case to say so) that its trade, if the word "trade" is strictly construed, is wholly carried on in England. It seems to me that, as was said by Cockburn, C.J., and Crompton, J., in the case of Sulley v. The Attorney-General, that "it is probably a question of fact where the trade is carried on," and it is probably true to say that that phrase may be understood in two different senses. It may mean where the goods in respect of which trading is carried on are conveyed, made, bought, or sold; or, speaking of land, where it is cultivated or used for any other purpose of profit. That makes the locality of the goods or the land which are the subjects of the trade to be in a certain sense the place where the trade is carried on, because it is the place where the things corporeally exist, or are dealt with. But there is another sense in which the conduct and management, the head and brain of the trading adventure, are situated in a place different from that in which the corporeal subjects of trading are to be found. It becomes, therefore, a question of fact, and, according to the answer to be given to the question where is the trade in a strict sense carried on, will the answer be, under the Income Tax Acts there is it liable to assessment.

It is therefore necessary to determine, upon these principles, where this appellant company carries on its business. It deals, undoubtedly, with land in the Brazils. In Brazil the payments are received, and in Brazil the passengers and goods are carried, but the form of trading can make no difference. If it were a mine, as in the Cezena case, or a jute mill, equally with a railway, the person who governs the whole commercial adventure; the person who decides what shall be done in respect of the adventure; what capital shall be invested in the adventure; on what terms the adventure shall be carried on; in short, the person who, in the strictest sense, makes the profits by his skill or industry, however distant may be the field of his adventure, is the person who is trading. That person appears to me, in this case, to be the appellant company. Every one of the tests I have applied are applicable to its proceedings. A shipowner, or, indeed, a shipbroker, may not have any one of the ships or the charter parties which he negotiates in England; but by correspondence, or by agency, he may have both charter parties and ships, not necessarily British ships, all over the globe. But if he lives in London, and by his direction governs the whole of this commercial adventure, could it properly be said that he is not carrying on his trade in London? So it appears to me that this appellant company is carrying on the trade in London, from which it issues its orders, and so governs and directs the whole commercial adventure that is under its superintendence.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed with costs, and I move, your lordships, accordingly.

Lord WATSON.—The decision of this appeal does not involve any new controversy upon the construction of the Income Tax Acts. It depends, in my opinion, upon the answer which ought to be given to a single issue of fact.

The law which must govern the present case appears to me to be settled by the judgment of the House in Colquhoun v. Brooks. It was held, in that case, that the interest of a partner, resident in England, in the profits or a trade which was exclusively carried on in Australia by the other members of the firm, was chargeable with income tax, not under the first, but under the fifth case of Schedule D. The noble and learned lords who took part in the decision were of opinion that the interest of the English partner was included in the sweeping language of the first case; but they held that it also constituted, within the meaning of the first case, a possession in one of her Majesty's dominions out of the United Kingdom. The ground upon which the interest was held to be taxable in terms or the fifth case was that the Income Tax Acts contain no machinery for assessing, under the first case, profits accruing from any trade which is not wholly or in part carried on within the United Kingdom, whereas they do provide machinery for assessing under the fifth case all profits arising from trade exclusively carried on outside the United Kingdom.

In my opinion the decision in Colquhoun v. Brooks directly affirms the rule that every interest in the profits of trade, belonging to a person who is, within the meaning of the Acts, resident in the United Kingdom, must be charged under the first case of schedule D, if the trade is carried on, either wholly or partly, within Great Britain or Ireland, and is chargeable under the fifth case, if the trade is exclusively carried on in any of her Majesty's dominions out of the United Kingdom. The considerations which are applicable to trades wholly carried on in these dominions apply with equal force to trades exclusively carried on in foreign possessions which are not subject to the British Crown; and it appears to me to be matter of necessary implication that the interest of a resident here, in profits derived from a trade of the latter description, must also be assessed for income tax under the first case of schedule D.

When it has been ascertained that a person interested in the profits of a trade has his residence in the United Kingdom, in such sense as to bring him within the incidence of the Income Tax Acts, the only question remaining for determination is whether the measure of his liability is to be found in the first or in the fifth case of schedule D; in the one case, he is liable to pay duty in respect of the net profits accruing to him from such trade; in the other, in respect only of such part of these profits as shall have been actually received by him in this country. But he cannot, according to the rule established in Colquhoun v. Brooks, escape from liability under the first case, unless he is able to show that no part of the trade is carried on within the United Kingdom, or, what comes to precisely the same thing, that it is exclusively carried on in a country or countries outside the United Kingdom, whether subject to her Majesty or not. If he succeeds in proving that fact, his liability will be under the fifth case.

The appellant is an English company incorporated with limited liability under British statutes and having its registered office in London. It is not disputed that the company has its domicile in England, and is liable to pay income tax in respect of any profits earned in the course of its trade. The only complaint made is that the amount of such profits has been assessed for duty under the first case, whereas the appellant maintains that it ought to have been assessed under the fifth case, because the trade of the company is wholly carried on beyond the limits of the United Kingdom. I have had no difficulty in rejecting that contention. It is not necessary to consider whether the whole trade of the company ought to be regarded as carried on in England. To my mind it is perfectly clear that, in point of fact, part of its trade is carried on there, and that is sufficient to bring its profits within the first case of schedule D.

It is no doubt true that the undertaking, in order to carry on which the company was incorporated, consists, as its memorandum bears witness, in "the making, maintaining, managing, and working" of a railway in Brazil, and in "the making, maintaining, managing, and working" of branch lines, roads, canals, and other means of communication in connection with the main line. It is also true that the directors, as authorized by the articles of association, manage and work the railway and its connections through a superintendent in Brazil, appointed by them in Brazil, and a staff of servants, who are under his immediate supervision; and that the receipts of the company, from which profits made by it are derived, are earned and paid in Brazil. But the substantial fact remains that the directors, subject to any resolutions which may be passed for their guidance by the members of the company, are vested with the sole right to manage and control every department of its affairs. Apart from the authority, express or implied, which they have from the directors, neither the superintendent nor any other servant of the company has any power to act in the carrying on of its trade. They are in no sense traders; they are merely servants, and in that capacity are remunerated for the services which they are employed to perform. The profits of the undertaking, although they are received by these servants, do not belong to them and are not in their disposal; their only duty, unless otherwise directed by the company, being to transmit them to London, and the company here is the sole judge whether they ought or ought not to be distributed among its members. The only persons who can with propriety be described as carrying on the trade of the company are its directors, who, for all purposes of administration and management, are the company itself. I do not think that in such circumstances the particular localities in which debts are incurred to the company or are paid to its agents are of any consequence in ascertaining by whom its trade is carried on.

I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord SHAND concurred.

Lord DAVEY.—I may content myself in this case with saying that the business of the appellant company is not, on the facts stated in the case, entirely or exclusively carried on abroad, and therefore that the case of Colquhoun v. Brooks, on which the appellants' counsel relied, is no sufficient authority for the proposition which they maintained. No doubt the profits of the company are derived from the profitable use of land in Brazil and from the business of carriers carried on in that country, and in that sense it is a Brazilian business. But it is not sufficient to say that the company are carrying on a Brazilian business (as Wright, J., thought) if the company is carrying on that business wholly or partially in this country. It is clear to my mind that the direction and supreme control of the appellant company's business is vested in the board of directors in London, who appoint the agents and officials abroad, and either by general orders or by particular directions control or may control their duties, remuneration, and conduct, and to whom any question of policy or any contract or other matter may, and if deemed of sufficient importance, I suppose, would be referred for their decision. The business is therefore in very truth carried on, in, and from the United Kingdom, although the actual operations of the company are in Brazil, and in that sense the business is also carried on in that country. I do not attach any importance to the fact of the railway and business belonging to a corporation and not to an individual, except that in the case of an English joint stock company formed for the purpose of carrying on a particular business, it is, perhaps, easier to say where is the seat of administration and direction. In my opinion, therefore, the case is outside both the decision and the reasoning of the learned lords, who gave judgment in the case of Colquhoun v. Brooks, because I find that every one of those noble and learned lords confined their observations to a case in which the business was entirely carried on abroad. Whether it would be possible in any case for a sole owner of a foreign business having exclusive power of control over it, but resident in this country, successfully to maintain that he did not carry on a business here it is unnecessary to say. That question, which is one of fact, will be dealt with when it arises according to the circumstance of the case.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the business of the San Paulo Co. is not a "foreign possession" within the meaning of the fifth case of section 100, schedule D, as interpreted in Colquhoun v. Brooks, and that being so, the case undoubtedly falls within the language of the first case, and it follows that the company has been rightly charged upon the whole of its profits or gains.

In re Mason's Orphanage and the London and North-Western Railway Co. (a.) Charity—Deed of foundation—Sale by trustees under power—Consent of Charity Commissioners—"Scheme legally established"—Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 124), s. 29.

The deed of foundation of a charity duly enrolled under 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, is not a "scheme legally established" within the meaning of section 29 of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855. Consequently the trustees of such a charity in whom lands are vested cannot sell the lands under a power of sale contained in the deed without first obtaining the consent of the Charity Commissioners to the sale.

The trustees of a charity having a power of sale can only exercise their power of sale with the express authority of Parliament, or of a court or judge of competent jurisdiction, or according to a scheme legally established, or with the approval of the Charity Commissioners.

Decision of Stirling, J. (ante, p. 61), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Stirling, J., reported ante, p. 61, where the facts are sufficiently stated.

Stirling, J., held that the deed of foundation of the charity was not a "scheme legally established" within the meaning of section 29 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1855, and that consequently the trustees of the charity had no power to sell land without the consent of the Charity Commissioners.

The trustees appealed.

Hastings, Q.C., Warmington, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the appellants.

Arthur Underhill, for the respondents, was not called upon.

Lindley, L.J.—There does not appear to me to be any doubt about the point. I cannot improve upon Stirling, J.'s judgment, or make the case plainer than he has done, and I will content myself with reading the section.

Bearing in mind that the Act of 1855 is, according to the 1st section, to be construed as one Act together with the Charitable Trusts Act of 1853, and that "any provisions of the principal Act inconsistent with this Act are hereby repealed," I think that section 29 of the Act of 1855 is an additional section to the Act of 1853. Under the Act of 1853 alone this point could not have arisen, because there is not contained in that Act any prohibition such as we find in section 29 of the subsequent Act of 1855.

Now, the prohibition is this: "It shall not be lawful for the trustees or persons acting in the administration of any charity to make or grant, otherwise than with the express authority of Parliament, under any Act already passed or which may hereafter be passed, or of a court or judge of competent jurisdiction, or according to a scheme legally established, or with the approval of the Board, any sale, mortgage, or charge of the charity estate, or any lease thereof in reversion," and so on. Now, the language of that is plain enough, and it is admitted by the appellants that that is a prohibition subject to certain conditions. If they can make out that they have got the express authority of Parliament, either under any Act already passed or hereafter to be passed, or that they have got the authority of a court or a judge of competent jurisdiction, or that they have got a scheme legally established, or the approval of the Board, then all goes well; but if they have not got any one of those things, there is the prohibition, which is absolute.

Now, it is not contended that they have got any of these requisites except a "scheme legally established." The case is reduced to what is the real meaning of those words. I do not think that any lawyer who knows anything at all about charities, and who has been accustomed to the language which is applied to charities, would hesitate for a moment in saying that a "scheme legally established" is a technical expression and has a definite meaning as applied to charities. I understand by it this: A scheme either sanctioned by the Court of Chancery, or sanctioned by those other courts which, under the Act of 1853, could sanction schemes. I cannot read the language "according to a scheme legally established" as "according to trusts duly declared." That is not the meaning of it, and no one conversant with the language usually applied to a scheme would ever think that it was.

I think that the construction put upon the section by Stirling, J., is correct, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Kay, L.J.—I agree. I think that Stirling, J.'s judgment is quite accurate in every point as far as I can follow it, and I think when one looks to the history of this legislation, relating to charitable trusts and the dealing with them by the Court of Chancery, that the grammatical meaning of the words in this section 29 of the Act of 1855 is quite unmistakable. It was always the case that the Court of Chancery would under certain circumstances interfere in the administration of a charity and direct a scheme for its future administration. The word "scheme" is sanctioned by usage in the judicial experience of the Court of Chancery for more than a hundred years. The word "scheme" has a meaning with reference to charities which was completely settled and thoroughly well known long before this Act was passed, and therefore where "scheme" is used instead of "trust" or any ordinary word which would describe a trust, prima facie "scheme" must mean that which the courts have always understood by that word in relation to a charity, unless you find something in the context which contradicts that. Now, do you find anything in the context which contradicts it? To my mind the context shows plainly that that was the meaning of the word "scheme" in this section, because you have got appended to the word "scheme" "legally established." I will go back 150 years and take Lord Hardwicke's words in the case of Attorney-General v. Smart, 1 Ves. Sen. 72: "An information was brought to have the increasing surplus profits of a charity school founded by the Crown applied for the benefit of the master. There was a cross bill to have them applied for the benefit of the poor children." In point of fact, it was to have a scheme directed. Lord Hardwicke said: "This is a very causeless information and should be dismissed without any decree if it were not for the cross bill. The doctrine is true in general, that where there is an information it ought not to be dismissed, but there should be a decree"—What for?—"To establish the charity according to the intent of the donor; but that rule relates to private charities, for where there is a foundation for a perpetual charity by the Crown it is established as well as it can be already by a higher authority than this court." Looking to that use of the word "scheme" in that case, and from that time down to the present in connection with schemes when you have a charity established by a scheme, what can be the meaning of these words "scheme legally established" but this, that they mean a scheme for the administration of the charity established by that legal authority which was accustomed to establish schemes down to that time? Before the Act of 1855 was passed another mode of establishing schemes in the case of small charities whose incomes did not exceed £30 a year had been provided by the Act of 1853 and was confided to the court of bankruptcy of the district or to the county court. That again was a legal authority, and if you look at the sections of the Act they provide that that legal authority may in the case of such small charities establish schemes. As Stirling, J., pointed out, you have all this in the Act of 1853, and in this very Act of 1855 you find the word "scheme" used again and again with reference to that very thing—a scheme for the administration of the trusts of a charity established by judicial decision either by the courts which had power to do it under the Act of 1853 or by the original jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery.

Therefore, the words "scheme legally established," looking to the history of the dealing by the Court of Chancery with charities and to this legislation, seem to me grammatically to have as plain and clear a meaning as can be. They do not mean the original trust, unless that original trust was a trust founded by the Crown or by Act of Parliament, in which case you might treat it as having been established by higher authority even than the Court of Chancery. In the ordinary case of a charity they mean where the Court of Chancery or the courts which were empowered by the Act of 1853 to do it, have by an official decision established a scheme which may to some extent modify the original trust for the future administration of the charity. That is what I should say is the meaning of these words in this clause. But then look at the purpose of the clause. Before this time charities, even where they had not an express power of sale, had been in the habit in many cases of selling the property which belonged to them. The sale might not be good unless it was shown, and the onus was on the purchaser to show that it was for the benefit of the charity that the sale should be made. Then, in other cases they had express power to sell by the original instrument of trust, and that was a second case in which trustees of a charity might sell. Again, under the Act of 1853, they might sell where they had no express power to sell with the sanction of the Charity Commissioners. Take those three cases, I think they pretty well exhaust the cases in which the trustees of a charity could sell the charity property.

Now, with that knowledge the Legislature passed this Act of Parliament, containing for the first time an absolute prohibition to all trustees, whether they had got an express power or an implied power, or a power subject to the purchaser being able to show that it was for the benefit of the charity, or a power to sell with the assent of the Charity Commissioners. This clause comes and entirely prohibits it, and says "You shall not sell at all." It is not an enabling clause. It is a negative clause, preventing any sale in the future except under certain conditions. The conditions are, "It shall not be lawful for the trustees or persons acting in the administration of any charity to make or grant otherwise than with the express authority of Parliament," that is one condition, "under any Act already passed or which may hereafter be passed or of a court or a judge of competent jurisdiction," that would be with the authority of the Court of Chancery or a Court of Bankruptcy or a county court where they had jurisdiction; "or according to a scheme legally established"—that must be a scheme established by judicial decision—"or with the approval of the board." If you come within any of these exceptions you may sell, but otherwise it is an absolute prohibition against you. I pointed out in the early part of the argument that this, of course, only applies to people who can sell; you cannot prohibit persons selling who cannot sell. Why it does not apply to every possible case in which they can sell unless they come within any of these exceptions, I confess I cannot for one moment understand. Look at the purpose of the prohibition. Trustees of charities, as one knows, were very often rather irresponsible and dealt in a somewhat arbitrary way with the property of charities, particularly small charities (I do not for a moment suggest anything of that kind has been done here), and it was found necessary in order to have a complete control over the dealing with charity property to introduce this negative provision into the Act of Parliament to say "Henceforward you shall not sell your property at all unless you come within one or other of these exceptions," one of which is to get the sanction of the board.

I think the decision of Stirling, J., in this case is perfectly right, and that the Act of Parliament applies precisely to this particular case, and that in this case, although the trustees had an express power of sale by their instrument of trust, it was not an instrument of trust founded by Act of Parliament or by a grant from the Crown, nor had it ever been the subject of "a scheme legally established," and, therefore, it does not come within any of the exceptions and the section seems to me to apply to this case.

SMITH, L.J.—The whole purview of the section is this, that trustees of a charity shall not sell or grant such mortgages or make such leases as are therein mentioned without some outside authority, which is in that section mentioned, being brought in to see that it is right, in other words, to give its consent. It seems to me hopeless in reality to say that my brother Stirling's judgment on the construction of this section is not right. The appeal ought to be dismissed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BARON SUDELEY AND OTHERS. (a.)

Inland revenue—Probate duty—Undistributed residuary estate of English testator—Foreign mortgages forming part of such undistributed residuary estate—Liability to probate duty of the estate of English residuary legatee.

An English testatrix was entitled, under the will of her husband—a domiciled Englishman whose will was proved in England by English executors—to one-fourth share of his residuary estate. That estate included, among other property, money invested in mortgages of real estate in New Zealand. At the date of the testatrix's death no part of the residuary estate had been distributed, nor had any of the mortgages been converted.

Held (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), that the testatrix's share in her deceased husband's residuary estate was an English chose in action, and that probate duty was payable in England by her executors on one-fourth of the value of the New Zealand mortgages.

Decision of the Divisional Court, 43 W. R. 700, reversed.

Appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Charles, J., reported 43 W. R. 700) dismissing an information filed by the Attorney-General against the respondents, the executors of the will of Frances Louisa Tollemache, deceased.

The information sought to charge the respondents with probate duty upon a sum of £111,850 15s. 7d. to which Frances Louisa Tollemache was entitled under the will of her husband, Algernon Gray Tollemache.

The facts and arguments fully appear from the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

The COURT took time to consider their judgment. By a majority the appeal was allowed, Lord ESHER, M.R., dissenting.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This was the case of an information by the Attorney-General against the defendants, the executors of the will of Mrs. Frances Louisa Tollemache, in respect of their refusal to bring before the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a "corrective affidavit" required from them by the commissioners under section 41 of 55 Geo. 3, c. 184.

The information alleged that Algernon Gray Tollemache, the husband of Mrs. Frances Louisa Tollemache, died on the 16th of January, 1892, leaving to his wife one-fourth of his residuary estate for her life, and that the said A. G. Tollemache was at the time of his death possessed of personal estate exceeding in estimated value £1,250,000, and that her said personal estate included large sums, amounting in the whole to upwards of £400,000, invested on mortgages of real estate in New Zealand. The information then alleged that Frances Louisa Tollemache died on the 15th of April, 1893, having by her will appointed the defendants her executors, bequeathing her residuary personal estate to them upon trust for sale and conversion: and that the defendants proved her will in the Probate Division of the High Court. In the affidavits made by the defendants under section 38 of 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, for the purpose of obtaining probate, they specified the estimated value of the estate and effects of their testatrix for and in respect of which the probate was to be granted, at a certain sum. The defendants included as part of the estate of their testatrix one-fourth share of the estate of A. G. Tollemache given to her by his will, exclusive of the said New Zealand mortgages; but they did not include and they claim to exclude in estimating the value of such one-fourth share the whole of the said New Zealand mortgage securities. The information stated that the residuary estate of A. G. Tollemache had not been distributed at the time of the death of Frances Louisa Tollemache, and no part of the New Zealand mortgages had been transferred specifically to the defendants. The information then alleged as follows:—"That the executors of A. G. Tollemache afterwards brought in a residuary account of the estate of A. G. Tollemache, from which it appeared that the net value of the said New Zealand mortgage securities is £447,403 2s. 5d.; and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have accordingly required the defendants, as executors of Frances Louisa Tollemache, to bring in under section 41 a 'corrective affidavit,' and to include the sum of £111,850 15s. 7d. (being one-fourth of £447,403 2s. 5d.) as part of the estate and effects liable to probate duty of the said Frances Louisa Tollemache, but the defendants refused," &c. The prayer of the information is "that it may be declared that the said sum of £111,850 15s. 7d. (being one-fourth of £447,403 2s. 5d., the value of the mortgage securities in New Zealand, forming part of the residuary personal estate of the said A. G. Tollemache) ought to have been included in the value for the purposes of probate duty of the personal estate of the said Frances Louisa Tollemache, and that the said sum was and is liable to duty, &c., and that the defendants may be ordered to pay the amount of such duty, with interest, to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue."

The answer of the defendants did not vary the facts stated in the information. What the information claimed was that £111,850 15s. 7d. ought to have been included, not that the value of a right of action should be included.

The case was heard before the Lord Chief Justice of England and Charles, J. It was contended before them and before us on behalf of the Crown that the only right of the defendants as to the New Zealand mortgages is a right as against the executors of Algernon Gray Tollemache to have his estate administered, and that such right is an asset of the estate of Frances Louisa Tollemache, and is an English asset. It was contended for the defendants that the right of action is not an asset at all of the estate of Frances Louisa Tollemache; that an asset of her estate was her share of New Zealand mortgage debts, but that such debts were payable in New Zealand, and the payment of them could be enforced only in New Zealand; that, therefore, they were, and her share in them was, a foreign asset, and therefore they were not liable to probate duty here.

The first question seems to be, What is in this case the asset which can be brought within the purview of the statute as to probate duties? The question is not, What in some courts or under some jurisdictions is called, and properly called, an asset? but what is in this case the asset within sections 38 and 41 and the schedule (Part III.) of 55 Geo. 3, c. 184? It is to be observed that the word "asset" is not used in section 38 or section 41, or in the schedule (Part III.). What is to be brought into the affidavit in section 38, and is to be subjected to the duty under section 41, is, according to the terms used in the statute, "the value of the estate and effects of the testator"; and the duty to be paid is a sum of money regulated by the money value of the estate and effects. The words "estate and effects" are, according to the decisions, to be limited to personal estate and effects. The value in money of anything which is called personal estate in English law is the money amount for which it can or could be sold on a fair sale. This description can be applied to a share of New Zealand mortgage debts.

It cannot be applied to the suggested "right of action." A law suit may be a suit in equity or an action at law. In either case the question to be determined by it is, What were the rights of the parties before the suit or action was commenced? The law suit does not create the right; it determines authoritatively that there was, before it began, a right, and it determines what that right was and is. What is called "right of action" is not the power of bringing an action. Anybody can bring an action, though he has no right at all. The meaning of the phrase is that the person has a right or claim before the action which is determined by the action to be a valid right or claim. The action or suit does not confer a right which did not exist before it; it only declares that a right did exist before it. An action or suit is therefore mere procedure. An action with regard to a will is no part of the estate of the testator; it is a procedure or means of determining authoritatively what was or was not a part of his estate, what was or was not an asset of his estate. In this case, therefore, the right of action by her executors against the executors of A. G. Tollemache was no part of the estate of Frances Louisa Tollemache; but her right to a share of the New Zealand mortgage debts was a part or asset of her estate.

The next question then is, Was that right an asset of her estate liable to pay probate duty, and ought the value of it therefore to have been disclosed in the affidavit under section 38 or in the corrective affidavit under section 41? The personal estate of a person must almost always consist of different parts. The affidavit made under section 38 in practice, in specifying what is the value of the estate, sets out the different items or parts of which it consists; and each of these items or parts is called an asset of—i.e., a part of—the whole estate in respect of which probate duty is to be paid. Now it is not every asset of the estate that is to be valued for duty, but only such of the assets of the estate as were at the date of the death of the testator locally within the jurisdiction of the authority which grants the probate. This authority, which was formerly the Ordinary, is now the Court of Probate. The distinction between assets of the estate which are liable to probate duty and assets of the estate which are not liable to probate duty, though both are assets of the estate, was laid down, and the reasons were given for it in 1831 by Lord Lyndhurst, C.B., in Attorney-General v. Dimond, 1 Cr. & J. 356, p. 369. The distinction depends upon the locality of the asset at the time of the testator's death. If the locality is outside the jurisdiction, the asset is called a foreign asset, and is not liable. Where the asset is a specific tangible article there can be no difficulty in determining its locality. Where the asset is not a specific article, but what is called a chose in action, rules have been laid down to determine its locality. As to debts due to the testator at the time of his death, the rule to be deduced from the cases is, that if the debtor is at the date of the death of the testator abroad, and the debt is payable only abroad, and could only be got from him abroad, either by some act to be done there or some proceeding taken there, the debt is a foreign asset; but if, although the debtor is abroad, a legal proceeding could be taken here which would in law directly order and enforce the payment here of the debt, then the debt is an asset here, liable to probate duty. Thus in Attorney-General v. Dimond, the testator was a creditor of the French Government for 32,727*l.* of Rentes at 5 per cent. These were only payable by the French Government, the debtor, in France, and payment could only be obtained by some act done in France. It was for that reason held that the debt, the asset, was not such an asset as was liable to pay probate duty in England. So, in Attorney-General v. Hope, in 1834 (1 C. M. & R. 530), it was held in the House of Lords that goods in America at the date of the death of the testator, sent there by the testator for sale by his agents, and debts—both simple and contract debts, due to him in America, and money in American funds, were not liable to probate duty here, although all would eventually come to the hands of the executors here. So, in Pearse v. Pearse, 9 Sim. 430, in 1838, by Shadwell, V.C., notes of the Government of India, payable in India, were held not liable, because they were payable only in India. In Attorney-General v. Bouwens, 4 M. & W. 171, Dutch bonds due to the testator were held liable, but it was because they were payable in England. The case of Attorney-General v. Higgins, is really to the same effect. The head office of the railway company was in Scotland. The shares were therefore payable in Scotland. It was held that the executor ought to have exhibited an inventory in Scotland. In the present case the mortgage debt was payable by the mortgagor in New Zealand; the debtor was, at the time of the death of the testatrix, Frances Louisa Tollemache, in New Zealand, and no action could be brought in England by the defendants directly against the New Zealand mortgagor to obtain an order for, and recover payment of, the mortgage debt. The action by the defendants against the executors of A. G. Tollemache would not obtain the mortgage debts; it would oblige the executors of A. G. Tollemache to bring another action in New Zealand against the New Zealand mortgagors. Therefore, within the authority of all the cases, the New Zealand mortgage debts and the one-fourth share of them in which Frances Louisa Tollemache was interested were a foreign asset, and were properly omitted by the defendants from the affidavit under section 38, and the corrective affidavit under section 41, unless a different decision is to be the result in this court, from a consideration of the case before Lord Hannen, In the Goods of Ewing, in 1881. I cannot think that the case affords any authority upon any question in this case. It was an application by a legatee under the will of William Ewing to the Court of Probate to appoint an administrator of the will in England, although the executors of the will were duly administering the will which had been proved in Scotland. The Crown was no party to the application, and was not before the court. No question of probate duty arose or could arise at that stage. What was said by Lord Hannen may be authority for saying that the right of Frances Louisa Tollemache to a fourth share of the residue of A. G. Tollemache's estate, including the New Zealand mortgage debts, is an asset of the estate of Frances Louisa Tollemache. That is not denied. But nothing said by Lord Hannen goes to show that it is not a foreign asset. If it does show that, it is contrary to all other authorities. And certainly nothing is said in that case to show that Lord Hannen thought that an action or suit could be an asset of an estate. The claim of the Attorney-General is in form right—namely, that the value of the mortgage debt, not the value of the cause of action, should have been included. But that claim, so rightly stated, cannot be sustained.

I agree with the Lord Chief Justice and Charles, J., and am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The executors of Frances Louisa Tollemache are entitled to a fourth part of the residuary estate of her husband, Algernon Tollemache. A sum of £111,850 15*s.* 7*d.*, part of such residuary estate, is the value of the one-fourth part of certain mortgages in New Zealand. The Crown claims probate duty on this sum. The executors resist the claim on the ground that the £111,850 15s. 7d. is a foreign, and not an English, asset, and, therefore, not subject to probate duty. The question is whether such sum is a foreign or English asset. I have come to the conclusion that it is an English asset, for the reasons which I will shortly give. [His lordship then stated the facts, and proceeded:—] It is to be observed that neither Frances nor her executors could claim any part of this estate in specie. The executors of her husband were not trustees of the estate for her; all she was entitled to was her proportion of the proceeds of her husband's estate after realization. Neither Frances nor her executors had any claim against these mortgagors to recover the mortgage debt or any portion of it. That was a claim enforcable only by the executors of Algernon. The right of the executors of Frances as against the executors of her husband is a right to have his estate administered. Administered where? The husband was domiciled in England, his will was proved in England, his executors are in England, and his estate is being administered in England, and the money recoverable will be brought to England. The executors of the husband can only be sued in the English courts by the executors of Frances. It is an English chose in action recoverable in England, and is, in my opinion, an English and not a foreign asset, and as such is subject to probate duty here. In re Ewing is in point, a case which, I think, is rightly decided.

The appeal will be allowed.

KAY, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion as that expressed by Lopes, L.J. In this information the Crown claims probate duty on the estate of Frances Louisa Tollemache, who died in 1893. Her executors resist the claim as to £111,850 15s. 7d., part of such estate, on the ground that this sum is the value of one-fourth share of certain mortgages in New Zealand which, it is said by the terms of them, were not to be called in until a time which has not yet arrived. It is alleged that Frances was entitled at the time of her death to one fourth share of these mortgages. They were not vested in her. They were the property of her deceased husband, Algernon Gray Tollemache, who died in 1892, having by will given the income of his real and personal estate to her and his two sisters jointly for life, and, subject thereto and to another life estate which has expired, one fourth of the residuary personal estate to her absolutely. The other three fourths were divided by his will among a number of other persons. The testator empowered his executors to leave his residuary personal estate invested as they should find it at the time of his death, unless they thought proper to change any investment. The executors of Algernon retained the New Zealand mortgages and obtained a transfer of them into their own names. But the residue was not divided, of course, during the life of Frances, who was tenant for life of the whole estate jointly with the testator's two sisters.

It is evident from this short statement that the New Zealand mortgages were not assets of Frances, nor was any part of them. Neither she nor her executors could claim any part of them in specie. They could not sue the mortgagors to recover the mortgage moneys. Those mortgages were, in fact, outstanding assets of Algernon. The only right of Frances' executors was to call upon Algernon's executors to realize his estate, get in his outstanding assets, convert them into money, and, when the time for division arrives, to divide such proceeds among the residuary legatees of Algernon. The executors of Frances could not compel Algernon's executors to transfer to them any of the New Zealand mortgages in respect of her fourth share of the residue. That could only be done if these mortgages happened to remain unconverted when all debts and legacies were paid and the residue became divisible and all the residuary legatees agreed that the mortgages should remain unconverted.

What in law is the interest of Frances' executors in the estate of Algernon? It is a right to recover from Algernon's executors one fourth of the clear residue of his estate. So far as such residue consists of personal property, that is a chose in action. What is its locality? Algernon was domiciled in England. His will was proved here. His executors are in the country. They can only be sued by Frances' executors in the English court. It is therefore an English chose in action. If this be so, it seems to me that upon such an asset probate duty is payable. If Algernon had outstanding assets in many parts of the world I do not see how that would make any difference. The one-fourth share of this residuary estate which belonged to Frances would still be an English asset, because neither she nor her executors would have any right to any of such investments in specie.

It is suggested that Algernon's executors were trustees of one-fourth share of these mortgages for Frances' executors, and that therefore the case is the same as though Frances had invested her own money in mortgages in New Zealand in the names of trustees for herself. But the difference is that in that case she could have compelled the trustees to transfer such mortgages to herself. That seems to me the distinction between the supposed case and the present, and, in my opinion, makes an essential difference. In strictness, Frances' executors are only entitled to receive her one-fourth share of Algernon's estate in English money. I cannot see how this can escape probate duty.

In the case of In re Ewing, John Orr Ewing died in April, 1878. He was domiciled in Scotland and was entitled to a share in a Scotch partnership, which share was valued at £400,000 and was payable to his estate by ten annual instalments. By his will he gave certain annuities, and subject to them a legacy of one-sixth of £60,000 to his nephew, William Ewing, and he also gave to him one-sixth of his residuary estate. His will was proved in Scotland. Part of his assets at the time of his death were in England. William Ewing died in December, 1878, before he had received his share of John Orr Ewing's estate or the legacy to him. W. Ewing was domiciled in Scotland and his will was proved there by his executors.

A legatee under William Ewing's will cited his executors to accept or to refuse probate of his will in England or to show cause why administration with the will annexed should not be granted in England to such legatee. William had no assets in England except of trifling value. The ground of the application was, in the words of Sir James Hannen, "that the claim of the estate of William Ewing on the estate of his uncle, John Orr Ewing, is an asset of Mr. Ewing's estate in England by reason of some of the assets of the uncle's estate having been in England at the time of W. Ewing's death." That is the precise point raised in this case. The exemption from duty is claimed here on the ground that, the New Zealand mortgages being in existence at the death of Frances, the claim of her executors on the estate of Algernon is to that extent an asset in New Zealand.

Sir James Hannen rejected this contention. I cannot assent to the argument that what he said was obiter. It seems to me to be the ground of his decision. These are his words: "The claim of the executors of W. Ewing in respect of the interest of their testator under his uncle's will is a claim on the executors of the uncle duly to administer his estate and to pay the legacy to W. Ewing out of the funds which may be applicable to that purpose. It cannot be disputed that this claim or interest in the estate of the uncle constitutes an asset of the estate of the deceased W. Ewing, because it is recoverable by the executors of W. Ewing virtute officii, but it appears to me that it is an asset in Scotland, and not in England. . . . The fact that some of the assets of J. O. Ewing were situate in England does not appear to make any difference. If I were to constitute the applicant administrator with the will annexed by W. Ewing, he could not in that character take possession of or recover the outstanding assets of the uncle's estate; he could not claim those assets themselves virtute officii, his only remedy would still be through and by means of his claim upon the executors of the uncle to have the estate duty administered." On these grounds Sir J. Hannen refused the application. The decision, or the reasons for it, are not binding on this court if we disagreed with them, but I must say that I agree with the reasons and decision entirely. This decision was referred to in Laidlay v. The Lord Advocate. A domiciled Scotchman was partner in a firm for working indigo and silk concerns in India. Probate was claimed on his share. There were sixteen partners, all of whom except two were resident in the United Kingdom. It was held that the seat of the business was in India, and that this must be treated as the locality of the testator's interest in the firm, and consequently that this interest was exempt from probate duty in England. In the Goods of Ewing was only referred to for a dictum of Sir J. Hannen to the effect that the locality of the share of a deceased partner would be the place where the business was carried on. But no doubt was cast upon the decision in In the Goods of Ewing.

I am compelled, with deference to the court below, to differ from their decision. I think the New Zealand mortgages were not an asset of Frances' estate. Her executors have no right virtute officii to any part of the mortgages. Their only right in respect of them is to call upon the English executors of Algernon to get in his outstanding personal estate and to convert and divide it when the time for division arrives. That right is, in my opinion, a part of Frances' estate whose locality is England, and its value, as in the case of all English assets, is subject to probate duty in England. I think that the appeal should be allowed, with costs here and below.

In re Macduff.
Macduff v. Macduff. (a.)

Will—Construction—Charity—Bequest for charitable or philanthropic purposes—Validity.

A testator by his will bequeathed a sum of money to be appropriated for some one or more purposes "charitable, philanthropic, or ."

Held, that this bequest was not invalid simply by reason of the blank; but

Held, further, that as the word "philanthropic" was wide enough to comprise purposes not within the technical meaning of "charitable," the gift was invalid.

By his will, dated the 24th of July, 1889, the Rev. J. R. Macduff, "formerly minister of Sandyford Church and parish, Glasgow, but now having my domicile in England," by clause (1) appointed his daughter, Annie Seaton Macduff, and A. Macduff and H. Macduff executors and trustees of his will, and by clause (2) he bequeathed all his property for the behoof, in the first instance, of his said daughter, the entire interest of the same to be enjoyed by her during her lifetime, with the reservation of certain legacies therein mentioned. By clause (7) he declared that "the aforesaid provisions or legacies are to come into immediate, or almost immediate, settlement at my death. The following and far more important bequest is for the future, and is retained under the seal of secrecy until my daughter's death, when my aforesaid trustees are empowered to open it. But until that time it is sacredly to be retained by my daughter, Annie S. Macduff, the provisions of the same being contingent on her wishes and other private considerations. It contains the bequest of a considerable sum of money for a purpose or purposes which cannot at present be disclosed, and the destination of which may be altered or modified at her discretion or, failing her, others whose names will be engrossed in this special deed." And all the rest of his property he gave absolutely to his said daughter. The testator made two codicils to his will which were not material on the present question. The testator also executed the following document, which was dated the 27th of August, 1889, and admitted to probate together with the said will and codicils:—"Special private and contingent bequests embodied at p. 3, paragraph No. 7, in my will dated the 24th of July, 1889.—As said private and contingent bequests are not to take effect in my daughter's lifetime, but only come into operation at her death, my two trustees mentioned in aforesaid will and settlement are then empowered to open this document and carry its provisions into execution, with any new specification or alteration that may have been resolved on by my daughter and left in her handwriting at the end of these presents. I, John Ross Macduff, will from my estate the entire sum of £10,000 to be appropriated and allocated for some one or more purposes charitable, philanthropic, or . The precise purpose or purposes I would desire to be named by my daughter, Annie S. Macduff. But should she from any cause fail or be unable to indicate these, I leave the elder surviving sons of my brothers, in co-operation with any others in whose wisdom and experience they can thoroughly rely, to see my wishes carried into effect. I am unable personally to tie myself down to any specific scheme, as many objects supremely claimant to-day may cease to be so after a series of years, while others at present undreamt of may be found urgent."

The testator died on the 30th of April, 1895, leaving his said daughter his heiress-at-law and sole next of kin.

On the 8th of July, 1895, an originating summons, to which her co-executors and her Majesty's Attorney-General were defendants, was taken out by the daughter (who was also residuary legatee under the will), asking (1) whether any bequest of £10,000 to take effect on the death of the said Annie S. Macduff was effectually made by the will and codicils of the said testator for any charitable or other purpose; and (2) whether the executors were at liberty, subject to providing for the payment of the testator's debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses, and the legacies effectually given by the said will, to assign forthwith to the said Annie S. Macduff the whole of the testator's personalty.

Hadley, for the plaintiff, the residuary legatee, argued that the bequest was invalid first, for uncertainty, by reason of the blank; and secondly, because the word philanthropic has a meaning wide enough to include purposes other than charitable purposes in the legal sense.

He referred to James v. Allen, 3 Mer. 17; Ellis v. Selby, 1 My. & Cr. 286; Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 10 Ves. 522; Williams v. Kershaw, 5 Cl. & F. 111, n.; Kendall v. Granger, 5 Beav. 300.

Whitworth, for the defendant trustees.

Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General, argued that the gift was valid as a gift to charitable purposes generally. The blank did not render the gift void for uncertainty: Illingworth v. Cooke, 9 Hare 37; Gill v. Bagshaw, 14 W. R. 1013, L. R. 2 Eq. 746. The word charitable was used to denote purposes within the popular meaning of the word, whilst the word philanthropic comprised purposes charitable within the technical and not within the popular sense.

STIRLING, J.—This summons raises a question as to the validity of a certain gift in the will of the Rev. J. R. Macduff. By his will the testator describes himself as "formerly minister of Sandyford Church and parish, Glasgow, but now having my domicile in England," and I desire to say that this case has been argued, and will be decided by me on the footing that that statement as to the domicile of the testator is according to the fact; for this reason, that there appears to be a difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland upon the point in dispute.

That being so, the testator, after giving legacies of various kinds, proceeds thus: [His lordship read the provision of the will and document above stated.] Now, the question is as to the validity of that disposition of £10,000. It was urged on behalf of the residuary legatee that that gift was invalid first, by reason of the blank left after the words "charitable, philanthropic, or "; and secondly, because the word philanthropic has a wider meaning than the word charitable, and would comprise purposes not within the technical meaning of the word charitable.

Now as regards the first of these objections, I think that this gift cannot be held to be bad simply by reason of the existence of the blank. The testator seems to have wished further to consider whether the sum he mentions should be devoted to any purposes, whether charitable or philanthropic; he never came to any final determination on the subject; and the will, in my opinion, ought to be read as if it had run thus: "for some one or more purposes, charitable, philanthropic, or of such other nature as I may hereafter name by codicil;" and then that the testator had died without making a codicil. The effect of this would be that the sum mentioned would be applicable for charitable or philanthropic purposes only. See Illingworth v. Cooke and Gill v. Bagshaw.

The question then arises whether a bequest for "charitable or philanthropic purposes" is valid according to the law of England. In order that it may be valid, the purposes as defined by the testator's will must be "charitable" in the technical sense in which that word is used in this court. The contention for the Attorney-General was that the word "charitable" in the will was not to be understood in the technical, but in the popular sense, while the word "philanthropic" was used to designate other purposes which, though not charitable in the popular sense, are nevertheless charitable in the technical sense. On the other hand, it was urged that, among philanthropic purposes may doubtless be included many which are charitable in the technical sense, but also many which are not.

In James v. Allen Sir W. Grant, M.R., had to consider a bequest for "benevolent" purposes. He says: "The question is, What authority would this court have to say that the property must not be applied to purposes, however benevolent, unless they also come within the technical denominations of charitable purposes. If it might, consistently with the will, be applied to other than strictly charitable purposes, the trust is too indefinite for the court to execute." It was held that the gift was invalid.

In Kendall v. Granger the bequest was to be applied for amongst objects "encouraging undertakings of general utility." Lord Langdale, M.R., says (at p. 303): "Now, a charitable purpose may very well, I conceive, be a purpose of general utility; but the question, which seems to me to arise in this case, as in the case of a gift to benevolent purposes, is, are all purposes of general utility necessarily such purposes as this court deems to be charitable? I own that, in my opinion, according to the decisions which have taken place in this court, they are not. The words general utility are so large, that they comprehend purposes which are not charitable, and, comprising purposes which are not charitable, the trustees have an option to apply them to purposes which are not charitable, and consequently to divert the trust fund from those purposes which this court is in the habit of considering charitable. I do not venture to say that I am well satisfied with all the decisions that have taken place on this subject. I think that there are older cases, showing perhaps that the court would, in a case where charitable purposes were mentioned, have taken care that the application should have been made to those purposes; but I do not feel myself at liberty to depart from the decisions which have been made on the subject. Conceiving myself bound by authority, I must declare that this is not a trust which can be carried into effect as a charitable purpose."

I respectfully agree with the concluding observations of Lord Langdale; but I am not at liberty, any more than he was, to depart from the decisions. The question is whether philanthropic purposes can be effectively distinguished from benevolent purposes or purposes of general utility. "Philanthropic," no doubt, is a word of narrower meaning than "benevolent"; an act may be benevolent if it indicates goodwill to a particular individual only, whereas an act cannot be said to be philanthropic unless it indicates goodwill to mankind at large. Still, it seems to me that the word "philanthropic" is wide enough to comprise purposes which are not charitable in the technical sense, and consequently that the trust declared by the testator cannot be supported.

DUFFIELD v. WILLIAMS. (a.)

Practice — Parties — Bankruptcy of defendant — Receiving order — Official receiver wrongfully added as a party to the action—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 17, r. 4 —Bankruptcy Acts, 1883 and 1890.

The mere making of a receiving order does not cause any change or transmission of interest or liability.

Consequently, where a receiving order had been made against the defendant in an action, and an ex parte order adding the official receiver as a defendant thereto obtained by the plaintiff under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 17, r. 4, the latter order, upon the application of the official receiver, was discharged.

This was a summons taken out by Mr. Llewellyn Hugh Jones, the official receiver at Wrexham, and acting in the bankruptcy of John Lewis, one of the defendants in the above action, asking that an ex parte order, dated the 4th of November, 1895, whereby he was added as a defendant in the action, might be discharged.

The defendants Williams and Lewis were the executors and trustees of the will and codicil of the testatrix, Ann Berry, deceased, who died on the 14th of January, 1879.

On the 14th of March, 1894, an action for accounts, inquiries, and, if necessary, administration, of the estate of the testatrix was instituted against Williams and Lewis by the persons beneficially interested in the estate of the testatrix.

On the 30th of April, 1894, an order was made for an account, and the chief clerk, by his certificate dated the 5th of April, 1895, certified the sum of £2,245 3s. 5d. to be due from the defendants.

The defendants took out a summons to vary the said certificate, and the plaintiffs likewise issued a summons for payment into court of the said sum of £2,245 3s. 5d., both of which were still pending.

On the 24th of June, 1895, a receiving order was made against the defendant Lewis, on his own application, by the Wrexham County Court, and the official receiver, the said Llewellyn Hugh Jones, became the receiver of his the defendant Lewis's estate.

The said Lewis was not, however, adjudicated a bankrupt.

By an order made on the 4th of November, 1895, under ord. 17, r. 4, on the application of the plaintiffs, the said L. H. Jones was added as a defendant to this action, and from this order the said L. H. Jones now sought to be relieved.

M. Ingle Joyce, for the official receiver and the Board of Trade.—An official receiver cannot be made a party to an action before there has been an adjudication and he has been appointed a trustee, because the property of the debtor remains vested in the debtor, and not in the official receiver, until his appointment as trustee. In any event these proceedings can only be taken against the trustee with the leave of the Bankruptcy Court (Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 9). The official receiver is only the receiver of the property of the debtor (section 57), and no proceedings can be taken against him: Rhodes v. Dawson, 34 W. R. 240, 16 Q. B. D. 548-553; Watson v. Holliday, 31 W. R. 536.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and D. Begg, for the plaintiffs in the action.—The case is provided for by R.S.C. ord. 17, s. 4. The effect of the receiving order is to cause a change in the interest of the defendant, although no transmission of interest has occurred. The plaintiffs must continue the official receiver as a defendant, because the action is for a breach of trust from which the defendant Lewis is not relieved by section 30. The plaintiffs shall have to prove against his estate in bankruptcy. The action must, however, proceed in this court where it began. The plaintiffs are entitled to bring anybody here who has become interested, and the official receiver is very much interested. There may never be a trustee appointed. Section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 does not apply where an action has been commenced. Official receivers have been made parties to proceedings before this: Sartoris v. Sartoris, 40 W. R. 82, [1892] 1 Ch. 11, 22. It is true that the property does not vest in the official receiver, but the debtor becomes a mere iustrument for the purpose of getting it in. Till there is a final discharge or release an action against a sole defendant proceeds against him and his trustee: Ex parte Coker, 24 W. R. 145, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 652. The plaintiff has to establish a debt against the estate and the trustee is a necessary party: Barter & Co. v. Dubeux & Co., 29 W. R. 622, 7 Q. B. D. 413-417. If there had been an adjudication it would have been a matter of course to make the trustee a party. The plaintiffs are equally entitled to make the official receiver a party in order to bind the debtor's estate. He need not appear unless he wishes to do so.

Ingle Joyce, in reply.—On the merits of this case there is no reason for adding the official receiver as a party. The defendants' liability is joint and several, so the plaintiffs can go on with their summons without us. The debtor's estate is bound by the certificate unless we apply to vary it. But we dispute this point on general principles: Lloyd v. Dimmack, 26 W. R. 458, 7 Ch. D. 398. Most of the cases cited were under the Bankruptcy Act of 1869. The only essential difference between that Act and the Act of 1883 is section 168, but that section is material. Court in that section means the Court of Bankruptcy. Proceedings cannot be continued without leave against a trustee. In Sartoris v. Sartoris the official receiver made no objection to being added as a party. There is no provision in the Act that an official receiver may be sued, and you cannot fetter him by an order: Emma Silver Mining Co. v. Grant, 29 W. R. 481, 17 Ch. D. 122-131.

STIRLING, J. [after stating the facts, continued:] The order is sought to be justified under ord. 17, r. 4, which is as follows: — "Where, by reason of marriage, death, or bankruptcy, or any other event occurring after the commencement of a cause or matter and causing a change or transmission of interest or liability, ... it becomes necessary or desirable that any person not already a party should be made a party . . . . , an order that the proceedings shall be carried on between the continuing parties and such new party or parties may be obtained ex parte on application to the court or a judge, upon an allegation of such change or transmission of interest or liability, or of such person interested having come into existence."

It is said that an event—i.e., the making of a receiving order—has occurred since the commencement of the action, "causing a change or transmission of interest or liability," which renders it necessary or desirable that a person not already a party—i.e., the official receiver—should be made a party to the action. In order to decide whether or not this is so, it will be necessary to carefully consider the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts now in force. The sections which appear to me to be material to the present question are these: Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 5, 8, 9, 10, sub-section 2; ss. 15, 19, 20, 39, 57, 68, 70, 72; schedule I. of the same Act, rules 1, 8, 9; schedule II., rules 2, 22, 27; Bankruptcy Act, 1890, ss. 3, 12, 14, 16, 17. [His lordship read the sections of the Bankruptcy Acts enumerated above, and continued:—] On these sections it appears to me that no estate or interest has become vested in the official receiver: Rhodes v. Dawson. I think, therefore, that the making of the receiving order has not caused any change or transmission of interest, and if the defendant Lewis had been a plaintiff in the action, asserting his rights against some person or persons in this court, it appears to me that the defendant or defendants in such an action could not have insisted that, under ord. 17, r. 4, the official receiver ought to be made a party to the action.

Now at what time, according to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts, will a change, or transmission of interest or liability occur? One or other of the three following events may happen—i.e.: (1) The defendant may be adjudicated a bankrupt; (2) a composition or scheme may be made; (3) the defendant may pay his debts. If the first event happen, the estate will vest in the trustee in bankruptcy, and then there will be a change of interest; if the second event occur and a composition is accepted and approved, then under section 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, I think that a change of liability will only be caused when the scheme or composition has become binding—that is to say, when it has been accepted by the creditors and approved by the court. Whether or not the change of liability entails a change of interest depends on whether or not the scheme provides for the appointment of a trustee in whom the debtor's property is vested. In the third event—i.e., if the defendant pay his debts—of course, no change of interest or liability will take place. Consequently I think that no change in interest or liability will occur until a composition or scheme has been approved by the court, or an adjudication in bankruptcy has been made.

Now, it may be (as the cases cited to me in argument appear to show) that, subject to the question of obtaining the leave of the Bankruptcy Court under section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the plaintiffs in this action will be entitled to join the trustee in bankruptcy, or of any composition or scheme, as a party under ord. 17, r. 4, because a change of liability or interest will have occurred; but I think that the official receiver stands in an entirely different position, for he has no estate vested in him, nor has he any power to bring or defend actions, which, of course, the trustee in bankruptcy may do. The object of his appointment is to protect the estate (section 5). His duties, so far as they relate to the administration of the estate, are confined to its management and protection, and his powers for that purpose are defined by reference to those of a receiver appointed by the High Court (section 70, sub-sections 1 and 2). He has no power as official receiver to divide the estate or any part of it among creditors, a thing which may be done by the trustee in a bankruptcy or of a scheme or composition. He has power to receive and deal with proofs, but only because the persons who may vote at meetings must first have proved as creditors. I think that sections 9 and 10 of the Act of 1883 show by their language that the official receiver was not intended to be mixed up in actions pending against the debtor. Section 9 prohibits the "commencing" of actions or proceedings, and I agree with the opinion expressed by North, J., in In re Wray, 36 W. R. 67, 36 Ch. D. 138-143, that it has no reference to proceedings actually pending against the debtor personally at the date of the receiving order. Such pending proceedings are dealt with by section 10. Sub-section 1 of this section applies to the interval between the presentation of the petition and the making of the receiving order; but sub-section 2 applies at any time after the presentation of the petition. The idea seems to be that actions and other proceedings pending against the debtor are to go on unless stayed either by the Court of Bankruptcy or the court in which they are pending in the exercise of the discretion vested in it. In this case the Bankruptcy Court has not seen fit to interfere, and I do not think that this court ought to interfere until there occurs a change of interest or liability within the meaning of ord. 17, r. 4, which in my opinion has not yet happened.

I think, therefore, the order must be discharged.

Company — Shares — Declaration of dividends — Unclaimed dividends — Winding up — Statute of Limitations.

The declaration of a dividend by a company on its shares constitutes a debt which becomes payable to the shareholder in respect of his dividend, and the Statute of Limitations begins to run immediately.

The mere declaration of a dividend will not make a company a trustee of the dividend for the shareholder to whom it is payable.

The reasons upon which the rule is founded that the Statute of Limitations does not run in respect of a claim between partners during the continuance of the partnership do not apply to a claim for unpaid dividends between a shareholder of an incorporated company and the company.

This was a summons taken out by the liquidators of the above-named company, to which Josephine Robbins and E. B. Haygarth, the persons entitled to take out representation to the estate of William Robbins, deceased, a holder of stock in the above-named company, W. Lee, the legal personal representative of John Sherborne, deceased, who was another holder of stock in the said company, and the Sharpness New Docks and Gloucester and Birmingham Navigation Co., who were holders of stocks in the said company, entitled to participate in the division of the residuary assets of the said company under the Act 57 & 58 Vict. c. 189, s. 7, were respondents, for the determination of the following question—namely, whether the sums of £753 11s. 3d. and £349 4s. 3d., respectively representing unclaimed dividends which accrued upon the stocks respectively held by the said W. Robbins and John Sherborne respectively, prior to the year 1874, and which remained in the hands of the said liquidator, should be paid to the respective legal personal representatives of the said W. Robbins and John Sherborne; or whether they ought to be treated as part of the general assets of the said company available for distribution as such amongst the preference and ordinary stockholders as provided by the said Act.

The Severn and Wye Railway and Canal Co.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(hereafter called the "original company") was incorporated by Act of Parliament in the year 1809, and under an Act passed in 1879 the "original company" and the Severn Bridge Railway Co. were amalgamated, and the shareholders were united into one company and incorporated under the name of the Severn and Wye and Severn Bridge Railway Co. (the above-named company). The original company was prosperous in its early days, and paid dividends half-yearly on the production to its bankers of a notice issued by the secretary to the shareholders, and on their signing a special form of receipt.

Under the authority of an Act passed in 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 189) called the "Transfer Act," the above-named company sold its undertaking to the Great Western and Midland Railway Cos.

This Act also provided that the amalgamated company should be wound up as if it were a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, and had passed a special resolution for winding up voluntarily.

After providing for payments required by the Act of 1894, it was anticipated that there would be a surplus in the hands of the liquidators of £2,000, inclusive of £1,238 representing unclaimed dividends declared by the original company prior to 1873, and this surplus was, under the "Transfer Act," to be divided amongst the preference and ordinary shareholders of the above-named company in certain proportions.

By a scheme sanctioned by the court on the 20th of June, 1885, the share capital of the company had been consolidated and converted into (1) preference A stock, (2) preference B stock, (3) preference C stock, and (4) ordinary stock.

Prior to the amalgamation the dividends appeared in a dividend ledger of the original company, and this practice was continued in the same book after the amalgamation and down to the 30th of June, 1885, each shareholder having an account in the ledger.

In December, 1885, these were written off the dividend ledger and transferred to the general ledger to an account headed "Unpaid dividends," the whole being aggregated, and that account had ever since remained in the general ledger. In the half-yearly published accounts down to June, 1885, these dividends were entered under one item of "unpaid dividends and interest," but in subsequent half-yearly published accounts they were included in an item called "sundry outstanding accounts." The company had in some cases paid dividends which had been unclaimed for over six years. The £1,238 was made up entirely of unclaimed dividends on stock which represented shares in the original company, such dividends having all been declared more than twenty years ago.

The original shares in the original company were of the nominal value of £50 each, and there were subsequent issues of the nominal value of £20 and £10 each.

J. Sherborne was in 1810 the proprietor of ten ordinary £50 shares in the original company. These shares were by the scheme of 1885 converted in £250 of the ordinary stock of the amalgamated company. Dividends were paid on the shares from 1810 to 1855, after which date dividends accumulated down to November, 1873, when dividends ceased to be declared on that class of stock.

With regard to Robbins the circumstances were the same as those in Sherborne's case, with the exception of some difference in the dates prior to 1873, which is not material for the purposes of this report.

The Sharpness, &c., Navigation Co. were the holders of the classes of stock included in the scheme of 1885 mentioned above.

Frederic Thompson, for the liquidator, raised the Statute of Limitations.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Rowden, for the Sharpness, &c., Navigation Co.—The claim for unpaid dividends is barred by the Statute of Limitations. The claim for unpaid dividends is an ordinary simple contract debt, and is barred after six years. The statement in Palmer's Company Precedents, 6th ed., p. 373, that in the absence of a clause in the articles barring the right to unclaimed dividends, it is doubtful whether less than twenty years would bar the right to dividends declared but not claimed is based on the principle that the articles constitute the debt a specialty debt. That is not applicable to this case. Sherborne's and Robbins' representatives will probably rely on Barton v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., 36 W. R. 754, 38 Ch. D. 458, but that was a different case. Their claim is barred by the Statute of Limitations, which applies to an action by one partner against his co-partner, and therefore to an action by shareholders against a company. It is true that time only begins to run against a partner from an act of exclusion. From the time at which a dividend becomes payable, and is held by the company for the shareholder, that is what is equivalent to exclusion with respect to the dividend for the purposes of the Statute of Limitations.

They also referred to the Companies Act, 1862, s. 16, and sub-section (i), table A, cl. 76; Lindley on Companies, 5th ed., p. 437; and Bush v. Martin, 12 W. R. 205, 2 H. & C. 311; Smith v. Cork and Bandon Railway Co., Ir. Rep. 5 Eq. 65.

Dibdin and Cann, for Sherborne's and Robbins' representatives.—The company held this money in a fiduciary capacity for the shareholders, and no question of the Statute of Limitations arises. The money was earmarked in the books both of the old and the amalgamated company: Penny v. Pickwick, 16 Beav. 246. There is no exclusion on the analogy of cases of partnership.

They also referred to Gouraud v. Edison-Gower Bell Telephone Co. of Europe, 57 L. J. Ch. 498, 36 W. R. Dig. 68; Lands Allotment Co., 42 W. R. 404, [1894] 1 Ch. 616; Lindley on Partnership, 6th ed., p. 512; and Barton v. North Staffordshire Railway Co.

Vernon Smith replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

ROMER, J.—The liquidators have raised, as they were entitled to do, the defence of the Statute of Limitations in answer to the claims for unpaid dividends, which I have to consider. That defence is, in my opinion, fatal to the claims. The dividends in question were declared and became payable more than twenty years before the present claims were made, and constituted debts due to the shareholders for which they could have sued at law, as was pointed out by Lindley, L.J., in the passage in his treatise on company law (page 437), which was cited in the argument before me. Presumably, therefore, the Statute of Limitations began to run in favour of the company from the time the dividends became payable.

But the claimants contend that the statute never began to run against them, on two grounds. In the first place, they contend that the company was in the position of a trustee for them of these dividends. In my judgment this was not so. The declaration that the dividend was payable did not make the company a trustee of it for the shareholders. Nor did the company or its successor, the amalgamated company constituted by the Act of 1879, ever constitute itself a trustee. In the books of the two companies an account was kept as of a liability in respect of the unclaimed dividends. But the entry in the books of a debtor of a liability to a creditor does not constitute the debtor a trustee of the amount of that liability for the creditor. There was no setting apart of any special part of the assets of the companies as being or representing these dividends, nor was any notice given to the shareholders, or any step taken by the companies, which, so far as I can see, could be treated as putting the companies in the position of trustees or as preventing the Statute of Limitations from running in their favour.

In the next place, the claimants contend that the statute did not run, on the ground that the shareholders and the company were in the position of partners, or in an analogous position. In my opinion that contention is untenable. Nor can I see that the reasons upon which the rule is founded, that the Statute of Limitations does not run in respect of a claim between partners during the continuance of the partnership, apply to a claim for unpaid dividends between the shareholder of an incorporated company and the company. The case of Penny v. Pickwick, relied on by the claimants, was one of a simple partnership which Lord (then Sir John) Romilly held under the circumstances was a continuing partnership. In the case of Barton v. North Staffordshire Railway Co. Lord Justice (then Mr. Justice) Kay decided that where persons entitled as stockholders in a railway company were suing to establish their position as such, their cause of action only arose when the company first refused to treat them as stockholders, and that the Statute of Limitations did not commence to run before that refusal. He did not say that the case was, in fact, analogous to a claim between partners, but only that, if the analogy were applicable, it would support his view, because the statute only runs against a partner from the time of his exclusion. Nor is the claimant's contention supported by the fact that, for many purposes, the directors of the company are held to be in a fiduciary position with regard to their shareholders as shown by by the cases, referred to by the claimants, of Gouraud v. The Edison-Gower Bell Telephone Co. of Europe and In re Lands Allotment Co. For these reasons, in my opinion, the claims fail. I should add that, though I cannot find any decision of the English courts on the point I have had to consider, the view I am taking was expressed in the Irish Court of Appeal by Christian, L.J., in the case of Smith v. Cork and Bandon Railway Co.

LIDDELL (Appellant) v. LOFTHOUSE (Respondent). (a.)

Gaming—Illegal betting—Unlawful user of a place for the purpose of betting—"Place"—Betting Houses Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), s. 3.

The respondent, who was a bookmaker, was on several consecutive days standing on or near the same spot between two stays which supported a hoarding erected on a piece of vacant ground, and was there making bets on horse-races with persons who came to him for the purpose. The vacant ground was not circumscribed otherwise than by the hoarding which partially surrounded it.

Held, that the ground between the stays of the hoarding was a "place" within the meaning of section 3 of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, and that the respondent was guilty of the offence under that section of using a place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto.

Doggett v. Catterns, 13 W. R. 390, and Whitehurst v. Fincher, 17 Cox C. C. 70, distinguished.

Case stated by justices of the borough of Stockton-on-Tees.

An information was preferred by the appellant under the Betting Houses Act, 1853, s. 3, against the respondent, for that he, between the 18th and 20th of June, 1895, at the borough of Stockton-on-Tees, "then being a person using a certain place situate on the river-side of the said borough, and known by the name of "The Betting Ground," did unlawfully use the said place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto upon certain events and contingencies of and relating to certain horse-races contrary to the form," &c.

At the hearing it was proved that "Hubback's Quay" was a piece of vacant land near the quay side, Stockton-on-Tees, and was partly surrounded by a timber hoarding supported by stays driven into the ground, but was not otherwise circumscribed. That on the days mentioned the respondent, with a number of persons, was frequently seen standing in a place between two of the stays of the hoarding and was calling out the odds on horse-races, and offering to lay odds against horses running in the Ascot races, which were then being held, and receiving and paying money and giving betting tickets to those who made bets with him.

There was no restriction upon anybody entering the ground, nor any charge for admission. The ownership of the ground was not proved, and it was not alleged that the respondent was either the owner or occupier of the ground.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the respondent was using a "place"—namely, the space between two of the stays—for the purpose of betting. On the part of the respondent it was contended that this was not a "place" within the meaning of the Act.

The justices were of opinion that it was very doubtful whether the respondent was using a place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto within the meaning of the Act, and the cases decided thereon, and they dismissed the information.

The question for the court was whether that decision was correct.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C. (Simey, with him), for the appellant.—The magistrates ought to have convicted. The evidence shows that the respondent was using a place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto within the meaning of sections 1 and 3 of the Betting Houses Act, 1853. It is not necessary that a place within those sections should be a definitely circumscribed area as long as there is some fixed spot where the betting is carried on: Shaw v. Morley, 16 W. R. 763, L. R. 3 Ex. 137; Bows v. Fenwick, 22 W. R. 804, L. R. 9 C. P. 339; Gallaway v. Maries, 30 W. R. 151, 8 Q. B. D. 275; Eastwood v. Miller, 22 W. R. 799, L. R. 9 Q. B. 440; Haigh v. Sheffield, 23 W. R. 547, L. R. 10 Q. B. 102. In Snow v. Hill, 33 W. R. 475, 14 Q. B. D. 588, the accused person had no fixed place in which he made bets, and in Doggett v. Catterns, 13 W. R. 160, 390, 17 C. B. N. S. 669, 19 Ibid. 765, the question was whether the person who made the bets was the owner or occupier of the ground on which he stood, and so was liable under section 5 of the Act. Neither of the two last-mentioned cases have any application here: see Reg. v. Preedy, 17 Cox C. C. 433, where Hawkins, J., reviews the previous decisions.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Charles Mathews and Stutfield with him), for the respondent.—The object of the Betting Houses Act is to prevent the keeping of places for betting, not to make betting itself illegal: Reg. v. Cook, 32 W. R. 796, 13 Q. B. D. 377. The "place" must be an ascertained area capable of being declared to be "a common gaming-house" (section 2), and of being entered and searched (section 11). The ratio decidendi in Doggett v. Catterns was that the ground under a tree in Hyde-park was not a "place" within the Act. Whitehurst v. Fincher, 17 Cox C. C. 70, is also in my favour.

Simey, in reply.—It is pointed out in Hornsby v. Raggett, 40 W. R. 111, [1892] 1 Q. B. 20, that in Whitehurst v. Fincher there was no evidence of anything more than casual betting, and the same remark applies to Snow v. Hill. In the present case there was systematic betting carried on day after day.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case I think that the offence described by the Act of Parliament has been committed, and that the magistrates ought to have convicted the respondent. [His lordship then referred to the facts as set out above, and continued:—] It seems to me obvious that the respondent was using one particular little bay between two of the stays of this hoarding for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. It appears to me that that is an end of the case unless the word "place" is so defined that this bay cannot be considered to be a "place" within the meaning of the Act. It is important to observe that the information in the present case was based on section 3 of the Act, which runs thus: "Any person who, being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or other place, or a person using the same, shall open, keep, or use the same for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned or either of them"—that is, referring back to section 1, for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or person using the place, or any of the other persons mentioned in section 1, betting with persons resorting thereto, or receiving or paying money, &c., on any event or contingency relating to a horse-race. It is said that the decisions are in such a state that we cannot say that this is a place. If it were res nova I should have no shadow of a doubt, but it is necessary to consider what interpretation has been put on the word in previous cases.

There are only two cases as to which I feel any difficulty. The one is Doggett v. Catterns. That case turned on sections 4 and 5 of the Act, the question being whether the defendant was the occupier within section 4 of the ground under a certain tree in Hyde Park, so as to enable the plaintiff to recover from him under section 5 the money which he had deposited with him for the purposes of a bet. But section 3, under which the present proceedings were taken, applies not only to occupiers, but to any person "using" the place. The decision, therefore, in Doggett v Catterns, presents no real difficulty, although there are indications that the judges doubted whether the locality was a place at all within the meaning of the Act.

The other case to which I wish to refer is Whitehurst v. Fincher. There the alleged "place" was the bar of a public-house, and the judges came to the conclusion that it was not within the Act. That is a difficulty, but it is to a great extent removed by the remarks made by Mathew, J., in Hornsby v. Raggett, where he says that, in Whitehurst v. Fincher, "the facts only amounted to this: that the defendant was betting in the public-house on three occasions, and that, as betting in public-houses is not prohibited by the Act, we thought the defendant should not have been convicted. Here the magistrate finds that the house was habitually used for betting purposes."

This Act of Parliament is not directed against betting simply: it is directed against those who carry on the business of betting, and have a place where they carry on that business. In this case I think that the respondent was unquestionably using this place for the purposes of his business of betting. I think the place is sufficiently described in the information. It is more or less indefinite in boundary, but it is so described that it can be found by means of the description. I think, therefore, that the magistrates ought to have convicted, and the case must be remitted to them with that expression of our opinion.

KAY, L.J.—The facts proved or to be inferred are that the respondent was a bookmaker whose business it was to make bets, and that he resorted day after day for the purpose of carrying on that business to a spot (which is marked on the plan before us), close by one of the stays which support the hoarding, a place very much resembling the stall of a stable. In this locality, between two of the stays, this bookmaker, for three successive days, carried on his business of betting. Those are the material facts. Do they bring the case within the Act of Parliament?

It is said that the preamble of the Act restricts the language used in section 3. It appears from the preamble that the mischief aimed at is "the opening of places called betting-houses or offices." But if this bookmaker resorted to this place for the purposes of his business, why is that not "opening a place" for betting purposes? We must not give a narrow construction to the words of the preamble. I think the respondent was doing the very thing against which the Act is directed.

It is said that the place here is not sufficiently defined—that it must be circumscribed in some way; and it was argued that if a man said that he would be at the foot of a certain statue in Charing Cross for the purpose of betting, that would not be a place within section 3. I cannot see why it would not. It is not necessary that the place should be defined by metes and bounds, and I should have no doubt that the foot of a particular statue would be a sufficiently indicated place to come within the Act.

As to the cases which have been cited, the decision in Doggett v. Catterns was simply that sections 4 and 5 did not apply to the particular place in question, because section 5 refers back to section 4, which only deals with a person who is the "owner or occupier," and it could not be said that the man was the occupier of a piece of ground under a tree in Hyde Park. Section 3 is much wider, and covers a person who uses a place, although he is not the owner or occupier.

I think that Whitehurst v. Fincher comes nearer to this case than any other decision. There the person was seen on three days betting in the bar of a public-house; it not appear whether he was carrying on the business of a bookmaker, and I gather that the judges thought that he was merely betting there as any person might bet with another; and they held that he was not "using a place" for the purpose of betting. But here we have a professional bookmaker carrying on his business of betting in this spot, and I think that the facts bring the case within the Act of Parliament, and that the magistrates ought to have convicted.

In re ARTON (No. 2). (a.)

Criminal law—Extradition—Falsification of accounts—Warrant of committal — Extradition Treaty with France, article 3, clauses 2, 18—French Code Pénal, art. 147—"Faux en écriture de commerce"—Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 83—Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 24), s. 1——Extradition Acts, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52) and 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 60).

Where in proceedings for the extradition of a foreign subject evidence sufficient to justify a committal is given of the commission by him of acts which constitute a crime, both according to English law and according to the law of the foreign State, and within the Extradition Treaty, extradition cannot be refused on the ground that the crime imputed falls under different headings or classes of crime in the English and foreign systems of criminal law, or in the English and foreign versions of the Extradition Treaty.

The extradition was demanded of a French subject on a charge of "faux," the ordinary English equivalent of which is "forgery." He was committed by the magistrate upon evidence showing that he had committed acts constituting the offence of "faux en écriture de commerce" under article 147 of the Code Pénal, and covered by head 2 (French version) of article 3 of the Extradition Treaty with France, and also constituting an offence (not amounting to forgery in English law) under section 83 of the Larceny Act, 1861, and section 1 of the Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875, and covered by head 18 (English version) of article 3 of the Extradition Treaty.

Held, that the committal order was rightly made.

Argument of a rule nisi obtained on behalf of Emile Arton, a French subject, for a habeas corpus to bring up his body in order that he might be released.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Sir R. Finlay, S.G. (Henry Sutton with them), showed cause.—Extradition ought to be granted. The evidence shows that Arton has falsified the books of a public company, and that is "faux en écriture de commerce" within article 147 of the Code Pénal. It is also a crime according to English law: Larceny Act, 1861, s. 83; Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875, s. 1. It is also a crime within schedule 1 to the Extradition Act, 1870, which includes "fraud by a bailee, banker, agent, factor, trustee or director or member or officer of any company made criminal by any Act for the time being in force"; and within the schedule to the Extradition Act, 1873, which specifies "any indictable offence under the Larceny Act, 1861, or any Act amending the same," and therefore includes an offence under the Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875. It is also covered by article 3 of the Extradition Treaty with France.

Charles Mathews, in support of the rule nisi. — The English equivalent of "faux" is "forgery," and the different classes of "faux" mentioned in article 147 of the Code Pénal relate to the forgery of different documents. No such offence is disclosed by the evidence. Article 18 of the Extradition Treaty with France (made in 1878) does not cover offences under the Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875, and no committal can be made in respect of such offences. Arton has been committed in respect of an offence under section 83 of the Larceny Act, 1861 (to which article 18 of the treaty applies). This committal is not challenged; but the part of the committal order which is complained of adds a new offence to the treaty with France.

Sir R. Finlay, S.G., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 8.—The judgment of the Court (Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., and WRIGHT and KENNEDY, JJ.) was delivered by Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In this case the French Government demanded the extradition of Arton under the treaty between the Queen and the French Republic, signed in 1876 and ratified in 1878. The demand was based on the allegation that Arton had committed a number of crimes against the law and in the territory of France, which are extradition crimes within the treaty. On the 6th of December, 1895, after inquiry before him, the chief metropolitan magistrate made a committal order to Holloway Prison, with a view to Arton's extradition in respect of the accusation against him of the commission of the crimes of "faux (falsification of accounts and using falsified accounts), fraud by an agent, fraud by a trustee, fraud by a director and public officer of a company, obtaining money and goods by false pretences, crimes by a bankrupt against bankruptcy law, larceny, and embezzlement within the jurisdiction of the French Republic." It is in reference to the first of these charges only that any question arises.

Subsequently, on the 21st of December, 1895, this court, on the application of Arton's counsel, granted an order calling on the governor of Holloway Prison to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue. The application was in argument based on the allegation that the chief magistrate had come to the conclusion that no forgery, according to English law, had been committed in the falsification of accounts, and in the using of falsified accounts imputed, and it was therefore contended that he could not properly commit Arton for "faux," the French equivalent or translation of "forgery," and, further, that he could not properly commit for such falsification on two grounds—(1) because the falsification was not in the order of committal described as committed by Arton as a director or member of a public company, or as clerk or servant, which would be necessary to constitute falsification a crime according to English law; and (2) that, even if the order of committal were amended in this respect, the magis- could not properly commit for falsification, on the ground that such falsification is not an extradition crime within the treaty."

Before proceeding to deal with these points, it will be well to make clear what we understand are the admitted facts. It is true that the chief magistrate did in fact come to the conclusion that there was no evidence of forgery according to English law, but he also came to the conclusion that there was sufficient evidence of the commission by Arton of the crime of fraudulent falsification of accounts in his character of member, director, or officer of a public company according to English law, and that such falsification of accounts constituted the crime of "faux" or "forgery" against the law of France within the meaning of the 147th article of the Code Pénal. The omission to state in the order of committal the character in which the falsification was committed is not a point of substance. I proceed, therefore, to consider the other alleged grounds.

The conditions of extradition, the fulfilment of which we have in this case to consider, are the following: (1) The imputed crime must be within the treaty; (2) it must be a crime against the law of the country demanding extradition; (3) it must be a crime within the English Extradition Acts, 1870 and 1873; and (4) there must be such evidence before the committing magistrate as would warrant him in sending the case for trial if it were an ordinary case in this country.

Is, then, the crime of such falsification a crime within the treaty? In my opinion it is. I take first the English version. The 18th head of article 3 of the treaty (English version) runs: "Fraud by a bailee, banker, agent, factor, trustee or director or member or public officer of any company, made criminal by any Act for the time being in force." At the time the treaty was signed, and at the time it was ratified, the Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), was in force. By the 83rd section it is provided that "Whosoever, being a director, manager, public officer, or member of any body corporate or public company shall, with intent to defraud, destroy, alter, mutilate, or falsify any book, paper, writing, or valuable security belonging to the body corporate or public company, or make or concur in the making of any false entry, or omit or concur in omitting any material particular in any book of account or other document, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour." That this was regarded by the Legislature as a serious crime is shown by the punishment which may follow on conviction for it—namely, penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years, or imprisonment not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement. Further, the Act passed in 1875 to amend the law with reference to the falsification of accounts was also in force. By the first section it is provided that if any clerk, &c., shall wilfully, and with intent to defraud, destroy, alter, mutilate, or falsify any book, paper, writing, or valuable security or account which belongs to or is in the possession of his employer, &c., or shall wilfully and with intent to defraud make or concur in making any false entry, &c., the person offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and be liable to be kept in penal servitude for a term not exceeding seven years, or to be imprisoned with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding two years.

It seems clear, therefore, that the falsification charged, if committed by a member, officer, or director of a public company (which Arton in fact was), or by a clerk or servant, is within the English version of the Treaty. In other words, such a falsification is a crime against English law in respect of which the French Government has engaged (other conditions being fulfilled) to grant extradition.

I now turn to the French version of the treaty. The French version of the 18th head of article 3 of the treaty is certainly not a translation of the English version, nor does it in substance cover the same ground. It deals with the fraudulent misappropriation by officers and members of a company of the funds of a company. It has no reference to falsification of accounts pure and simple by such officers and members. The English version, on the other hand, is, as we have seen, much wider, and by its incorporation of the Acts of 1861 and 1875 includes falsification of accounts in the manner charged against Arton. We must therefore look to see whether such falsification of accounts constitutes a crime under any other head of the treaty according to the French version.

I turn to head 2 of article 3 (French version). That article, both in the English and French version, deals with forgery. As to the English version, it is clear that all falsifications of accounts do not constitute forgery, while it is equally clear that the falsification of accounts may take such a form as to amount to forgery at common law or under the Act of 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 98) to consolidate and amend the statute law relating to forgery. But in the present case we must assume, as I have said, that the chief magistrate has come to the conclusion that there was no evidence before him in this case which warranted him in committing Arton for any such falsification of accounts as, according to English law, amounted to forgery, but that there was evidence before him of such a falsification of accounts as amounted to forgery according to French law and within the treaty. Was he warranted in that conclusion? I think he was. The French version of the second head of article 3 runs as follows:—"Faux ou usage de pièces fausses; contrefaçon des sceaux de l'État, poinçons, timbres, et marques, publics ou usage des dits sceaux, poinçons, timbres, et marques publics, contrefaits." There is no doubt, in my judgment, that the opening words mean forgery of or using false documents. Turning to the Code Pénal we find a number of articles dealing with various kinds of forgeries, as of money, of public seals, bank notes, &c., and then a group of articles relating to forgery of public and authentic writings and of writings of commerce or banking. Of this group article 147 is one. It runs as follows:—"Seront punies des travaux forcés à temps, toutes autres personnes qui auront commis un faux en écriture authentique et publique ou en écriture de commerce ou de banque; soit par contrefaçon ou altération d'écritures ou de signatures; soit par fabrication de conventions, dispositions, obligations, ou décharges, ou par leur insertion après coup dans ces actes; soit par addition ou altération de clauses, de declarations, ou de faits que ces actes avaient pour objet de recevoir et de constater." Does that article cover and include the crime of falsification of accounts according to English law? I think it clearly does. If so, it is an extradition crime according to and within both versions of the treaty. In the English version it comes under the 18th head of article 3; in the French version it comes under the second head of the same article. It is to be noted that in the "Extrait des Procédures Déposées au Greffe de la Cour d'Appel de Paris" amongst the crimes imputed to Arton is (following the words of article 147 of the Code Pénal) "le crime de faux en écritures de commerce." Further (French law being a question of fact to be determined as such in our courts), we are furnished with an affidavit from an expert in French law—M. Gabriel Astoul, a French advocate—which, after setting forth a translation of article 147, proceeds as follows:—"I am most clearly of opinion that falsification of accounts under the circumstances referred to in the depositions used at Bow-street police-court on the application for the surrender of Emile Arton constitutes the offence of 'faux' mentioned in the treaty between Great Britain and France and set out in article 147 of the French penal code." The affidavit further explains the "the word 'other' in the said article means 'persons other than those referred to in article 146—viz., public functionaries or public officers.'" It seems therefore clear that the falsification of accounts, of which the chief magistrate has decided there was sufficient evidence, is a crime against the law of France and within the French version of the treaty; in other words, that such falsification of accounts is a crime in respect of which the Government of this country has solemnly engaged (other conditions being fulfilled) to grant extradition.

Further, it is clear that the crime in question, whether regarded as forgery or falsification of accounts, is an extradition crime within the meaning of the Extradition Acts, 1870 and 1873. The learned law officers of the Crown, for some reason which I failed to appreciate, seemed unwilling to admit that "faux" in article 147 means forgery. For my part it seems to me to be clear that it means that and nothing else, and it is to be observed that M. Gabriel Astoul does not suggest in his affidavit that it has any other meaning.

The matter then stands thus:—Evidence of the crime of falsification of accounts according to English law not amounting to forgery according to that law, and within the 18th head of article 3 of the treaty (English version); evidence also that that crime of falsification is a crime according to French law ranging itself according to that law under the head of forgery and within head 2 of article 3 of the treaty (French version). Why, then, is it not to be regarded as an extradition crime? I see no valid reason. English law, as I have said, treats some acts of falsification of accounts as forgery, but does not treat all of them as such. The French law, on the other hand (as we must conclude on the evidence of fact before us), treats such falsification of accounts as alleged in this case as forgery within article 147 of the Code Pénal. Is extradition to be refused in respect of acts covered by the treaty and gravely criminal according to the law of both countries because in the particular case the falsification of accounts is not forgery according to English law, but falls under that head according to French law? I think not. To decide so would be to hinder the working and narrow the operation of most salutary international arrangements.

It seems to me, therefore, that all the conditions which I have mentioned have in this case been fulfilled. In my judgment those treaties ought to receive a liberal interpretation, which means no more than that they should receive their true construction according to their language, object, and intent. I know no head of the French law for which an exact equivalent is to be found in the law of England. The British and French texts of the treaty are not translations of one another. They are different versions, but versions which, on the whole, are in substantial agreement. We are here dealing with a crime alleged to have been committed against the law of France, and if we find, as I hold that we do, that such a crime is a crime against the law of both countries, and is, in substance, to be found in each version of the treaty, although under different heads, we are bound to give effect to the claim for extradition.

I think I have correctly stated the view of the facts taken by the learned chief magistrate. We are not a court of appeal on questions of fact from him. We have only to see that he had such evidence before him as gave him authority and jurisdiction to commit. But, lest there should be any misapprehension, I think it well that the view of the court should be presented to him, and that the order of committal should be remitted to him, in order that it may be made clear in respect of what crime of "faux" Arton is committed. The first offence should, I think, be described as "the crime of fraudulent falsification of accounts as a director, officer, or member of a public company according to the law of England, and constituting the crime of 'faux en écritures de commerce' within article 147 of the French Code Pénal." The rule will therefore be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Lunacy — Lunatic tenant for life — Conveyance by committee under Settled Land Acts—Covenants for title—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), s. 124—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 62.

Upon a sale by the committee of a lunatic tenant for life selling under the powers of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the court has power, under section 124 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, to authorize the insertion of such covenants for title as are usual and proper in a conveyance upon a sale.

In re Fox, 35 W. R. 81, 33 Ch. D. 37, explained.

This case raised the question whether, upon a sale of property under the Settled Land Act, 1882, the tenant for life being a lunatic, his committee had power to bind his estate by conveying on his behalf as beneficial owner.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Section 124 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, enacts: "The committee of the estate . . . shall, in the name and on behalf of the lunatic, execute and do all such assurances and things for giving effect to any order under this Act as the judge directs, and every such assurance and thing shall be valid and effectual . . . accordingly."

Cookson Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Borthwick, appeared for the committee, and argued that, notwithstanding the dicta of Cotton, L.J., in In re Fox, 35 W. R. 81, 33 Ch. D. 37, the court had jurisdiction to sanction a conveyance by a committee of a lunatic containing the usual covenants for title; and that if the lunatic was expressed to convey "as beneficial owner" his estate would be bound.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think there is much difficulty in this case apart from In re Fox. I was a party to the decision in that case; and although one's memory may be rather treacherous, I cannot believe that we meant to go so far as to say that under no circumstances was there, under section 116 of the then Lunacy Act (Lunacy Act, 1853) jurisdiction to authorize a covenant to repay money. In re Fox was a peculiar case. We were asked to sanction a covenant by a committee of the lunatic to pay money—not for debts of his own, but other people's debts—and we doubted whether that could be done, and would not do it. Certainly there are passages in the report which look at first as if Cotton, L.J., thought there was no power to do it. I doubt, myself, whether we intended to go to that length, and if we did we put an uncommonly narrow construction on section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1853, and one not likely to be abided by.

Now, having made those observations, when we look at the present case we find it is a different one, and turns upon a different Act of Parliament. I think it would be a very unfortunate decision if we construed it so narrowly as to say there was no jurisdiction on the part of the judge in lunacy to sanction such a clause in a conveyance like this. The lunatic has been so found by inquisition, and he is entitled as tenant for life to one moiety of an estate. There is an advantageous proposition to sell both moieties of an estate, and the owner of the other moiety agrees, and there is no doubt felt by the judge in lunacy or anybody else that the proposed sale of the whole estate upon the terms which have been provisionally approved would be extremely beneficial to the lunatic.

Now, how is the lunatic to convey the half of the estate in which he is interested as tenant for life? Of course, apart from the Settled Land Act, he could only convey his life interest; but under the Settled Land Act, especially section 62, the judge in lunacy has power to authorize the committee of the lunatic to sell the whole estate as if the lunatic were sui juris. If one looks at sections 3, 4, 20, and 55 of the Settled Land Act of 1882, it will be found that a tenant for life who is not a lunatic can certainly enter into an arrangement of this kind, and I do not think there is any real difficulty about an ordinary tenant for life selling and expressing to convey as beneficial owner. What that means is that if those words are put in and he purports to sell under the powers of the Settled Land Act, and expresses to convey as beneficial owner, then section 7 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, will be implied and incorporated. I do not see any difficulty so far. When you look at section 62 of the Settled Land Act, you find that when the tenant for life or a person having the powers of a tenant for life under this Act is a lunatic, or so found by inquisition, the committee may, in his name and on his behalf, under an order of the Lord Chancellor or other person entrusted with the care of a lunatic, "exercise the powers of a tenant for life under this Act, and the order may be made on the petition of any person interested in the settled land or of the committee of the estate." What does that mean? That means he may sell the fee simple under the powers conferred by sections 3 and 4, and the sale must be for the best price.

Then we go a little further. When we come to the Lunacy Act, 1890, there is a power to sell, and section 124 says: [His lordship read the section]. That appears to me to authorize the judge in a proper case to sanction an assurance by the committee in the way in which assurances are commonly executed according to the practice of conveyancers in dealing with real property. I do not see how it is possible for this committee to exercise his powers in the most beneficial way unless he enters into some covenant of title such as is proposed. It is a common one, and not an onerous one. First of all it imports the covenants which, by the Conveyancing Act of 1881, are implied when a man conveys as beneficial owner; but that is followed by a proviso that cuts it down immensely, and the whole effect of the covenant which we are asked to sanction is one that confines the covenant to the life estate of the lunatic. If we did not sanction this we should put a fetter on his power, which would be most prejudicial to the interests of those whom we are bound to protect. I think the language is sufficient for the purpose and that we ought to approve of this sale.

KAY, L.J.—Under the Settled Land Act a tenant for life is authorized to sell and convey the fee simple of the land, but he is not authorized to enter into any covenant at all. It was not the purpose of the Act, and it had nothing to do with covenants. It gave him a statutory power to convey the fee simple, and of course prima facie it applied to a case where the tenant for life was sui juris and could enter into such covenants as he pleased. But there is nothing in that Act referring to any covenants to be entered into by a tenant for life when he is selling and conveying land. Then section 62 provides: [His lordship read the section.] As I pointed out, it is no part of the power of a tenant for life under this Act to enter into covenants. Any covenant he had to enter into is not a statutory covenant under the Settled Land Act, and therefore this section does not by itself in any way authorize the committee of a lunatic to enter into any covenant. So far it is perfectly clear.

Then comes the Conveyancing and Law of Real Property Act, 1881, and I confess there is a little difficulty upon that. That provides by section 7 that in a conveyance for valuable consideration other than a mortgage the following covenants by a person who conveys and is expressed to convey as "beneficial owner" shall be implied. Then follow the usual covenants for title, but that only applies to where a person conveys and is expressed to convey as beneficial owner. It is rather difficult to say that a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act conveys the fee simple as beneficial owner. That he may be expressed to convey as beneficial owner I can understand, but perhaps it is expedient to give this clause of the Conveyancing Act the meaning that the main object was to prevent the necessity of setting out all these covenants at length, and when a person conveys as beneficial owner or is expressed to convey as beneficial owner these covenants are to be implied. It is a sort of compendious mode of having these covenants in a conveyance when they are not set out at length. Moreover, the tenant for life has some beneficial interest because he has a life interest, and therefore a conveyance which passes the fee simple includes his life interest. I think it is possible to say, without straining the words, that a tenant for life may convey under the Settled Land Act expressing himself to be conveying as beneficial owner for the purpose of introducing these covenants, and when he does so the covenants which I have referred to in the Conveyancing Act, may be considered as contained in the conveyance. So far the ground is clear.

Now we come to the Lunacy Act, 1890. So far I find nothing whatever to authorize a committee to enter into a covenant for title so as to bind the lunatic. The Conveyancing Act does not refer to a committee at all but to an ordinary person who is sui juris and is conveying as beneficial owner. By the Lunacy Act of 1890, s. 120, it is enacted that "the judge may by order authorize and direct the committee of the estate of a lunatic to do all or any of the following things," and the first is, sell any property belonging to the lunatic. Then it states in clauses lettered from A. to L. the various things the judge may authorize and order a committee to do. There is not in any one of those clauses any power to authorize the committee to bind the lunatic by any covenant. Then, in sub-section (1) of section 122, we find this: "The power to authorize leases of a lunatic's property under this Act shall extend to property of which the lunatic is tenant in tail," and sub-section (2) says: "Leases authorized to be granted and accepted by or on behalf of a lunatic under this Act may be for such number of lives or such term of years at such rents and royalties, and subject to such reservations, covenants, and conditions as the judge approves." That cannot mean on the part of the lessee only. It is coupled with the word "reservations," and they would be favourable to the lessor. No doubt it includes covenants by the lessor—that is to say, the committee on behalf of the lunatic in such a case as this. Therefore, as regards a lease there is an express power for the judge to authorize the committee of the lunatic to enter into covenants. In section 124 there is no express power of that kind, nor can I find it in any of the sections referred to. I believe there is no such express power in the Act. But section 124 is this: [His lordship read the section].

Now, a covenant is not strictly an assurance. The point has been much contested as to the meaning of that word in the Bills of Sale Act. An assurance is really something which operates as a transfer of property, and an assurance can hardly be a covenant. But it says, "all such assurances and things," and those words are put in, no doubt, so as to enlarge the power. I should say that in furtherance of the general intention, this section is wide enough to enable the court to authorize a conveyance by a committee on behalf of a lunatic, with all such covenants as are usual in such a conveyance, including the ordinary covenants of title. But when this case came before me in my private room my attention was called to In re Fox. In re Fox was not a case under this Act of Parliament, but under an Act (Lunacy Act, 1853) worded somewhat differently, though very nearly in the same terms. In the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, by section 116, it was provided [His lordship read the section]. These words, to my mind, are quite as good as the words in section 124 of the Lunacy Act of 1890; and, indeed, the former section contains certain words which section 124 does not. Section 124 authorized the committee to execute and do all such assurances and things as the judge directs; and section 116 of the former Act authorized the committee to execute, make, and do all such conveyances, deeds, transfers, and things. Those words are quite as large, although perhaps not essentially larger, than those in the Act of 1890.

Now, in the case of In re Fox the lunatic was entitled in fee to one moiety of certain real estate as one of two co-heiresses of an ancestor who died intestate, and the real estate was liable to pay the debts of that ancestor, whose personal estate was insufficient to pay, and it was wanted to raise money for the payment of those debts, and a mortgage of the property of which one moiety belonged to the lunatic was sought to be authorized by the Court in Lunacy. The question arose whether there could be covenants for payment of the mortgage money. The mortgage money was not due from the lunatic, but from the ancestor, and the lunatic was only liable to it, so far as she obtained assets from that ancestor, and no further. Therefore a personal covenant to pay the money would be a new obligation. But, according to the report, Cotton, L.J., said: "I very much doubt whether the court can direct a committee to covenant in the name of a lunatic." Those words are large enough to express a doubt whether any covenant could be entered into by a committee to bind a lunatic. That may not have been the meaning. Again, Cotton, L.J., says: "I doubt whether we have jurisdiction to do more than give the mortgagee the rights of a mortgagee against the particular estate." There can be no doubt about the meaning of Cotton, L.J. He thought there was no jurisdiction to bind the lunatic's estate by a covenant of that kind, and he does not confine it to that particular covenant. Then, when he comes to give judgment, he says this: "It being clearly for the benefit of the lunatic's estate that this £5,000 should be raised," &c. [His lordship read the judgment of Cotton, L.J.] That decision makes it very difficult for the court to say that any covenant can be entered into on a sale by the committee so as to bind the lunatic. However, Lindley, L.J., who was a party to that decision, doubts whether the court intended to go so far as that, and whether the refusal went further than an exercise of the discretion of the court as to that particular covenant—namely, a covenant to bind the lunatic to pay money, which he was not bound to pay, to the extent of the assets received. The difficulty that arises from that case would, therefore, be removed if that is the true construction of it, and I agree that it is beneficial for the sake of lunatics in general to read section 124 of the Act of 1890 as authorizing the court, in a proper case, to allow the committee to bind the lunatic by such covenants as are usual on a sale. I will not go further than that. Of course the ordinary covenants for title are usual on a sale, and therefore I think in this case we may say that the difficulty arising from the decision in In re Fox being removed, the court has jurisdiction to approve of this sale.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question in this case is whether or not a committee of a tenant for life who has been found lunatic by inquisition, has not only the power of selling the lunatic's estate, but of entering into covenants which are necessary for that purpose. There can be no doubt—in fact it is not disputed—that the covenant is a necessary covenant to carry out the sale if it is to be effected, and the sale has been found beneficial for the lunatic's estate. The question is whether there is the power. That drives one to the statute to see whether this power is given to a committee under these circumstances or not. Section 62 of the Settled Land Act of 1882 enacts. [His lordship read the section.] That is clear. Then comes the question what powers has a tenant for life, who is not a lunatic so found by inquisition as regards selling the estate. That drives one back to section 3, which enacts that a tenant for life may sell the settled land. Section 4 says: "Every sale shall be made at the best price that can reasonably be obtained." Then section 55 enacts that "where a power of sale is exercised by a tenant for life, he may execute, make, and do all deeds, instruments, and things necessary or proper in that behalf." It does seem to me that the conjoint operation of those sections would give a tenant for life power not only to sell, but to enter into covenants necessary for the purpose of effecting that sale.

The question does not rest there, because the Lunacy Act of 1890 also applies to a case like this. By section 120, "The judge may, by order, authorize and direct the committee of the estate of a lunatic to do all or any of the following things," and the first is sell any property belonging to the lunatic. Reading that in conjunction with the Settled Land Act, s. 62, there is power to sell the property of a lunatic when he is tenant for life. Then, what happens after that? By section 124 the committee of the estate on behalf of the lunatic may execute and do all assurances and things for giving effect to an order under this Act that the judge directs. If we were to put the limited construction on this Act which has been suggested, and which might be put upon it, we should be bringing these two Acts of Parliament, as regards lunatics so found by inquisition, to a deadlock, because in numberless cases the committee could not effect a sale beneficial to the lunatic's estate without entering into proper covenants with the purchaser, who would not buy unless those covenants were entered into. Taking not what I call a broad view, but a correct view of these sections together, I think there is this power given to a committee to enter into proper covenants when he sells the estate of the tenant for life, who is a lunatic so found by inquisition.

Then we were referred to the case of In re Fox. I have nothing to say about that beyond what has been said. I do not read that as a decision that in no case can an order be made for a committee of a lunatic to enter into any covenants at all. The real decision was that on the facts there, the court did not see its way to do it. I think, therefore, we should confirm the agreement.

County court—Action commenced in High Court—Order remitting action to county court—Lodging writ and order with registrar—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 66.

Where an order is made under section 66 of the County Courts Act, 1888, remitting an action to the county court, the action does not leave the High Court until the plaintiff has lodged the original writ and the order with the registrar of the county court.

Appeal from an order of Lawrance, J., at chambers.

This was an action of tort commenced in the High Court.

On the 25th of November, 1895, the defendant obtained an order under section 66 of the County Courts Act, 1888, directing that, unless the plaintiff should give security for costs within a certain number of days, the action should be remitted to the City of London Court. The time, after being enlarged by consent, expired on the 12th of December, no security having been given. The order for remittal was not lodged, as required by the section, with the registrar of the City of London Court, and on the 13th of December, on the application of the plaintiff, an order was made by a master directing the defendant to give further and better answers to certain interrogatories which had been administered to him by the plaintiff.

Lawrance, J., reversed the order of the master, on the ground that the action having ceased to be in the High Court the master had no jurisdiction.

The plaintiff appealed.

P. Rose-Innes, for the defendant, cited Harris v. Judge, 41 W. R. 9, [1892] 2 Q. B. 565, and Duke v. Davis, 41 W. R. 673, [1893] 2 Q. B. 260.

(a.) Reported by F. G. Rucker, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A. L. Smith, L.J.—In my opinion the decision of the learned judge cannot be supported. The master held that, notwithstanding the order of remittal, he had jurisdiction to make the order for further and better answers to interrogatories, because the order of remittal and the writ had not been lodged with the registrar of the county court. With regard to getting a case out of the High Court into the county court, section 66 of the County Courts Act, 1888, seems to me to be identical with section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1867. Under the earlier Act it was decided in Welply v. Buhl that the action did not leave the High Court until the writ and the order remitting the action had been lodged with the registrar of the county court. In my opinion, therefore, the case is concluded by authority. The cases of Harris v. Judge and Duke v. Davis do not seem to me to touch the point now in question.

Appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court (Grantham and Wright, JJ.) refusing to set aside an award of the Local Government Board.

The award was made under section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888. Sub-section 1 of that section imposes on the county council the maintenance of all main roads. Sub-section 2 provides that any urban authority may retain to itself the powers and duties of maintaining main roads within its district, and enacts that in such case the county council shall make to such authority an annual payment towards the costs of such maintenance. Sub-section 3 provides that the amount of such payment shall be such annual sum as may be from time to time agreed on, or in the absence of agreement, may be determined by the arbitration of the Local Government Board.

The town council of Burslem and the authorities of certain other urban districts in the county of Stafford claimed, under sub-section 2, to retain the powers and duties of maintaining the main roads within their districts; and an award was made by the Local Government Board determining the amount of contribution to be paid by the county council towards the cost of maintaining the main roads in each district. The award included contributions towards the costs of maintaining paved footways running by the side of the main roads where they passed through the urban districts.

The county council applied to the Queen's Bench Division to set aside the award, on the ground that the Local Government Board, by including the costs of maintaining the paved footways, had exceeded their jurisdiction.

In the present case, which was taken as a test case, the question arose with regard to a road passing through the borough of Burslem, which was formerly a turnpike road, but which on the expiration of the turnpike trust became a main road under section 13 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878.

The Divisional Court, being of opinion that the case was governed by the decision of In re Local Board of Warminster and the County Council of Wilts, 38 W. R. 670, 25 Q. B. D. 450, refused to set aside the award.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 18.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an appeal between the urban sanitary authority of Burslem and the County Council of Staffordshire, and the dispute between them is precisely the same as in the case of In re Local Board of Warminster and the County Council of Wilts. The determination of this appeal depends on whether we agree with the decision in that case or not. The point in dispute is as to the liability to maintain the paved footways at the side of the carriage-way where a main road passes through a town or urban district. This question must be determined by the consideration of what is a main road. It seems strange to me that, in an Act of Parliament which deals with a matter the nomenclature of which was perfectly familiar to members of both Houses of Parliament—viz., county roads—they should have used words which they would never have used in ordinary conversation. A high road was a well-known thing; but a main road is a thing which was never talked of before the expression appeared in an Act of Parliament. There were many kinds of roads or ways, all of them well known, which were not high roads. A high road meant a road which went from one important place to another: it was a made road, in contradistinction to a green road, which was also a well-known thing. A green road might be a highway, but it was not a high road.

Now, section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888, says that every road in a county which is for the time being a main road within the meaning of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, shall be maintained and repaired by the county council; provided that an urban authority may claim to retain the power of maintaining any main road within their district; and in such case the county council shall pay part of the expenses of such maintenance.

We must refer to the Act of 1878 to see what a main road is there defined to be. That Act says that turnpike roads, on ceasing to be turnpike roads, shall be deemed to be main roads, and it further provides that other roads—viz., such as form a medium of communication between great towns or lead to railway stations—may be declared to be main roads.

The question is, what is it that is thus said to be a main road? We must not say that it means the whole of the space between the hedges on either side. There may be no hedge or fence near, as for instance when a road passes over a mountain or across a common, or where in passing through a village it has a village green on one side of it. I think that a high road or a main road is that which has been dedicated to the public as a road for the use of carriages and foot-passengers in passing from one place of importance to another, and which has been accepted by the public as such. Such a main road may in certain parts of it have paved footpaths; for instance, it often happens that there are paved footpaths near a turnpike gate. And where a main road goes through a town, it generally has paved footpaths running along the sides of it. The paving is done not for the exclusive benefit of the inhabitants of the town, but for the general benefit of the public who use the road. While the road is passing through a country district, it is clear that it is only one highway; no one ever heard it suggested that it was two highways, one a footway for foot-passengers, and the other a carriage-way. Neither can this be said to be the case when it enters an urban district. It is still one highway, though part of the road is used as a carriage-way and part as a footway. Foot-passengers are not restricted to the footway, though carriages are for reasons of safety required to keep to the carriage-way. In my opinion, therefore, where a main road passes through an urban district and has footpaths on each side of it, the main road includes the footpaths as well as the carriage-way, and consequently, by section 11 of the Local Government Act, the county council are liable to contribute to the repair of the footpaths. I agree with the judgment on the case of In re Local Board of Warminster and County Council of Wilts, and I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J., read the following judgment:—The county council of Staffordshire object to contribute to the repair and maintenance of various paved footways within certain urban districts in that county. Their liability to contribute depends upon section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which enacts that "every road in a county which is for the time being a main road within the meaning of the Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878," shall "be wholly maintained and repaired" by the county council, provided that any urban authority may claim to maintain such roads within their district, and in that case the county council are to contribute an annual sum towards the costs of the maintenance and repair of such road. The amount of such payment may be fixed by agreement or by arbitration of the Local Government Board. Such an arbitration has taken place in this case, and it is sought to set aside the award because it has directed contribution to the maintenance of paved footways in several urban districts at the side of the carriage-ways. Whether or not this was right depends upon the meaning of the words "road" and "main road" in the section to which I have referred. The Act of 1888 does not contain any definition of road or main road, but refers, as I have pointed out, for the meaning of main road to the Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878. Section 13 of this statute provides that any road which between the 31st of December, 1870, and the passing of that Act ceased to be a turnpike road, and any road which at the time of the passing of the Act was a turnpike road, but might afterwards cease to be such, should be deemed to be a main road, and by section 15 the county authority, at the instance of the highway authority, might declare certain roads which had never been turnpike roads to be main roads. From the papers in this case which have been handed to me it does not appear whether all the roads in question were originally turnpike roads or not. If there be any which were never turnpike roads, but have become main roads, I do not understand how it can be argued that a pathway by the side of the carriage-way is not part of the road. Road must primâ facie mean the highway, and the pathway is undoubtedly part of the highway which is a main road.

But the argument for the county council is rested upon the assumption that all or some of these roads were formerly turnpike roads, and is derived from the history of the legislation as to turnpike roads. The statute 8 Geo. 4, c. 126, intituled an Act to amend the general laws now in being for regulating turnpike roads in England, contains a power (section 111) for turnpike trustees to make and keep in repair causeways for the use of foot-passengers "in, upon, or on the sides of the turnpike road in such manner as they shall think proper." But this is restricted as to any any town, village, or hamlet by section 112, which provides that nothing in the Act contained shall authorize the turnpike trustees "to lay down, continue, repair, or maintain any pavement or any paved or pitched causeway or footpath in or upon or at the side of any turnpike road within any town, village, or hamlet where such turnpike road shall pass through the same," but such pavement, paved or pitched causeway, or footpath is to be made, repaired, and maintained by and at the cost of the inhabitants of such town, village, or hamlet, or by other persons liable to make, maintain, and repair the same. This legislation was obviously intended to define the rights and obligations of turnpike trustees as between them and the inhabitants of a town, village, or hamlet. It has nothing to do with rights or obligations of the county council as to main roads. As between them and the inhabitants of a town, village, or hamlet, there is no such restriction, nor does there seem to be any reason for it. After turnpikes were abolished, and before the Act of 1888, the highway authority in any urban district maintained both carriage-way and footways adjoining. Then, by the Act of 1888, the duty is cast upon the county to maintain main roads, and there is nothing to restrict the meaning of these words to the carriage-way, excluding the footpath at or on the side of it. If the urban authority does not claim to maintain such road the county must do so. If the urban authority makes such a claim the county must contribute, and in either case the main road is primâ facie the whole highway, including the footway as well as the carriage-way. Any other construction is not warranted by the words of the Act, and would involve this most inconvenient result, that there must in every case be an inquiry—(1) Was the main road once a turnpike road? and (2) Was the footway upon the turnpike road or outside it? The point has been decided against the county council in the case of In re Local Board of Warminster and County Council of Wilts, and I agree with that decision.

Patent—Action for infringement—Undertaking offered and refused—Injunction—Costs.

A plaintiff in a patent action is not entitled to an injunction as a matter of course, and if the infringement is innocent, and the defendant offers an undertaking, it should be accepted.

Motion for judgment.

The plaintiff sued the defendants, Wilson and Stafford, for infringement of a patent, claiming (1) an injunction to restrain the defendants and their servants from infringing; (2) damages, or an account of profits; and (3) delivery up or destruction of the infringing articles.

The defendants' solicitors soon after the issue of the writ wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors pointing out that the defendants had purchased the alleged infringing articles in the ordinary course of business, and that the sales had been small, amounting to less than £10. They also offered to account, and to deliver up or destroy all the alleged infringing goods in their possession, and to give an undertaking in the terms of the injunction asked for in the writ. The plaintiffs nevertheless delivered a statement of claim and particulars of breaches, and prayed for the relief indorsed on the writ. The defendants put in a defence and renewed the offer made in their solicitors' letter. The plaintiffs now moved for judgment against the defendants for a perpetual injunction in the terms of the statement of claim against these defendants and the defendant Hope, who did not appear.

A. J. Walter.—The plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction.

A. H. Jessell.—The plaintiffs ought to have been satisfied with our undertaking, and they ought to pay our costs subsequently to that offer: Walter v. Steinkoff, 40 W. R. 599, [1892] 3 Ch. 489; American Tobacco Co. v. Guest, 40 W. R. 364, [1892] 1 Ch. 630.

A. J. Walter, replied.

North, J.—I think that the plaintiffs ought to have accepted the undertaking of these defendants. I think that the plaintiffs were entitled to protection for their patent, but the undertaking was sufficient. An injunction is not granted as a matter of course. The court always has a discretion, but I think that the plaintiffs had the right to have their patent protected by having the undertaking given in court. The defendants must pay the plaintiffs' costs of appearing to a day, and also the costs up to the date of their letter, all the rest of the costs must be paid by the plaintiffs.

The order will be on the defendant's undertaking in terms of this letter, stay proceedings and order the costs to be paid as I have indicated.

LYNDE v. ANGLO-ITALIAN HEMP SPINNING CO. (a.)

Company—Shares—Contract—Misrepresentation—Promoter—Rescission of contract.

To make a company liable for misrepresentations inducing a contract to take shares, the shareholder must bring his case within one or other of the following heads: (1) Where the misrepresentations are made by the directors or other general agents entitled to act and acting on its behalf; (2) where the misrepresentations are made by a special agent of the company acting within the scope of his authority, and whether the company has originally authorized him or has subsequently ratified his acts; (3) where the company know before completion of the contract that it is induced by misrepresentation; or (4) where the contract is made on the basis of certain representations, whether the particulars of those representations were known to the company or not, and it turns out that some of them were material and untrue.

A promoter of a company, but who was not either a director or the agent of the company to make representations, induced the plaintiff to take shares on the faith of certain allegations he was alleged to have made, but of which the company had no knowledge, though the directors did know he was endeavouring to procure subscriptions for shares.

Held, that even if the representations were made (which was not proved), the company could not be held liable for such representations made by a promoter; and that the contract to take shares could not be set aside.

Trial of action.

This was an action brought by William Alfred Lynde against the Anglo-Italian Hemp Spinning Co. for the rescission of a contract to take 300 shares in the company, on the ground of misrepresentation; for repayment of the sums paid in respect of the shares; and for consequential relief.

The company was registered on the 28th of November, 1890, with a share capital of £50,000, one of its objects being to acquire the lands, buildings, works, and mills known as the "Ferrara Hemp Works," situate at Ferrara, in Italy, theretofore carried on by Messrs. F. Navarra & Co.

By article 120 of the articles of association it was provided that the directors should adopt on behalf of the company an agreement made between Arthur Waithman and M. C. Thomson of the one part, and a trustee for the defendant company of the other part, whereby, after reciting that A. Waithman and M. C. Thomson (who were the promoters of the company) had arranged to obtain subscriptions for £20,000 in debentures, and that they had incurred various expenses in the promotion of the company, it was agreed that on the completion of the sale to the company of the Ferrara Hemp Works the company should pay to them £5,000 in cash, and that they should be entitled to have allotted to them certain founders' shares.

The plaintiff on the 9th of December, 1890, had an interview with A. Waithman, one of the promoters, who was a personal friend of his. He alleged that Waithman then represented to him on behalf of the company (1) that the business of F. Navarra had been bought as a going concern at a very low price; and (2) that it was a good business; (3) that no promotion money was to be paid; and (4) that A. Waithman was not to get anything out of the promotion of the company. The plaintiff received at that interview a copy of the memorandum and articles of association of the company. At another interview on the 16th of March, 1891, the plaintiff alleged that Waithman stated that he and M. C. Thomson had agreed to forego the benefits conferred on them by the agreement mentioned in art. 120.

The plaintiff alleged that these representions were false, and that relying on them he, on the 28th of May, 1891, applied for and had allotted to him on the 10th of June, 1891, 300 ordinary and three founders' shares in the company. The application form for the 300 shares stated that the plaintiff applied for the shares "subject to the memorandum and articles of association, of which a copy has been supplied to me." The application form had been obtained from the solicitor to the company and handed to the plaintiff by Waithman. The plaintiff paid for the shares on allotment and in consequence of calls, £153.

At the time of the alleged representations being made Waithman was not a director or general agent of the company, nor authorised by them to procure shares or to make representations to induce people to subscribe for shares. There were two directors who were acting as such. Both Waithman and Thomson actively exerted themselves to procure, and did in fact procure, persons to take up shares, and the directors in question knew they were doing so. No prospectus of the company was ever issued.

In December, 1891, Waithman and Thomson were appointed directors, and on the 14th of November, 1894, the plaintiff alleged that he had discovered the true facts as to the above representations, and sent a letter to the company repudiating the shares.

On the 20th of December, 1894, the company having declined to cancel the allotment, he issued the writ in this action.

The defence set up by the company was that the representations were not in fact made, and alleged that even if made, A. Waithman was not their agent or authorized to make representations on their behalf, and further alleged laches and delay, and counterclaimed for some over-due calls.

Eve, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for the plaintiff.—The representations were made for and on behalf of the defendant company. They knew Waithman was a promoter, that he was getting subscriptions for shares, and the case therefore comes within In re Canadian (Direct) Meat Co.; Tamplin's case, W. N., 1892, pp. 94, 146; and Karberg's case, [1892] 3 Ch. 1, 40 W. R. Dig. 41. The company adopted the representations, and is liable for their effect. [ROMER, J.—In Karberg's case the offer to take shares was based on a prospectus issued by the company; here there was none.]

Hopkinson, Q.C., and Mulligan, for the defendants.—The rule in this kind of case is that the representation must have been made by the person against whom restitution is sought, or his agent. Waithman was not the agent of the company for making representations. The company did not in fact know that untrue representations were being made. It has been held that even the secretary of a company is not its agent to make representations to induce people to take shares: Newlands v. National Employers' Accident Association (Limited), 54 L. J. Q. B. 428, 33 W. R. Dig. 168. Nor are misrepresentations of one director sufficient to bind the company, Holt's case, In re The Universal Provident Life Association, 22 Beav. 48, and the same rule applies in the case of a promoter making similar representations when not authorized by the company: In re Hull and London Life Assurance Co., Gibson's case, 6 W. has also been delay in repudiating, sufficient to destroy the right: In re Russian (&c.) Ironworks Co., Taite's case, 15 W. R. 891, 3 Eq. 795; In re Scottish Petroleum Co., 31 W. R. 846, 23 Ch. D. 413.

ROMER, J.—The first question I desire to deal with is this: Assuming that Mr. Waithman made material misrepresentations to the plaintiff which induced him to apply for the shares, could the plaintiff, on that ground, hold the company liable and have the contract set aside? It appears to me that, speaking generally, to make a company liable for misrepresentations inducing a contract to take shares from it, the shareholder must bring his case within one or other of the following heads:—(1) Where the misrepresentations are made by the directors or other the general agents of the company entitled to act and acting on its behalf, as, for example, by a prospectus issued by the authority or sanction of the directors of a company, inviting subscriptions for shares; (2) where the misrepresentations are made by a special agent of the company while acting within the scope of his authority, as, for example, by an agent specially authorized to obtain, on behalf of the company, subscriptions for shares. This head, of course, includes the case of a person constituted agent by subsequent adoption of his acts. (3) Where the company can be held affected before the contract is complete with the knowledge that it is induced by misrepresentations, as, for example, when the directors, on allotting shares, know, in fact, that the application for them has been induced by misrepresentations, even though made without any authority; (4) where the contract is made on the basis of certain representations, whether those representations were known to the company or not, and it turns out that some of those representations were material and untrue, as, for example, if the directors of a company know, when allotting, that an application for shares is based on the statements contained in a prospectus, even though that prospectus was issued without authority, or even before the company was formed, and even if its contents are not known to the directors.

I think Karberg's case was one falling within and decided under this head. Lindley, L.J., said that one question he had to answer was this [1892] 3 Ch. 11: "Was the prospectus"—in that case being a prospectus issued before the company was formed—"the basis of the contract formed by the application and allotment of shares?" And he answers that question when he says, "The offer to take shares is an offer to take them on the terms of the prospectus and on no other terms, and the acceptance of the application by the allotment of the shares is the acceptance of the offer on those terms and not on other terms." And I gather that that was the ground of the decision in Karberg's case.

There may possibly be other cases not coming within the above heads, though none occur to me at the present time, but certainly the present case, if it does not come within any of the above heads, has no special features about it that would entitle the plaintiff to the relief he asks.

Now, it appears to me that the plaintiff does not bring his case within any of these heads. Such misrepresentations, if any, as were made to the plaintiff were made by Mr. Waithman, one of the two promoters of the company. But the company at the time had two directors entitled to act for it, and Mr. Waithman was not a director or general agent of the company. No doubt the promoters had a great deal to do with the company at the time and their wishes and views may have been highly regarded by the directors. But I see nothing to justify me in coming to the conclusion that the promoters are to be regarded as really constituting the company, or that the directors left everything in their hands, or were what may be called dummies, or left it to the promoters to do whatever they pleased in the affairs of the company. Nor was Mr. Waithman, when he made the representations he did make to the plaintiff, authorized to act on behalf of the company in procuring shares, or authorized to make any representations on behalf of the company to the plaintiff or others to induce him or them to apply for shares. The fact that Mr. Waithman was a promoter of the company did not in itself authorize him to procure shares for the company, or to make representations to the plaintiff on the company's behalf. A contract to take shares may be induced by misrepresentations made by an officer of a company, or by a promoter of a company, or by a person assisting in procuring shares of a company; but that fact alone will not be sufficient to enable the contract to be rescinded. The cases cited by Mr. Hopkinson are sufficient to show this. And although the company knew that Waithman was applying to his friends to get them to subscribe for shares, that did not in my opinion make him the company's agent, or put the company to inquire as to whether he had made any, and, if any, what representations to those friends to induce them to subscribe. In most cases directors must be aware that subscriptions for shares are obtained through the intermediary of persons interested in the company, and it would lead to the most astonishing results if that was held sufficient to affect the directors with knowledge of, or to put them upon inquiry as to, the representations (if any) made by those persons to the people applying for the shares. The fact that in the case of this company some applications, including that of the plaintiff, were made on printed forms prepared by the company's solicitor, does not in my opinion make any real difference. Mr. Waithman got his forms by applying to the company's solicitor, because he wanted his friends to make proper applications for shares. No authority was given by the directors to the solicitor to supply Mr. Waithman with forms, nor can the directors by seeing these forms used be held thereby to have adopted Mr. Waithman as as their agent in obtaining applications for shares. The directors did not issue any prospectus themselves, or try to get applications for shares, no doubt because they thought Waithman and Thomson would get a sufficient number of their friends to take up the necessary number of shares. But this did not in my opinion make Waithman and Thomson the special agents of the company to procure subscriptions on its behalf, or authorize them to make any representations on behalf of the company with a view of inducing their friends to subscribe.

And lastly this is not a case like Karberg's case, or coming at all within the fourth head. The application for shares made by the plaintiff was not one made conditional upon, or to the knowledge of the directors based upon, any special or other representations made by Waithman. The application was not even to the knowledge of the directors induced by representations by Waithman, though even if it had been whether that would in itself have been sufficient to bring the case within the fourth head or have entitled the plaintiff to rescind I need not now inquire.

On this ground therefore I hold that the action must fail, for in my judgment the plaintiff has not shown any ground upon which I can rescind this contract by reason of misrepresentations, if any, made to him which induced him to apply for these shares.

I should have been glad if I could have left the case there, because the point of law I have decided is in itself fatal to the plaintiff's case. But the case may go elsewhere, and if it does I think the judges of the courts above are entitled to know what view the judge who tried the case took of the facts of it.

Were misrepresentations in fact made to the plaintiff by Waithman which he relied on, which were material and which led to this contract? The onus of proving that is upon the plaintiff, and he has not discharged that onus to my satisfaction. I am not convinced that any material misrepresentation was made, certainly I am not satisfied that any misrepresentation, if made, was relied upon by the plaintiff, and induced him to apply for these shares.

Representations undoubtedly were made by Waithman to the plaintiff, but they were all verbal. There is a direct conflict of testimony between the plaintiff and Waithman on all the really material alleged misrepresentations, and there is no evidence before me except that of these two witnesses. [His lordship commented on the evidence, and proceeded as follows:—] I need not go through the alleged misrepresentations in detail or further discuss the subject. I have stated the result upon my mind, which result is simply that the alleged misrepresentations are not established to my satisfaction.

Having decided the question of law, and expressed my opinion on the evidence on the questions of fact, I need not further deal with the point as to delay in bringing the action or the other points which have been discussed.

It follows that the action fails and must be dismissed with costs, and on the counter-claim there will be judgment for the defendant company with costs.

Summons by liquidator of a company.

The liquidator of the Common Petroleum Engine Co., Limited, took out this summons against the respondents, J. Elsner and W. McArthur, asking (inter alia) a declaration that certain shares issued to and held by the respondents were subject to liability of the payment of 19s. per share, beyond the amount already paid by them of 1s. per share.

By a contract, dated the 15th of February, 1892, and made between Spiel's Patent Petroleum Engine Co., Limited (in this report referred to as Spiel's Company), of the one part and J. Elsner of the other part, as trustee for a new company to be formed to purchase certain patent rights in petroleum motors, it was by clause 2 provided as follows: "The consideration for the said sale shall be the sum of £2,550, which shall be paid and satisfied by the issue to Spiel's Company (or their nominees) of 2,550 fully-paid shares of the new company of £1 each, such shares to be numbered in the books of the new company and in the share certificates for the same 8 to 2,557 inclusive, or at the option of the new company as to the whole or any part of the said sum of £2,550, by payment in cash in lieu of shares. The new company shall allot and issue to every shareholder in Spiel's Company who shall be willing to accept and shall apply for the same three shares of £1 each of the new company, credited with the sum of 19s. as paid upon each of the shares so to be allotted and issued in respect of every two shares of £5 each held by him in Spiel's Company, and such shares of the new company so to be allotted and issued as last aforesaid shall be numbered in the books of the new company and in the share certificates for the same 2,558 to 20,000 inclusive. Every such shareholder in Spiel's Company shall apply for such shares in the new company within the time limited by notice to be given to him of his right to apply for and accept the same, and undertake in writing to pay up the 1s. per share remaining unpaid on such shares either prior to or at the time of the allotment and issue of such shares to him, or by such instalments and at such times as may be fixed for the payment of the issue. If any such shareholder who may so apply for shares as aforesaid shall hold an odd number of shares in Spiel's Company he shall only have the right to apply for and have allotted and issued to him in respect of such odd share, one share of the new company of £1 so credited as aforesaid. All of the said shares of the new company not applied for by shareholders in Spiel's Company within the time so limited as aforesaid may be sold when and to such persons, and on such terms, or may be otherwise dealt with by the new company as the new company may think fit."

Article 3.—"The purchase of the said premises shall be completed on the 15th of March, 1892, when the said purchase price shall be paid and satisfied in manner aforesaid, and thereupon Spiel's Company and all other necessary parties shall execute . . . the conveyances."

Article 4.—"This contract or some other proper and sufficient contract shall be filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies before the issue of any of the above shares under the contract."

(a.) Reported by J. W. GREIG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Common Petroleum Engine Co., the company contemplated in these arrangements, was incorporated on the 17th of March, 1892, and by its memorandum of association it was provided that 2,550 shares, numbered 8 to 2,557 inclusive, might be issued as fully-paid, pursuant to the contract of the 15th of February above stated, and 17,443 shares numbered 2,558 to 20,000 inclusive, might be allotted and issued with 19s. per share credited as paid thereon respectively. By the articles of association it was provided that the issue of the shares to the Spiel's Company should be in such form as to free the holders from liability beyond 1s. per share.

On the 19th of March, 1892, the new company by a deed indorsed on the contract of the 15th of February, 1892, and made between Spiel's Company of the first part, Elsner of the second part, and the new company of the third part, ratified and adopted the same and declared it binding on the new company. The contract of the 15th of February, with the indorsement, was then duly filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies. On the 30th of March, Spiel's Company assigned to the new company the property in question in consideration of the £2,550 paid as to £350 in cash, and £2,200 in shares.

Elsner and McArthur in March applied as nominees of shareholders in Spiel's Company for 250 and 50 shares in the new company with 19s. per share credited as paid up. Both applied on a form sent to shareholders in Spiel's Company referring only to "extra shares." The shares were allotted on the 25th of March, the 1s. per share paid, and the applicants put on the register as holders of fully-paid shares.

On the 14th of November, 1894, the new company was compulsorily wound up and the respondents put on the list of contributories in respect of the above shares for 19s. per share.

H. Reed, Q.C., and J. Bradford, for the liquidator.—No contract in conformity with section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, has been filed and the onus is on the respondents to show it has: In re New Eberhardt Co. (Limited), Ex parte Menzies, 38 W. R. 97, 43 Ch. D. 118. The contract of the 15th of February gave an option to the Spiel's Company's shareholders to take shares on paying 1s. per share. The respondents were not such shareholders, but only nominees of them.

Levett, Q.C., and Butcher, for Elsner.—The contract of the 15th of February, 1892, taken in connection with the indorsed deed, was, when registered, a contract in writing within the meaning of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. It is not necessary that Elsner should be a party to that contract to have the benefit of it: he was the nominee of a shareholder who was entitled to the protection of the section. In any event the real contract was that the shares issued were to be issued as having 19s. per share as paid up thereon.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Whitaker, for McArthur, adopted the foregoing argument.

Bradford replied.

Aug. 5.—ROMER, J.—The first question that arises on this summons so far as concerns the respondents Elsner and McArthur is one of fact. Were the shares the subject of this application allotted to them as nominees of shareholders in Spiel's Company in pursuance of the option given to those shareholders by the 2nd clause of the agreement of the 15th of February, 1892, confirmed by the deed of the 19th of March, 1892? I am satisfied on the evidence that the shares were so allotted, and that they were not issued as suggested on behalf of the liquidator of the new company (the Common Petroleum Engine Co., Limited) under the provisions of clause 2 of the agreement as shares not applied for by the shareholders in Spiel's Company. The circumstance relied on by the liquidator that Elsner's application was on a form labelled "extra shares" admits of easy explanation. The facts are that Spiel's Company (wholly without the authority of the new company) issued to their shareholders two forms of application for shares—one as for shares to which they were directly entitled under the agreement, and the other as for extra shares not taken up by some of the shareholders, and the applicants seem not to have noticed any distinction between the two forms, but used them indiscriminately. As a matter of fact, the new company, at the time the shares in question were allotted, had not authorized the issue of any shares, and did not, in fact, allot any shares except to shareholders of Spiel's Company or their nominees in respect of the shares to which they were entitled under the agreement. And I should add that the new company never limited a time within which the shares should be applied for though Spiel's Company did make an abortive and ineffectual attempt to limit a time.

The next question that arises is one of law, whether the agreement and indorsed deed which have been duly registered, comply with the provisions of section 25 of the Act of 1867. In my opinion they do having regard to the cases I am about to refer to. In the first place the agreement as confirmed by the indorsed deed is in itself a contract in writing made before the issue of the shares, and not a mere offer by this company to allot shares like the memorandum which formed the subject of the decision in In re New Eberhardt Co. By this agreement the new company were bound to allot to each shareholder of Spiel's Company his proportion of shares if he applied for them, and the fact that each shareholder had an option and was not bound to apply did not the less render the agreement a contract and one binding on the new company. The new company had no option in the matter, and moreover, notwithstanding the curious wording of the agreement and the form of the assignment made in pursuance of it dated the 30th of March, 1892, I think the option given formed part of the consideration for the sale of the property, the subject of the agreement. I cannot hold here that the consideration paid for the shares issued was illusory, or that the agreement was a mere fraud or excuse to enable these shares to be issued at a discount or as nearly fully paid up: see Chapman's case, 43 W. R. 553, [1895] 1 Ch. 771. It was suggested by the liquidator that Spiel's Company had no right to distribute a valuable option which was in the nature of capital amongst its shareholders. That may be so, but that is a matter which concerns Spiel's Company, and its shareholders and creditors, and which cannot now be relied on by the liquidator for the purposes of this application.

There being, then, a contract in writing filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies before the issue of these shares, the next question is whether it is a sufficient contract within the meaning of section 25. Now, if the question were one arising for the first time I think a great deal might be said in favour of the contention that a contract within the meaning of the section ought to be (1) made direct with the allottee; and (2) showing on the face of it which are the shares to be allotted or issued to him. But the cases show that this is not necessary, and that the section (which is in the nature of a penal clause) must not be treated as by implication making essential, details with regard to the contract in reference to the above points not mentioned in the section. For example, as to (1) it has been held that if the contract be to allot shares to A., the shares may be allotted to B. as A.'s nominee, and the contract will then protect B.: see Carling's case, 1 Ch. D. 115, and the observations of James, L.J., p. 124. And apparently even the company need not be directly a party to the contract. It is sufficient if the contract be with a trustee for the company and adopted by the company, see Hartley's case, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 157, where Cairns, L.C., observes, p. 159, "It is hardly necessary to advert to the argument that the . . . . shares ought not to be taken as paid up shares, because the agreement . . . was not with the company but with a trustee and before the company was formed. The Act of Parliament does not require the agreement to be with the company, and such agreements are very seldom made with the company directly." And with regard to point (2) it has been held that the contract need not on the face of it identify the shares, see Ex parte Forde, 33 W. R. 839, 30 Ch. D. 153, and Hartley's case; and see also on both points Kirby's case, 46 L. T. (N. S.) 682, 30 W. R. Dig. 37, decided by Fry, J., and In re Buenos Ayres and Campana Railway Co., W. N. (1875) 59. In both these last-mentioned cases the registered contract did not specify the shares or the names of the allottees, and yet the allottees were held protected by the registered contract. In the last named case Sir G. Jessel, M.R., pointed out that section 25 did not render necessary the specification of the shares or of the name of the allottee, and he said that if the contract did not give such particulars the sole effect was to make it more difficult for the holders of shares not paid for in cash, to discharge the burden of proving that their shares had in fact been issued to them in pursuance of the registered contract. And with reference to these observations of the late Master of the Rolls, I need not again point out that in the present case the respondents have discharged the burden cast upon them, and satisfied me that their shares were issued in pursuance of the registered agreement.

Having regard to the above authorities, I do not see on what principle the registered agreement is to be held not sufficient. And, indeed, with reference to an agreement which cannot, I think on principle, be distinguished from that now before me, Cotton, L.J., in In re New Eberhardt Co., 43 Ch. D. 118, cited above, observed, p. 126: "If the company had registered not this document, but the agreement between the new company and the liquidator, my present opinion is that that would have been a contract registered to issue these shares as fully paid up shares," and I gather that Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., do not differ in that case from the opinion of Cotton, L.J.

Under these circumstances the application must be dismissed, as against these respondents, with costs. The liquidator may take his costs out of the assets, it being a proper case to bring before the court.

Company — Winding up — Misfeasance by officers— Directors — Auditors — Damages—Payment of dividends—Value of assets—Manager's certificate—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.

Directors who pay away the funds of a company under an honest and reasonable belief in a state of facts which would justify the payment will not be held liable to replace those funds merely because it turns out that on the true facts the payments were ultra vires.

The word "misfeasance" in section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, covers every misconduct by an officer of a company as such for which such officer might have been sued apart from the section. Therefore charges against auditors of having, through want of the exercise of ordinary skill and diligence, sanctioned accounts containing false statements, if proved and coupled with pecuniary damage to the company, constitute a "misfeasance" within the section. Auditors are not entitled to rely on the certificate of the company's general manager as to the value of the company's stock-in-trade if an ordinary careful examination of the books would have led them to suspect the accuracy of the manager's figures.

This was a summons taken out by the official receiver and liquidator in the winding up of the above-named company, which was being wound up by the court, that it might be declared that Samuel Lambert, Andrew Mouat, V. H. Parker, G. G. Macturk, J. W. Halden, and William Jackson, directors of the company, and Benjamin Pickering, a past auditor, were jointly and severally liable to pay to the applicant four several sums of £36 0s. 10d., £38 12s. 4d., £38 12s. 4d., and £38 17s. 4d., which, being moneys of the said company, were improperly applied in payment of dividends on certain preference shares in the said company for the years 1890, 1891, 1892, and 1893 respectively, together with proper interest on the said sums respectively from the respective dates of payment of the said dividends, and that Arthur Edgar Peasegood, a past auditor of the said company, was also liable to pay the said several sums of £38 12s. 4d. and £38 17s. 4d. applied as aforesaid for the years 1892 and 1893, together with such interest thereon respectively as aforesaid, and that the respondents might be ordered jointly and severally to pay to the applicants within four days from the service of the order the amounts which they respectively should be declared liable to pay to him in respect of the transactions aforesaid; and that it might also be declared with respect to each and all of the said respondents (but as to the respondent Arthur Edgar Peasegood only as from and after the date when his firm of Pickering, Peasegood, & Judge became auditors of the said company) that they respectively were guilty of misfeasance or breach of trust in relation to the said company in that they respectively authorized, sanctioned, participated, recommended, or permitted the issue and circulation of divers reports and statements of accounts of the said company, and in particular those for the years 1884 to 1892 inclusive, containing false and misleading entries with respect to (1) the value of the said company's mill, machinery, and site; (2) the value of the said company's stock-in-trade, particularly for the year 1887 and the subsequent years; and (3) the company's reserve fund.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The company was formed under the Companies Act, 1862, in 1879 for the purpose of taking over the business then carried on by an unlimited company called the Kingston Cotton Mill Co. of a cotton and spinning mill at Hull. The original nominal capital of the company was £210,000, divided into 21,000 shares of £10 each, 5,000 being preference and 16,000 ordinary shares. In 1882 the capital was increased by the creation of 4,000 new shares of £5 each called "£5 Preference Shares, 1882." The mill in which the company carried on its business was mortgaged to secure £30,000 and interest.

The articles of the company with regard to audit were the following:—

129. Once at least in every year the accounts of the company shall be examined, and the correctness of the balance-sheet ascertained by one or more auditor or auditors.

138. Every auditor shall be supplied with a copy of the balance-sheet, and it shall be his duty to examine the same with the accounts and vouchers relating thereto.

139. Every auditor shall have a list delivered to him of all books kept by the company, and shall at all reasonable times have access to the books and accounts of the company. He may, unless he himself is an accountant, employ accountants or other persons at the expense of the company to assist him in investigating such accounts, and he may, in relation to such accounts, examine the directors or any other officer of the company.

140. The auditors shall make a report to the members upon the balance-sheet and accounts, and in every such report they shall state whether, in their opinion, the balance-sheet is a full and fair balance-sheet, containing the particulars required by these articles, and properly drawn up, so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the company's affairs; and, in case they have called for any explanation or information from the directors, whether such explanation or information has been given by the directors, and whether the same has been satisfactory; and such report shall be read together with the report of the directors at the ordinary meeting.

The auditors did not report according to article 140.

Pickering, a chartered accountant, was appointed auditor of the company shortly after its formation, and he continued to be sole auditor till November, 1889, when his partner, Peasegood, chartered accountant, was appointed auditor with him.

The first directors were J. Gilby, J. W. Halden, T. Horncastle, H. P. Jackson, S. Lambert, G. G. Macturk, A. Mouat, V. H. Parker, W. H. Waite, W. F. West, and C. Wells. Halden, Lambert, Macturk, Mouat, and Parker continued to be directors till the date of the winding-up order—i.e., the 18th of March, 1894. The other directors named above either died, retired, or became disqualified before the liquidation. William Jackson was general manager of the company from its formation, and was appointed a director in 1882. He continued to hold the offices of director and general manager until his resignation in March, 1894. Mouat died pending the taking out of the summons.

The official receiver found in his report that though the company had been trading at a loss the stock-in-trade had been inflated by the general manager to an extent sufficient in each year to conceal the loss and show a fictitious profit, and that while the company's stock-in-trade, was according to summaries in the stock journal and yearly accounts, apparently increasing, the sales for the years 1889-1892, were, according to the same accounts, exhibiting, on the whole, a considerable decrease, but no member of the board of directors other than Jackson made any inquiries into the actual amount of the company's stock-in-trade for the time being and that the figures which Jackson from time to time inserted in the trading account and balance-sheet as representing the value of the stock-in-trade were accepted by the board without investigation. Further, that in their reports for 1889, 1890, 1891, and 1892, the fictitious trading profits were referred to as if they had in fact being made, and that in 1890-1893 the directors paid dividends on shares in the company though no profit was made in those years.

Pickering signed the first balance-sheet with the words "examined and found correct," and he employed this form of words in certifying the result of his audit at the foot of the balance-sheet of 1880 and 1881. Afterwards at the foot of the balance-sheets of the years 1882 to 1886 inclusive his form of words was "audited and found correct." In 1887 the words used were "examined with the books and found correct," and this latter form of words was used in subsequent balance-sheets issued before the commencement of the winding-up.

The official receiver stated that the auditors, when conducting the audits of the company's accounts, never ascertained, or attempted to ascertain by independent investigation, the amount or value of the company's stock-in-trade as at the end of the year of account, or called for any independent valuation of it. That both Pickering and Peasegood accepted with respect to the stock-in-trade the figures set down by Jackson in the summaries in the stock journal. That in the first balance-sheet of the company, and in the years 1882 to 1892, the stock-in-trade was set down as being "as per manager's certificate" of a certain value, but in fact there was never even a certificate by Jackson, except that in some cases the summary of stock-in-trade in the stock journal was signed, and in another case initialled by him.

The official receiver's report also stated that the value of the company's mill, machinery, and site had been stated in the balance-sheets at a figure much higher than that given by a firm of professional valuers in 1884.

With respect to the reserve fund, the report stated that in the annual accounts of the company considerable sums were from time to time set down as standing and carried to the credit of a reserve fund, and that fund was repeatedly referred to in the director's reports, but in fact no part of the alleged reserve fund was ever set apart by separate investment, and the entries in the accounts relating to it were, from first to last, mere book entries.

In answer to the charges of the official receiver, the directors' case was: In so far as the summons charged improper application of moneys of the company in the payment of dividends (1), that the payments were not an improper application, because of the two accounts of the company the revenue account in the years in question showed a sufficient profit for payment of the dividends, because there was no obligation on the company to deduct losses in respect of fixed capital before arriving at the profit balance, and that, in so far as the deduction of the sums appearing in the balance-sheet in excess of the true value of the stock-in-trade was concerned, the actual figures appearing in the balance-sheet were accepted by the directors under the certificate of the manager; and that the directors were guilty of no want of reasonable skill and care in the performance of their duties by accepting such certificate of the manager without further inquiry, and that the directors accepted such figures in good faith and in the belief that they were true. The auditors' case was that in the balance-sheets and accounts which they certified the figures in respect of the stock-in-trade were stated, as the fact was, to be by the manager's certificate, and that the auditors had no duty to go behind that certificate, and showed no want of reasonable skill and care in abstaining from so doing, since they believed the certificate to be true and had no ground for suspecting the contrary. In so far as the summons charged the directors with the issue and circulation of reports and accounts containing false and misleading entries with respect to the company's mill, machinery, and site, and the value of the company's stock-in-trade for the year 1887, and the subsequent years, and charged the auditors with sanctioning the same, it was urged that such misconduct or failure of duty, if proved, could not properly be made a subject of the misfeasance summons, not being a breach of trust, at all events so far as the charge relates to the auditors.

The vivâ voce evidence lasted for several days, and it was agreed that the summons should be confined to matters which occurred within six years of the date of the issue of the summons. The result of the evidence is stated in his lordship's judgment.

Cozens Hardy, Q.C., W. D. Rawlins, and Marshall Hall, for the summons.—The directors prepared and submitted balance-sheets and accounts containing misleading statements, and the auditors audited the balance-sheets containing such statements. Dividends were paid though there were no profits applicable to the payment of dividends. There was an enormous unreal value put upon the mill, and the value of the stock-in-trade was deliberately inflated by the manager. The auditors never attempted to ascertain the true state of affairs.

Haldane, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Eve, Q.C., for the auditors, took the objection that there was no jurisdiction in the court to determine the present claim upon a summons under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act 1890. The section is only aimed at, and only deals with, matters in the nature of breaches of trust. The auditors have not been guilty of anything in the nature of a breach of trust.

Cozens Hardy.—The argument on behalf of the auditors implies that there is no distinction between "misfeasance" and "breach of trust." The word "misfeasance" includes cases of breach of duty committed by an auditor, such as, for instance, fraudulently preparing and signing a balance-sheet showing profits when in fact there are no profits, London and General Bank (2), ante, p. 80, [1895] 2 Ch. 673. The case of an auditor is clearly within the section. It cannot be said that he is deprived of his right to trial by jury, as a jury would be an incompetent tribunal to investigate complicated matters of account. In re Liberator Permanent Benefit Building Society, 71 L. T. (N. S.) 406, 42 W. R. Dig. 43, the case was not one of an auditor but of a solicitor. In the London and General Bank the auditors were distinctly made liable, not on the ground that they were parties to a breach of trust, but on the ground only that they had been guilty of "misfeasance." That case really decides the point in the present case. The observations of James, L.J., in Coventry and Dixon's case, 28 W. R. 775, 14 Ch. D. 660, are not against my view. Neither is Lister v. Stubbs, 38 W. R. 548, 45 Ch. D. 1. Archer's case, 40 W. R. 212, [1892] 1 Ch. 322, is an authority that section 10 deals with any matter involving a breach of duty in respect to which the company might be sued at law or in equity. The object of the section is to substitute a summary procedure for a more lengthy one. The effect of the authorities and the section is that an officer of a company who has assumed and accepted the duties of his office, and whose breach of duty has resulted in loss to the company, even though the loss could before the Judicature Act have only been dealt with by an action at law is amenable to the jurisdiction of this court, and that in a summary proceeding like this such an officer is liable to make compensation for misfeasance proved against him.

Haldane, in reply on the preliminary objection.—The official receiver's contention is quite unfounded—namely, that notwithstanding the carefully selected words limiting the section to certain specific cases, the section is to be read as if it were applicable to all cases where an action at law or a suit in equity could be maintained when the person proceeded against is an officer of the company. In the London and General Bank the auditor was held liable because he had knowingly assisted the directors to commit a breach of trust, and made himself a constructive trustee. The object of section 10 is to deal with simple and plain cases either of direct making away with the assets on the part of the directors who have control of the trust funds, or of fraudulent participation by other persons, who have not control of the assets, in assisting the directors to take a course whereby the company loses it property. Archer's case is an authority in my favour. Bentinck v. Fenn, 36 W. R. 641, 12 App. Cas. 652, decides that the word "misfeasance" in the section does not mean misfeasance in the abstract, but misfeasance in the nature of a breach of trust resulting in loss to the company. In In re Wedgwood Coal Co., 31 W. R. 181, 47 L. T. N. S. 619, a still further limitation was put on the corresponding section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862. The dicta in these last-mentioned cases are in no way inconsistent with the London and General Bank. Barnes v. Addy, 22 W. R. 505, L. R. 9 Ch. 244, shows the class of cases to which the section is pointed. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The section seems to me to mean that there is to be a special remedy against persons who, being in the position of officers of the company, have done wrong, though it may not have intended to alter the remedy in every case.] The wording of the section is clear. The procedure only applies in certain cases. It does not cover a mere omission on the part of an officer to perform some act which he ought to perform: Wedgwood Coal Co. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., referred to Davies's case, 38 W. R. 571, 45 Ch. D. 537.] In Forest of Dean Coal Co., 27 W. R. 594, 10 Ch. D. 450, the late Master of the Rolls took the view that mere omission was not within section 165 of the Act of 1862. The circumstance that section 10 of the Act of 1890 was enacted subsequently to Bentinck v. Fenn and other similar cases affords a strong presumption that the Legislature intended to adopt the state of the law as the courts had up to that time interpreted it. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I shall not stop the case on this point, but I shall now proceed to hear the evidence of the auditors.]

Haldane then proceeded with the general case for the auditors, citing Purves v. Landell, 12 Ch. & F. 91; London and General Bank; and Walker v. Goe, 3 H. & N. 395, 6 W. R. C. L. Dig. 20; 4 H. & N. 350, 7 W. R. 289; and witnesses were examined.

Farwell, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for S. Lambert, cited the following cases: In re Derham & Co., 32 W. R. 487, 25 Ch. D. 752; Land Credit Co. v. Fermoy, 18 W. R. 1089, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 763; Barnard v. Bagshaw, 3 De G. J. & S. 355, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 113; Walker v. Goe; Poole's case, 26 W. R. 823, 9 Ch. D. 322.

A. à B. Terrell, for Parker, cited Wilmer v. McNamara, 43 W. R. 519, [1895] 2 Ch. 245.

W. Jackson appeared in person.

Cozens Hardy replied on the whole case.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I think that perhaps I had better deal with the preliminary objection to my jurisdiction to entertain these claims under a misfeasance summons.

Now, the words of section 10 of the Act of 1890 are as follows:—"Where in the course of the winding up of a company under the Companies Acts it appears that any person who has taken part in the formation or promotion of the company, or any past or present director, manager, liquidator, or other officer of the company, has misapplied, or retained, or become liable or accountable for any moneys or property of the company, or been guilty of any misfeasance or breach of trust in relation to the company, the court may, on the application of the official receiver or of the liquidator of the company, or of any creditor or contributory of the company, examine into the conduct of such promoter, director, manager, liquidator, or other officer of the company, and compel him to repay any moneys or restore any property so misapplied, or retained, or for which he has become liable or accountable, together with interest after such rate as the court thinks just, or to contribute such sums of money to the assets of the company, by way of compensation in respect of such misapplication, retainer, misfeasance, or breach of trust as the court thinks just." It seems to me that the word "misfeasance" covers every misconduct by an officer of the company as such for which such officer might have been sued apart from the section. The charge against the auditors here is that they, either knowingly or through the failure to use reasonable skill and care, certified accounts which ought not to have been certified. This is misconduct for which, in my opinion, either the company when solvent or the company in liquidation could have sued the auditors and recovered any pecuniary damage actually sustained by the company.

It is said that this is contrary to the dicta of the Lords Justices, and in particular the dictum of James, L.J., in Coventry and Dixon's case, when he said that "misfeasance" means "misfeasance in the nature of a breach of trust"—improper retention or application of the moneys or property of the company, or misfeasance by which the company's property has been improperly wasted or the company's credit improperly pledged to the pecuniary loss of the company. Now, I would first observe that this dictum was not necessary for the decision of the case; all that was necessary to be decided or was decided in Coventry and Dixon's case was, as is pointed out by Jessel, M.R., in Flitcroft's case, 31 W. R. 174, 21 Ch. D. 519, that an officer would not be liable to be proceeded against under section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, unless he was guilty of some misconduct for which he might have been sued apart from the section, not, it will be observed, apart from the Act; secondly, it is to be remembered that the respondents in Coventry and Dixon's case were de facto directors, and that the Lords Justices are speaking of the liability of directors rather than of officers generally. At all events, the case of the Leeds Estate Building Co. v. Shepherd, 36 W. R. 322, 36 Ch. D. 787, is conclusive to show that the failure to use reasonable skill and diligence will render an auditor liable to an action for damages. And Davies's case shows that the omission or neglect by a trustee and manager of a savings bank to comply with certain statutory provisions as to audit may constitute a misfeasance within the meaning of the section. I hold in the present case that the charges against the auditors of having, through want of the exercise of ordinary skill and diligence, sanctioned accounts containing false statements do, if they are proved, and are coupled with pecuniary damage to the company, constitute a misfeasance within the meaning of this section.

I will now proceed to deal with the question of how far, on the evidence before me, the charges against the directors and auditors respectively have been proved. In my judgment it is proved that the mill was not of the value mentioned in the accounts published by the directors. I think that the figure therein mentioned purports to be value and not cost, and that the directors knew that the value of the mill, machinery, and site was not half the value mentioned in the balance-sheet, and that the respondent Pickering knew this, but not the respondent Peasegood. I think, further, that the value of the stock-in-trade was much less than that stated in the balance-sheet, to an increasing extent in each year subsequent to 1887, but that neither directors or auditors were aware of this, they having acted upon the certificate of the manager, Jackson, believing the same to be true, and Jackson having admitted that he deliberately gave false certificates. I find that the directors acted reasonably in accepting the certificate of the manager. I find, further, that on the true state of accounts, if you deduct from the assets the excess in value put upon the mill and the stock-in-trade, there were no profits out of which the dividends could be paid, and the same is true if you deduct the excess in either respect. Having found these facts, I will answer in the light of them first the question whether the directors are liable in respect of the dividends. With regard to the excess in value of the stock-in-trade, I should hold, if I were free to decide this case according to my own judgment, that a director is in no sense a trustee. The Act does not say that a director is a trustee. He is not the owner of the funds which he has to apply, and I should have thought that he might safely be treated as the paid manager and agent of the company, and might well be held not to be responsible for the misapplication of the funds of the company unless he, through want of care or fraud, misapplied those funds. If it is said that, his responsibility being thus defined, he would not be responsible if, by the direction of the shareholders, he applied the funds to a purpose which the company could not authorize because it was a purpose ultra vires, my answer would be that, if he did so without carelessness or fraud, he ought not to be held liable, and that if he did so, knowing that the purpose was ultra vires, or was careless, he ought to be held responsible, not because he is a trustee, but because the ownership of the company is limited—i.e., is limited to the application of the funds to the statutory purposes, and his duty to the company as manager is not knowingly or carelessly to apply the funds to a purpose ultra vires of the company, even though he may have the authority of the shareholders; for a company does not seem to me, in regard to questions of ultra vires, to be an aggregate of the shareholders, but a substantive legal entity. I do not think that anyone can doubt that thus to define the duties of a director is more in accordance with commercial necessity and the sense of the commercial community than it is to hold directors liable to refund dividends which they have misapplied without fraud or carelessness, on the ground that legal principles compel lawyers to hold them liable in such a case as trustees or quasi-trustees. Nor is the view which I have suggested without high legal authority, for it seems to me that it is the basis of the decision of Chitty, J., in In re Denham & Co., and of the dicta of James and Mellish, L.JJ., in Rance's case, 19 W. R. 291, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 104. James, L.J., says: "If, by placing unfounded reliance upon the representations of their servants or actuaries, directors had arrived at the conclusion that they had made a divisible profit, this court ought not to sit as a court of appeal from that conclusion." And Mellish, L.J., says: "I quite agree that if the directors or a proper actuary had made out a profit and loss account the court ought to assume very strongly indeed that it was a correct account, and ought not, without very strong reasons showing that it was done mala fide, to set it aside or declare a dividend made upon it improper." It is to be remembered that, in arriving at a conclusion on the question whether a divisible profit has been made or not, the directors must, in regard to unrealized property, base their answer upon an estimate, and the judgment in Stringer's case, 17 W. R. 694, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 475, goes upon the assumption that directors who have exercised an honest but over-sanguine judgment are not to be held liable for the payment of dividends where events subsequently show that there were no profits out of which they could be declared. The point in Stringer's case was not as to the repayment of dividends, but arose on an application for an injunction.

There is, however, a considerable bulk of authority to show that directors are trustees for the company of such funds as are committed to their control in such sense that they will be liable for a misapplication of the funds which is ultra vires of the company independently of any proof of fraud or actionable negligence by the directors. The authorities as to the liability of directors as trustees seem to begin with the case of National Funds Assurance Co., 27 W. R. 502, 10 Ch. D. 118, followed by Flitcroft's case, and more recently by the Oxford Building Society's case, 35 W. R. 116, 35 Ch. D. 502; by the Leeds Estates Building Co. v. Shepherd, and by the Faure Accumulator Co.'s case, 37 W. R. 116, 40 Ch. D. 141; but in no one of those cases can I find that directors were held liable unless the payments were made either with actual knowledge that the funds of the company were being misappropriated or with knowledge of the facts that established the misappropriation. Take, for example, the Faure Accumulator Co.'s case, in which Kay, L.J., expressly finds that no imputation whatever is to be made upon the honesty or honourable conduct of the directors, but goes on to find them liable for having committed breaches of trust in making certain payments out of the money of the company which were ultra vires, the purpose for which the payment was made being known to the directors, although they were ignorant of its illegality, as, indeed, were many, if not a majority, of the legal profession.

On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that there is no such bulk of authority as binds me to hold that directors who pay away the funds of the company under an honest and reasonable belief in a state of facts which would justify the payment must be held liable to replace those funds because it turns out that on the true facts the payments were ultra vires. Having arrived at this conclusion in law, it remains for me to inquire on this part of the case whether these directors in fact paid away these dividends in the honest and reasonable belief that the necessary profits had been earned. I have not the slightest doubt but that they honestly believed it, and that the grounds of their belief were the statements of the manager, whom they had no reason to suspect. The only matter to be urged against them is that the auditors, to their knowledge, did not comply with article 140. [His lordship read article 140, and continued:—] But, in my judgment, compliance by the auditors with the provisions of article 140 would not have led to the discovery of the fraud of the manager.

With regard to the over-statement of the value of the mill and machinery, it seems to me that, even assuming this statement to be a statement of value and not of cost, it is not, having regard to the decisions in Lee v. Neuchatel Co., 37 W. R. 321, 41 Ch. D. 1, and Verner's case, L. R. [1894] 2 Ch. 239, a material misstatement so far as the declaration of the dividend is concerned, because, even assuming that to the knowledge of the directors such a depreciation in the value of the fixed capital had occurred as suggested, it would not make the declaration of the dividend ultrà vires nor prevent the payment of a dividend out of the excess of current receipts over current profits. It is no part of my duty to express an opinion on these decisions. I have only to follow the principles laid down within them provided I think that the facts of the present case are governed by those principles. It is true that the present case is not the case of a company formed to work a necessarily wasting property as was the case in Lee v. Neuchatel Co., nor the case of an investment company as in Verner's case; but I think that this case falls within the principles of those two cases read together.

The remaining charge against the directors is that they, by the misstatement in the balance-sheet as to the assets of the company in regard to the mill and machinery and the stock-in-trade, were guilty, at all events in respect of the mill, of making a statement as to the value of the assets which they knew to be untrue, and that the company has been damaged thereby by continuing to trade on the assumption that the assets were of the value stated in the balance-sheet, and that the directors are liable to make good the losses of the company while it continued so to trade. It seems to me that the directors are not so liable, because, in my judgment, the damages are too remote, and are not proved in fact to have been the consequence of the misstatement in question. The suggestion that such damages may be treated as resulting from the overstatement of the value of the assets seems to be based principally on a passage in the judgment of Stirling, J., in Leeds Estate Building Co. v. Shepherd, but Stirling, J., arrived at no such finding in fact, and in the present case I do not think I can do so. The company, if one takes the stock-in-trade on the manager's statement and then calculates the assets with the mill, &c., at their true value, does not seem to me to have been insolvent until the last year of its existence, and it is to be remembered that so long as the mill was a going concern the mortgagees were not likely to call in their debt. I know it is said that the mortgagees would have called in the debt but for having the accounts shown to them with the inflated value of the mill, but I think that there is no proof of this in fact. I therefore hold that the directors are not liable in respect of any of the charges mentioned in the misfeasance summons. I am not sorry so to hold, because I think that the directors who held half the share capital of the company honestly tried to do their duty.

With regard to the auditors the case is more difficult. They are, of course, entitled to the benefit of my decision with respect to the dividends, so far as it is based on Lee v. Nauchatel Co. and Verner's case, and in regard to the remoteness of the damage, but with regard to the stock-in-trade their case is very different from that of the directors, for they certainly were not entitled to rely upon the manager's certificate if an ordinary careful examination of the books ought to have made them suspect that statement. Now, it is plain to me that if the auditors had added to the stock-in-trade at the beginning of any year the purchases of raw material in that year and had deducted therefrom the sales, they must have seen that the statement of the stock-in-trade at the end of the year was so remarkable as to call for explanation, and they called for none. It is said that it is no part of the duty of an auditor to take stock. I agree it is not; but when it is said that it is no part of his duty to test the accuracy of the manager's certificate by a comparison of the figures in the books that require auditing I cannot agree. I think, therefore, that I must hold the auditors liable for the preference dividends which have been paid, with such costs as are applicable to this part of the case; and, having regard to the mode in which the auditors disregarded the articles as to the audit and the manner in which the audit was carried out, I do not think they ought to receive any costs. I think the directors ought to have their costs.

Jackson must be declared liable for the dividends improperly paid and the costs. If the auditors can distinguish between the costs which can be attributed to charges of fraud having been made and the costs of claims not involving a charge of fraud, they will not have to pay the former, but it will be difficult to make the distinction. The official receiver has only done his duty in making the inquiry, and will not be personally liable for any costs. He must, however, pay the costs ordered to be paid out of the assets at once, and not postpone the payment to other charges.

Rule nisi calling upon the stipendiary magistrate of Liverpool to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding him to hear and determine a summons issued under an order of the Board of Agriculture, called the Animals (Transit and General) Order of 1895, made in pursuance of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894.

The summons charged the defendant with three separate offences under the order. It was issued on the information of Burnham, who was the Secretary of the Liverpool branch of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. At the hearing the objection was taken that Burnham was not the proper person to prosecute. The objection was allowed and the summons was dismissed.

Section 2 of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, provides as follows: "The local authorities in this Act described shall execute and enforce this Act, and every order of Board of Agriculture so far as the same are to be executed and enforced by local authorities." The Council of the City of Liverpool were the local authority in the present case. The order of the Board of Agriculture contained the following provision: 30. The provisions of this order, except where it is otherwise provided, shall be executed and enforced by the local authority.

Dr. Commins showed cause.—The port sanitary authority, which was constituted by the City Council, are the sole persons who can prosecute for offences under the order of the Board of Agriculture; for, where an Act creates new offences, and at the same time prescribes a particular method of proceeding, that method only may be pursued: Reg. v. Lovibond, 19 W. R. 753, 24 L. T. N. S. 357, and Reg. v. Cubitt, 37 W. R. 492, 22 Q. B. D. 622. Section 57 of the Act provides that one half of the penalties recovered under the Act shall be paid to the person who proceeds for the same. If anyone were allowed to prosecute, the local authority would be deprived of a source of income which it was intended should belong to them: see Cole v. Coulton, 8 W. R. 412. A writ of mandamus is not the proper remedy. The prosecutor ought to have applied for a case to be stated or to have appealed: Reg. v. Wisbech Justices, 54 J. P. 743. They ought not now to be allowed to pursue the more expensive remedy of a mandamus.

Colam and Bartley, in support of the rule.—Section 54 provides that offences against the Act may be prosecuted and penalties recovered in the manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts; and section 55 provides that if any person thinks himself aggrieved by the decision of a court of summary jurisdiction, he may appeal therefrom to a court of quarter sessions. These sections, together with section 57, show that any person is entitled to prosecute and to sue for penalties, and that those rights are not restricted to a particular body. Caswell v. Morgan 28 L. J. M. C. 208, 7 W. R. 463; Back v. Holmes, 57 L. J. M. C. 37, 36 W. R. Dig. 108; Walker v. Laxton, 70 L. T. N. S. 690; and Cole v. Coulton are cases under other Acts in which it was decided that a private person might take proceedings to enforce the Act.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Having looked at the Act and the order, and having considered them together as one enactment, I have come to the conclusion that there is nothing in them sufficiently plain to deprive any person of the right and power to sue for the penalties under the Act and under the order. Reg. v. Cubitt, at first sight, appears to be an authority the other way. But the Act sued upon in that case was framed on different lines. There is no indication in that Act that any person had the power to sue.

Section 2 of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, does not in terms apply to the suing for penalties at all. That section is to be read in connection with section 34 and with the regulations of the Board of Agriculture. I do not see that either section 2 or section 34 are addressed primarily to seeing that the regulations are observed. Then we come to the penalty clauses. The language of these sections, which enable any person to sue, is most significant. Is that language elsewhere so clearly cut down as that no one but the borough council can sue? I can find no language in the Act which does so. The magistrate ought therefore to have heard the case, and the rule must be made absolute.

With regard to the second point raised, we have a discretion in the matter, and we think the application for a mandamus was, on the whole, the cheapest remedy.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. When an Act imposes penalties for certain offences, and provides that those penalties are to be recovered under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, that means, primâ facie, that anyone may take proceedings to enforce the Act, and, in order to cut down that general rule, you must find something in the Act, if not in express terms, at all events, unmistakably clear. I must say with regard to section 2 that it has nothing to do with the matter in question. That section merely describes who are to be the local authority. In section 34, again, there is nothing to indicate that the local authority is the only authority who may proceed to recover penalties. The important sections are section 51, which imposes the penalty, section 52, which describes the offences, and section 54, which provides the mode of procedure. In these sections there is nothing to indicate that no one but the borough council may prosecute, while section 57 contains a clear intimation of the real meaning of the Legislature. Half of the penalty is to be paid to the person who proceeds for the same. The object is to induce persons who know of an offence to come forward and prosecute. It is a provision with which one is familiar. But with regard to Reg. v. Cubitt there was nothing of that kind in the Act to which it referred. The other cases cited were more applicable to the present case than Reg. v. Cubitt.

Rule made absolute.

In re HOLT & CO.'S TRADE-MARK. (a.)

Trade-mark — Rectification of register—Name—Fictitious character — "Trilby" in ordinary type — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Acts, 1883-1888 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 64 (1) (a), (b), (d), (e).

The names of imaginary persons are "words" within clause (e) of section 64 of the Patents, &c., Acts, 1883-1888, and not names of "individuals" within clause (a). They may, therefore, be registered, though not "printed, impressed, or woven in a particular or distinctive manner."

So held by Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.; Kay, L.J., dissenting.

Decision of North, J., ante, p. 269, reversed.

This was an appeal from the decision of North, J. (reported ante, p. 269).

The question was whether the word "Trilby" (the name of a chief character of a novel of that name), printed in ordinary type, was capable of registration under the Patents, &c., Act, 1888. Section 64 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, as amended by section 10 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1888, provides that "for the purposes of this Act a trade-mark must consist of or contain at least one of the following essential particulars: (a) A name of an individual or firm printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner; or (b) a written signature or copy of a written signature of the individual or firm applying for registration thereof as a trade-mark; or (c) a distinctive service, mark, brand, heading, label, or ticket; or (d) an invented word or invented words; or (e) word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods, and not being a geographical name."

North, J., was of opinion that the mark came within clause (a), and that as it was not "printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner," it did not satisfy the requirements of the Act, and must be struck off the register.

Holt & Co., the owners of the mark, appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Micklem, for the appellant.—Clause (a) is confined to individuals or firms in existence, and this mark is registerable under clause (e).

Sir R. Webster, A.G., and Ingle Joyce, for the Comptroller.—It is the practice in the office to allow the registration of the names of fictitious characters.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Kerly, for the respondents.—There is no reason for restricting clause (a) to existing individuals or firms. This mark comes within (a) and cannot, therefore, be registered under (e). Moreover, the mark is descriptive. [They referred to: Harris' Trade-mark, 9 R. P. C. 492; Banks and James' Trade-mark, ante, p. 32; Farbenfabriken &c., Somatose case, 42 W. R. 488, [1894] 1 Ch. 645; and Burland v. Broxbourne Oil Co., 38 W. R. 89; 42 Ch. D. 274.]

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of North, J., removing the word "Trilby" from the register of trade-marks. The word is applied by the plaintiffs to ladies' gloves, aprons, and blouses. The question turns on the true construction of section 10 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888, which replaced section 64 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883. [His lordship read section 10, and continued:—] This section must be taken in connection with other sections of both Acts, and especially in connection with sections 68 to 76 of the Act of 1883. The decisions, however, on that portion of section 64 of the Act of 1883 which relates to fancy words and words not in common use, are inapplicable to the section which has been substituted for it, and which does not contain those words. Clauses (a) and (b), however, remain unaltered. The word "Trilby" can clearly be registered as a trade-mark. No one disputes this. "Trilby" is either the name of an individual, and within clause (a) of section 10 of the Act of 1888, or it is a word within clause (e) of that section. The difficulty is to determine which of these two it is. "Trilby" does not come within any of the other sub-sections of section 10. It may have been once an invented word within clause (d), but it long ago became too well known to fall under that head. On the other hand, "Trilby" is not a geographical name, nor has it any reference to the character or quality of goods. The argument that it has, is ingenious but unsatisfactory. To what character or quality does the word refer? The only answer suggested is that, when used with articles of ladies' clothing it has reference to such articles as are fit for a lady, or for such a person as "Trilby." This is too fanciful and far-fetched for any practical purpose. In re Harris' Trade-Mark, in which the Beatrice shoe was in question, turned on the fancy word clause in the Act of 1883, and not on the Act we have now to consider. The same observation applies to In re Banks & James' Trade-Mark, the "Shakespeare" cigar case. I do not think that the word "Trilby" can fall both within clause (a) and within clause (e). It must, I think, fall within one or the other, but not within either at the option of the person desiring to register it. If "Trilby," or any other word, is the name of an individual within clause (a), it may be registered, but then it must be "printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner." This condition is essential to protect other persons of the same name in the right to use it in their own trade.

It was contended that a person might register his own name under (e), and that other persons of the same name would be protected by the proviso clause (3). But clause (3) is a proviso to clause (2), and not to clause (1), which states what may be registered. It would, in my opinion, be wrong in law to construe section 10 of the Act of 1888 as allowing a person to register under (e)—i.e., in no particular or distinctive manner—any word which is the name of an individual within clause (a), and which under that clause must be "printed, impressed, or woven in some particular or distinctive manner." Such a construction would render the condition imposed by clause (a) nugatory. So far I agree with the judgment of North, J.

There remains, however, the real difficulty in this case, which is to determine whether the word "Trilby" is the name of an individual within clause (a) of section 10 of the Act of 1888. Clause (a) does not say that the name to be registered need be the name of a living person, nor the name of the applicant for registration. In this respect clause (a) differs from clause (b). The reference to a firm, however, points rather to real persons than to imaginary persons. In metaphorical language, an imaginary person may perhaps be called an "individual," but such a use of the word is unusual, and to my mind rather fanciful. It is hardly to be supposed that the Legislature meant "individual" to be taken in a fanciful or metaphorical sense, or meant it to denote an imaginary person who has not, and never had, any real existence. I do not think that such words as Hamlet, Sam Weller, Jupiter, Venus, &c., can be called names of "individuals" within the meaning of clause (a) of section 10. Such names fall within (e) rather than (a). "Trilby" is clearly a word within (e) unless it is the name of an "individual" within (a), and I am not prepared to hold it to be within (a). The language of (e) is clear; that of (a) ambiguous as regards the names of persons who have not, and never had, a real existence. That which is clear ought to prevail over that which is doubtful. On this point, therefore, I am unable to agree with North, J. The practice of the office has been to allow the registration of names of imaginary persons, although such names are not "printed, impressed, or woven in any particular or distinctive manner." The view taken in the office has been that such names are "words" within clause (e) of section 10, and not names of "individuals" within clause (a).

For the reasons I have given I think this view and the practice founded upon it are correct. No doubt the registration of such a name as "Trilby" would give rise to troublesome questions if a person of that name should hereafter make his appearance and wish to carry on business under his own name or to register his name printed in some distinctive manner under clause (a). Such questions would no doubt be avoided by deciding that such a name as "Trilby" could only be registered under (a). Again, to hold that such a word as "Trilby" can be registered under (e) is open to the objection that such a construction creates monopolies in the use of a great number of common names without imposing any condition whatever, and invites scrambles to obtain such monopolies. In this respect the Act of 1888 lets in words which were excluded by the Act of 1883, by reason of their being words in common use. On the other hand, as pointed out in the Somatose case, the Act of 1883, by letting in fancy words, was in some respects wider than the Act of 1888, which has left those words out and replaced them by invented words. All the court has to do, however, is to construe the words of section 10 of the Act of 1888, and of those sections of the Act of 1883 which have to be construed with it. The creation of monopolies in words was no doubt intended by the Legislature, but it is obvious, from section 10 of the Act of 1888, and from section 74 of the Act of 1883 (which relates to additions to trade-marks), that whilst on the one hand the Legislature has permitted the acquisition of monopolies in many words for trade purposes, on the other hand it has placed restrictions on that acquisition, with a view, no doubt, to lessen the inconvenience which every monopoly produces. This double object must not be lost sight of. But, after all, the true construction of the Act must be the ultimate guide in every case, and the construction which North, J., has adopted is, I think, too far removed from the ordinary meaning of the words "name of an individual" to be sustained. The appeal must therefore in my opinion be allowed, with costs.

KAY, L.J.—The question on this appeal is whether "Trilby" can be registered alone, as a trade-mark for ladies' gloves, aprons, and blouses. North, J., has held that it cannot. The question turns on the meaning of the Trade-Marks Act of 1888. That statute altered the requirements of section 64 of the Act of 1883. Section 10 of the Act of 1888 provides that "a trade-mark must consist of or contain at least one of the following essential particulars." Then there are a number of sub-sections which deal with four subjects—(a) and (b) a name of an individual or firm, (c) a distinctive device, (d) an invented word (e) "a word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods, and not being a geographical name." It is obvious that this last sub-section is not intended to include the matters dealt with by the preceding sub-sections. "Word" in this last sub-section (e) does not mean "name," or "invented word." These are provided for before. On any other construction the preceding sub-sections (a), (b), and (d), would be superfluous and unmeaning. The section is in this part of it an exact copy of section 64 of the Act of 1883, except that, instead of the words "fancy word or words not in common use," sub-sections (d) and (e) are substituted. No word, not being a name or a fancy word, could be registered alone under the Act of 1883. "Trilby" cannot be registered as a name alone, under (a) or (b), because it is not "printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner," nor is it the signature of the person applying to register. Nor could it be registered as an "invented word" under sub-section (d). It was not invented or first used by the person seeking to register it, which would seem to be necessary to obtain registration under sub-section (d). If "Trilby" is not a name of an individual, I cannot see how it can be a "word" under sub-section (e). If it is a word and not a name, it must be an "invented word," and that must be registered, if at all, under the previous sub-section (d). It is none the less an "invented word," because this applicant, not being the inventor, cannot register it under that sub-section. "Word" in sub-section (e) is contrasted with "invented word" under sub-section (d). In sub-section (e), "word" has its ordinary meaning, which, according to the dictionaries, is "a part of speech"—the expression of a mental idea or conception. A meaningless collocation of letters is not a "word" in the ordinary sense. Sub-section (e), contrasted with sub-section (d), seems to me not to apply to anything which would not come within the ordinary signification of a "word."

Now, unquestionably, "Trilby" is a name. Otherwise it has no meaning whatever. It is the name of an individual? It is the name of a person in fiction. It is a personal name. It is not like the name of a heathen diety, as suggested. It is used as the name of a supposed human being. In that sense it is the "name of an individual." There is no evidence that it was ever the name of a living person. If it ever was I do not see that it would be possible to say that it was not the "name of an individual." "Name of an individual," as used in the Act of 1888, means, I think, a personal name, as distinguished from the name of a plant or an animal. If it is a personal name it cannot be registered, unless it is "printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner." When the name of a fictitious person is brought in for registration, is there to be an inquiry whether anyone has borne the name? And, if not, is it to be treated, not as an "invented word," but as a "word" which may be registered under sub-section (e)? We are told that it is the practice to put names like this on the register. But I believe this is the first time this question has been brought before the court, and we must decide what is the true effect of the statute in such cases. On the whole, my opinion is that "Trilby" is a "name of an individual," and that, to entitle it to registration, it must be "printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner." If this were not so, I should think it was an "invented word," which, however, this applicant could not register because he was not the inventor nor the person who first used it. But I do not think that an "invented word," which cannot be registered under sub-section (d), can come within sub-section (e) and be registered as a "word" under that sub-section.

The result is that I agree with North, J., and think that this word should be removed from the register.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question in this case is whether the word "Trilby," printed in ordinary black type, can be registered as a trade-mark for gloves, ladies' blouses, and ladies' aprons, and this depends upon the true construction of section 10 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888, sub-sections (a), (b), and (e). This section is as follows: "For section 64 of the principal Act" (that is, the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883) "the following section shall be substituted—namely, 64 (1): For the purposes of this Act a trade-mark must consist of or contain at least one of the following essential particulars." This I read as meaning that if a proposed trade-mark has one of such essential particulars it may be registered as a trade-mark; aliter if it has not. [His lordship read clauses (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e), and continued:—] One of those five particulars it must have. Now, into which of those five cases, if any, does "Trilby" fall? First, is it a name of an individual or firm within sub-section (a)? If it is, then, in my judgment, it cannot be registered as it is registered, because, as I read sub-section (a), if it be the name of an individual or firm within the meaning of that sub-section, it must be "printed, impressed, or woven in some particular and distinctive manner," which it is not. It is clearly not within (b), for it is not a "written signature or copy of a written signature of the individual or firm applying for registration thereof as a trade-mark." I may say at once that "Trilby" does not fall within (c)—i.e., "a distinctive device," nor, in my judgment, within (d), for it is not a word coined for the first time by the owner of the trade-mark, for it was used by Du Maurier in his book in 1893, and was therefore not an invented word in 1895, when the appellant registered his trade-mark: see the Somatose case.

The real question, to my mind, is, Does "Trilby" fall within (a), and, if not, within (e)? In my judgment, if it falls within (a), it does not fall within (e); but, if not, then it does fall within (e). North, J., has held that the true reading of this section 10 is that sub-sections (a) and (b) are the sub-sections which alone deal with names, and in reality he reads sub-section (e) as if it ran "a word or words other than a name having no reference to the character, &c., of the goods," and he holds that "Trilby" is a name and therefore a trade-mark per se within (a) and cannot come within (e), for such sub-section does not embrace names of any sort at all. With all respect I cannot read this section in this way, for it is inserting words which are not to be found in the sub-section, and which, in my opinion, need not be inserted in order to make sense of the whole section. I read the phrases "individual or firm" in sub-sections (a) and (b) as indicating the same thing, that is, the name or written signature of a real human being or a real firm. It seems to me that the same construction must be placed upon the words "individual or firm" in sub-section (a) as in sub-section (b)—indeed it is not admissible to read them otherwise; and how sub-section (b) can be read to embrace the name of an unreal person, which "Trilby" is, or of an unreal firm, I do not see. The words of sub-section (b) are a "written signature of the individual or firm apply for registration thereof as a trade-mark." This clearly must mean a real individual, for how can a fictitious person or fictitious firm apply for the registration of a trade-mark? As it is quite impossible, in my judgment, to make "Trilby" fall into sub-section (b) as being an individual as therein designated, so it appears to me equally impossible to make "Trilby" fit into sub-section (a). In my judgment these two sub-sections do not embrace fictitious names such as emanate from the pen of novel writers or from the creative brain of other composers, and this being what the name of "Trilby" is, it does not fall, in my opinion, within sub-section (a). That the name of "Trilby" is a word I do not doubt. It is nothing more nor less than a fictitious fancy name—i.e., a word. Is it then a word having reference to the character or quality of the goods, or is it a geographical name? I agree with North, J., in this, and I say it is neither. Then why is it not within sub-section (e) of section 10? In my judgment sub-section (e) embraces a name which does not fall within sub-section (a), and as "Trilby," for the reasons which I have given, does not fall within (a), and as it has the essential particulars named in sub-section (e) of being a "word" having no reference to the character or quality of the goods and not being a geographical name—I would point out that geographical names are dealt with in sub-section (a)—I think that "Trilby" is a good trade-mark within sub-section (e), and for these reasons I think that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

JAMES v. BUENA VENTURA NITRATE GROUNDS SYNDICATE (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Shares—New Shares—Allotment—"Member"—Right of representative of deceased member—Companies Act, 1862, Table A, article 27.

In 1891 a special resolution of the defendant company was passed and duly confirmed increasing the capital of the company by the creation of new shares, and authorising the directors to issue such shares. On the 21st of April, 1893, a special resolution of the company was passed that the new shares should be offered for allotment at par to the members of the company who, at the date of the confirmation of the resolution, should be the registered holders of the fully paid-up shares of the company. This resolution was duly confirmed on the 11th of May, 1893. The company was one to which Table A applied.

The plaintiff was the executrix of a member of the company who was living at the date of the special resolution increasing the capital, and was, therefore, by virtue of article 27 of Table A, entitled to the offer of a proportion of the new shares, but who died in 1892, i.e., before the actual issue of the shares pursuant to the special resolution passed in April, 1893. On the 11th of May, 1893, circular letters were addressed to the shareholders calling upon them to state within ten days whether they wished to take the new shares to which they were entitled. One of these letters was addressed to "the executor" of the deceased member at an address which was not the registered address of the deceased member, and the letter never reached the plaintiff.

In May, 1894, the plaintiff became aware of the allotment of the new shares, and applied for the allotment to her of the shares to which the deceased member would have been entitled. The disposal of these shares had been deferred, and they were still in the hands of the company. The deceased member's name was still upon the register of shareholders.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to an allotment of the deceased member's proportion of the new shares.

Appeal by the plaintiff from the decision of Chitty, J., refusing to order certain shares in the defendant company to be allotted to the plaintiff. The facts are fully set out in the judgment of Lord Herschell.

Byrne, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the plaintiff.—When the resolution sanctioning the increase of capital was passed, H. B. James was a member of the company, and he is consequently a "member" within the meaning of article 27 of Table A. The company could not, without first altering article 27, make a different allotment from the one thereby provided for. The shares are still at the disposal of the company and the delay has not prejudicially affected the position of the company. In re Bowling and Welby's Contract, 43 W. R. 417, [1895] 1 Ch. 663, merely decided that representatives of deceased members were not members within section 199 of the Companies Act, 1862.

They referred also to Imperial Hydropathic Hotel Co., Blackpool, v. Hampson, 31 W. R. 330, 23 Ch. D. 1; In re Agriculturist Cattle Insurance Co., Baird's Case, 18 W. R. 1094, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 725; and New Zealand Gold Extraction Co. v. Peacock, [1894] 1 Q. B. 622.

Farwell, Q.C., and Method, for the respondents.—It was not necessary to alter article 27, for if a company has power to abrogate an article in toto, as it has under section 50 of the Companies Act, 1862, it must have power to do so for a special occasion: In re Bank of Hindustan, China, and Japan, Hippisley's Case, 22 W. R. 113, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 1. "Member" means primâ facie a living person, not a dead one. Article 13 of Table A provides for representatives of deceased members being registered as members. As to the letter, we did the best we could and the plaintiff must be taken to have received it: Household Fire and Carriage Accident Insurance Co., Limited, v. Grant, 27 W. R. 858, 4 Ex. D. 216; Henthorn v. Fraser, 40 W. R. 433, [1892], 2 Ch. 27.

Byrne, Q.C., in reply.—It is very unfair that a "member" should include a member whether living or dead when the case is one of liability, and should refer only to a living member when an advantage attaches to the membership.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord HERSCHELL.—In this case the plaintiff claimed a declaration that, by virtue of a special resolution passed at a meeting of the defendant company held on the 21st of April, 1893, and confirmed at a meeting held on the 11th of May 1893, the plaintiff as the legal personal representative of Harry Berkeley James, deceased, is entitled to an allotment at par of fifty of the 500 shares of £10 each in the capital of the company directed to be offered for allotment by that special resolution; and an injunction restraining the defendant company and its directors from allotting or otherwise disposing of the said 500 shares without allotting to the plaintiff or her nominees fifty of such shares.

At an extraordinary general meeting of the members of the company held on the 2nd of March, 1891, a special resolution was passed, which was duly confirmed on the 28th of July, 1891, in the following terms:—"That the capital of the company be increased to £15,000 by the creation of 50 new shares of £100 each, and that in pursuance of article 26 of Table A appended to the Companies Act, 1862, the directors be and they are hereby authorized to issue such shares." It may be well here to state that, with a few modifications which it is not necessary to specify, the articles contained in Table A applied to this company. Article 27 of Table A provides that "subject to any direction to the contrary that may be given by the meeting that sanctions the increase of capital, all new shares shall be offered to the members in proportion to the existing shares held by them, and such offer shall be made by notice specifying the number of shares to which the member is entitled, and limiting a time within which the offer, if not accepted, will be deemed to be declined, and after the expiration of such time, or on the receipt of an intimation from the member to whom such notice is given that he declines to accept the shares offered, the directors may dispose of the same in such manner as they think most beneficial to the company." No direction to the contrary was given by the meeting which, by the resolution referred to, sanctioned the increase of capital. At the time the resolution was passed and confirmed, Mr. James was registered as a member of the company owning ten shares. The effect, therefore, of article 27 was to entitle him or the person who should at the time of the issue of the new shares be his successor in title to those ten shares, to an offer of his proportion of the new shares.

On the 6th of March, 1893, a special resolution was passed, which was confirmed on the 24th of March following, adding a clause to the articles of association of the company, empowering it by special resolution to divide its capital by sub-division of its shares into shares of a smaller amount than that fixed by the company's memorandum of association.

On the 21st of April, 1893, the following special resolution was duly passed, which was duly confirmed on the 11th of May, 1893:—"That the share capital of the company, which now consists of shares of £100, be sub-divided into shares of £10 each, and that each of the 100 existing fully paid-up shares of £100 be divided into ten fully paid-up shares of £10 each, and that each of the 50 existing shares of £100 each on which nothing has as yet been paid be divided into ten unpaid shares of £10 each, and that such last-mentioned shares be offered for allotment at par to the members of the company who, at the date of the confirmation of this resolution, shall be the registered holders of the fully paid-up shares of the company, and in the proportion of one unpaid share for every two fully paid-up shares, and that any shares which may not be capable of being so allotted, or which may not, within a time to be prescribed by the directors, be accepted by the members holding fully paid-up shares, be allotted to such persons in such manner and on such conditions as the directors may from time to time prescribe."

A good deal of argument was addressed to us on the question whether this resolution sanctioned a different allotment of the shares from that provided for by article 27, and, if so, whether it was competent by a special resolution to sanction a departure from the provisions of article 27 without having first by a special resolution duly altered that article. I am not satisfied that it would be competent for the company thus to act. It is unnecessary, however, to decide the point, as I do not think that the resolution of April, 1893, prescribes any different mode of allotment from that provided for by article 27. The words used in the resolution—"the members of the company who, at the date of the confirmation of this resolution shall be the registered holders of the fully paid-up shares of the company"—appear to me aptly to describe the members entitled to an offer of the shares under the resolution sanctioning the increase of capital, when read with article 27. The words cover the persons who were members at the time when the resolution for an increase of capital was passed, and any persons who at the time of its issue were the successors in title of such members. On the 21st of April, 1893, at a meeting of the directors of the company, the secretary was instructed to send a circular to the shareholders, asking them to state immediately, in anticipation of the resolution to divide the shares being confirmed at the meeting to be held on the 11th of May, whether they would wish to subscribe for the new shares which would be offered first to them, for the space of ten days—viz., till the 21st of May—and requesting them to state within that period if they wished to take the shares to which they were entitled, informing them at the same time that, if by the 21st of May they had not applied for the shares, the directors would proceed to allot them as they thought right. Accordingly, on the 11th of May, a circular letter to that effect was sent by the secretary to the members. It is to be taken as a fact that such a circular was sent addressed to "the executor of the late H. B. James, 23, Leadenhall-street." It is denied that any such letter was received by, or came to the knowledge of, the plaintiff, and I think this also must be taken to be the fact. The registered address of Mr. James in the books of the defendant company was "9, Gracechurch-street." It appears that this was the address of the San Jorge Nitrate Co., who were in the habit of receiving letters for him, and that they had changed their offices prior to May, 1893, to 23, Leadenhall-street.

On the 24th of May, 1893, a meeting of the directors of the defendant company was held, at which it was resolved to allot the shares applied for and to issue certificates to the allottees, and to defer the disposal of the shares unapplied for (being the proportion to which Mr. H. B. James, deceased, would have been entitled). Mr. James died on the 22nd of July, 1892. His will was proved on the 3rd of March, 1893. The probate was not produced to the secretary of the defendant company until December, 1894. The delay was due to accidental circumstances, for which no blame can be attributed to the plaintiff, the executrix. On the 21st of May, 1894, the solicitor for the plaintiff, having just before then ascertained that there had been the allotment of new shares referred to, applied for an allotment to her of the shares to which she was entitled. The proportion of the new shares claimed still remained unallotted, but the company refused to make any allotment to her; hence the present action.

Chitty, J., decided against the plaintiff on the ground that at the time the resolution of April, 1893, was passed, Mr. James, being dead, was no longer a member of the company. It is no doubt the fact that, strictly speaking, although Mr. James's name was still on the register, he was not, being dead, a member of the company. It seems to me, however, perfectly clear that the word "member," as used in some of the articles of the company, must be held to include those whose names are on the register, though they are no longer living. The article, for example, which in the case of this company is substituted for article 72 of Table A, authorizes the directors to distribute the profits of the company "between the members" by way of dividend. It cannot be doubted that they would be warranted in paying the proportionate share of the profits to the representative of a deceased member, although the word "member" only is used, and that such representative would be entitled to claim that dividend. For this purpose the deceased member must still be regarded as a member within the meaning of the article. In a somewhat similar case James, L.J., said "the estate is the member." This is, of course, a metaphorical expression, but it sufficiently indicates the legal situation of the parties. Again, where a liability arises with respect to the shares—as, for example, where a call is made on the "members"—it seems equally free from doubt that the liability attaches to the estate of the deceased member, and must be discharged by his representative, even though, being deceased, he is no longer, strictly speaking, a member of the company. Other instances might be cited where the articles require this effect to be given to the use of the word "member," but those I have given will suffice. I can see no sufficient reason why the estate of a deceased member should be subject to the burdens of membership and should not have every pecuniary benefit accruing to the shares in respect of which he is registered.

It is said that there may be a greater difficulty, where the benefit is of the nature of an offer to be made to the holder of shares, in making that offer to the legal representative of a member, than to the member himself. But, even if this be so, I do not think it is a sufficient reason for denying to the estate of a deceased member an advantage which is offered to all the other persons who are members of the company, whilst continuing to hold that estate liable to all the burdens attaching to the shares registered in his name. In the present case the offer of the shares was to remain open to the shareholders entitled to an allotment for ten days, if they applied for an allotment within that time. The notice conveying the offer was not sent to the registered address of the deceased member. Even if this would have been sufficient, had better means of communication with his representative been known, I am not satisfied that it would have sufficed where, as in this case, the company had, prior to the date of the resolution, been in communication with the solicitor of the executrix with reference to other matters relating to the shares of the deceased. It is not necessary to decide what would have been the rights of the parties supposing the company had sent by post a letter containing the offer directed to the representative of the deceased at his registered address, or directed to the place of abode or business of such representative or her solicitor, and, not having received an answer applying for the shares within the time limited, had proceeded to dispose of them otherwise.

In the present case the shares are still at their disposal, and I do not see that they have in any way acted to their prejudice on the assumption that the shares would not be applied for. For the reasons I have given I think the plaintiff was entitled to have the offer of shares, which was made to the members of the company, made to her also. As soon as she became aware of this right she elected to exercise it, and I think that, the shares not having been in any way disposed of by the directors, they were bound to allot them accordingly.

RIGBY, L.J., after stating the facts said:—It will be seen that this resolution (the resolution passed on the 21st of April and confirmed on the 11th of May, 1893) is in no sense a resolution sanctioning, within the meaning of article 27, the increase of capital, nor does it purport upon the face of it to alter article 27. This resolution, however, is not necessarily inconsistent with article 27. The registered holders of shares at the date of the confirmation of it must necessarily have been the same persons as, or successors in title of, the persons who were members when the resolution sanctioning the increase of capital became operative; giving the same meaning to the word "members" in each resolution, the persons indicated as being entitled to an option would be the same. But, even if this were not so, no majority of the shareholders, even by special resolution purporting to alter the regulations of the company, could retrospectively affect, to the prejudice of non-consenting owners of paid-up shares, the rights already existing under article 27. At the date of the confirmation of the last in date of the resolutions, the name of Mr. James still appeared upon the register of members as the holder of the ten fully paid-up shares which he held when the resolution sanctioning the increase of capital was passed, and under both special resolutions five £100 shares out of the new capital, or fifty £10 shares into which they were sub-divided, would have to be offered in respect of those fully paid-up shares, unless his death in the meantime had set those shares free to be otherwise disposed of by the directors.

The plaintiff had proved James' will before April, 1893, but it had been necessary to send out the probate to the Argentine Republic, and without any default on her part it was not produced to the company until December, 1894. In May, 1893, the death of Mr. James was known to the company, and the secretary sent to the address of a company in which Mr. James held shares, though it was not his registered address for the purpose of the articles, a circular addressed to the executor of the late Mr. James, but the circular never reached Mrs. James. Similar circulars were sent to all the members, and all prescribed a limit of ten days for them to come in and exercise the option of taking new shares, and as the option was a valuable one all of them claimed their proportion of shares, and on the 24th day of May, 1893, 450 out of 500 new £10 shares were allotted, and the fifty which would have gone to Mr. James, if he had been alive, were reserved, and had not been dealt with when Mrs. James for the first time heard of the allotment of new shares and applied for an allotment to her in May, 1894.

The real question is whether the provision of article 27 of Table A for offering the new shares to members, is intended to be confined to members in the stricter sense of the word, or whether it may not include the representatives of deceased members.

Speaking generally, the executors of a deceased member of a limited company as representing the estate, are entitled to all the profits and advantages attaching to the shares belonging to their testator, and subject to all the incidental liabilities, although in terms such profits, advantages, and liabilities would seem to attach to members only. Thus, under article 72 of Table A, which provides that the directors may, with the sanction of the company in general meeting, declare a dividend to be paid to the members in proportion to their shares, it would be difficult to hold that the estate of a deceased member, and his executors as representing his estate, are not entitled to a proper proportion of dividend, though the executors may not be themselves registered members. So it could hardly be contended that under article 4, providing that the directors may make calls upon the members, the estate of a deceased member, and his executors as representing that estate, are not liable to bear calls made after his death, so long as his share remains untransferred. The liability for calls exists, notwithstanding the fact that the required notice cannot effectually be given to a dead man, because it may be given to his representatives; though, if the company is not aware of his death, notice served at his registered address is sufficient when the articles provide for such service upon members: New Zealand Gold Extraction Co. v. Peacock.

In all these cases the result is arrived at by treating the word "member" as including deceased member so long as his name is on the register, or, what comes to the same thing, treating the estate of the deceased member as being a member for the purpose both of profit and liability: In re Agriculturist Cattle Insurance Co., Baird's Case. In my judgment a similar construction should be applied to article 27 of Table A; with the result that the estate of Mr. James, as represented by his executrix, who is now registered owner of his paid-up shares, is entitled to an allotment of the fifty new £10 shares reserved in May, 1893.

The main argument against the construction arises from the possible inconvenience to the company arising from delay in communicating with the personal representatives of deceased members. There may be cases in which it would be a hardship on a company not to be able to dispose of shares which would have gone to the estate of a deceased member, where loss would arise from postponing the allotment, but no such case arises here, and it would be quite easy to provide for such cases when sanctioning the increase of capital, and the mere fact that such an inconvenience may arise, does not appear to me to afford a sufficient reason for construing article 27 in such a manner as to produce inequality instead of equality among the holders of shares. A. L. SMITH, L.J., has read and concurs in this judgment.

In re DALMEYER. (a.)

Will — Advances — Hotchpot — Interest chargeable on advances as from period of distribution only.

The testator gave to his sons in succession an option exerciseable after twenty-one, to succeed to his business, the son electing to succeed to be debited with the value thereof; and gave his residuary estate to trustees upon trusts for conversion. The testator empowered his trustees until the period of distribution to apply income of the residuary trust estate for the maintenance, &c., of his children, and directed the surplus income to be accumulated for a term of years, and upon the determination of such term he directed his trustees to stand possessed of the trust estate for his children then living and the issue per stirpes of deceased children. He also empowered his trustees to advance his sons out of capital, any sums so advanced to be taken in part satisfaction of each son's share.

Held, that no interest was chargeable until after the period of distribution (1) in respect of the value of the business against the son who succeeded to it; nor (2) in respect of advances made out of capital to another son (Rigby, L.J., dissenting on the second point).

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The testator Dalmeyer, was at his death carrying on business as an optician at 19, Bloomsbury-street, London; he was seised of a mansion and grounds at Hampstead, and possessed of personal estate of considerable value.

By his will dated the 18th of February, 1880 (divided into numbered clauses), after certain specific bequests the testator, by clause 3, declared that his sons Thomas, Sydney, and Owen should have the option in succession according to seniority after attaining twenty-one years, of succeeding to his business of optician, and in the said clause 3 was the declaration following:—"And I declare that immediately on any son of mine electing to succeed to such business, the whole of the said business and the capital thereof, and the stock-in-trade, machinery, plant, and effects employed therein, and the benefit of all contracts subsisting, and all book debts due to me in respect thereof at the time of my decease, and the lease of the messuage, offices, and buildings situate at No. 19, Bloomsbury-street aforesaid, in which the said business is carried on, and the office and other furniture and effects used for the purposes thereof shall, subject to, and charged with, the contingent payment thereout hereinafter mentioned, belong to him, and he shall be debited with the value thereof estimated in such manner as my trustees shall think fit in the division of my residuary estate, and in case such value shall exceed the total amount of the expectant share of such son in my residuary estate estimated in manner aforesaid at the time such option is declared, he shall refund such excess to my residuary estate by instalments or otherwise in such manner and at such time or times as my trustees shall determine."

By clause 5 the testator bequeathed certain pecuniary legacies including the following legacies:—"To my son who shall elect to succeed to my said business, the sum of £500 to be paid to him as soon as may be after he shall have declared such election and commenced to carry on my said business"; and "Unto and equally between such of my children (except the son who shall elect to succeed to my said business) as being sons attain the age of twenty-five years or being daughters attain the age of twenty-one or marry under that age, the sum of £4,000." Then followed a direction that the legacy of £4,000 should carry interest at 5 per cent. per annum to be applied by his trustees at discretion in or towards their respective maintenance and education during minority and as to sons in or towards their maintenance, education, or benefit until they should attain the age of twenty-five, and the testator authorized his trustees at any time after any of his said sons should have attained the age of twenty-one years to advance either the whole or any part of his then expectant share in the said legacy of £4,000 in or towards establishing him in business.

Clause 7 contained a devise and bequest of all the testator's real estate and all his personal estate not otherwise disposed of by his will or any codicil thereto to his wife and other trustees upon trusts for sale and conversion, with a declaration that his sons Thomas, Sydney, and Owen should have the option in succession of purchasing his mansion and grounds called Sunnyfield at a price calculated at three-fourths of the amount of valuation to be made as therein directed.

The testator by clause 8 directed that his trustees should out of the moneys to arise from the sale and conversion of or forming part of his residuary estate pay his funeral and testamentary expenses, and debts, and legacies, and the legacy duty therein mentioned, and should invest the residue of such moneys in the investments therein mentioned; and should (clause 9) out of the income of the said trust premises (meaning thereby the investments arising from the sale and conversion of his residuary estate) pay to his wife, whilst his widow, an annuity of £600 reducible to £100 on her marrying again.

Clauses 11, 12, and 13 were as follows. Clause 11: My trustees may, at their discretion, at any time or times before the period of distribution hereinafter mentioned, apply out of the surplus income of of the said trust premises in or towards the maintenance or education of any son or daughter of mine such yearly sums, and in such manner as my trustees shall think fit, all sums so advanced for the maintenance or education of any son or daughter of mine who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years to be taken in part satisfaction of the share to which he or she or his or her issue may respectively become entitled of the said trust premises. Clause 12: My trustees may invest in their names the surplus income of my said trust premises after satisfying the said annnuities, and the discretionary power next hereinbefore contained, and all expenses incident to the execution of the trusts of this my will, upon such securities as are hereinbefore specified, with the like power of transposition, and by similar investments shall accumulate at compound interest the resulting income for the term of twenty-one years from my decease, if any child of mine shall so long live and be under the age of twenty-one years, and shall, upon the determination of the said term upon the attainment of the age of twenty-one years by my youngest living child (which determination is hereinafter referred to as the period of distribution), stand possessed of the said trust premises with the accumulations thereof (subject to such of the trusts hereinbefore contained as shall then be subsisting) in trust for my child or children living at the period of distribution, and the issue then living of any child or children dying before such period, such objects to take as tenants in common according to the stocks and not to the number of individuals composing the class, the shares of children to be paid immediately, and the shares of other issue being males at the age of twenty-one years, or being females at that age or marriage. Clause 13: My trustees at any time or times before the period of distribution may apply out of the capital of the said trust premises any sum or sums of money not exceeding in the whole one-half of the capital share in or towards the establishment of each or any son of mine in any profession or business to be approved of by my trustees, or his advancement in the world in any other manner which may appear to them expedient, the sums so advanced to be taken in part satisfaction of the shares to which my said sons or their issue may respectively become entitled of the said trust premises.

The testator died on the 30th of December, 1883, and his will was proved by his widow on the 15th of February, 1884.

He left five children—viz., the sons, Thomas, Sydney, and Owen, mentioned in his will, and two daughters. Thomas, the elder son, was born in 1859, and therefore attained the age of twenty-one in his father's lifetime.

The youngest child, a daughter, was born in 1873, was about ten years old when her father died, and attained the age of twenty-one in 1894. Thereupon the term of twenty-one years during which accumulations were directed to be made came to an end, and the residuary premises, comprising a considerable sum arising from accumulation of income, became distributable.

In 1884 Thomas, the eldest son, under the provisions of clause 3 of the will, elected to succeed to the testator's business, and the value of the business and assets was ascertained by the trustees at a sum of about £15,000, which did not exceed the total amount of the expectant share of Thomas in the residuary estate at the time when the option to succeed was declared.

Sydney, the second son, had received in three separate sums £8,200 under the power of advancement contained in clause 13; and the younger children, or some of them, had received, since attaining twenty-one, certain sums under the power of advancement contained in clause 11.

The questions raised on the appeal were whether Thomas, Sydney, and the younger children respectively were to bring into hotchpot any and what interest on the value of the business and the advances.

Kekewich, J., decided that the capital sums only were to be brought into hotchpot.

It was conceded on the appeal that interest on all the sums must be brought into account as from the date when the residuary estate ought to have been distributed—that is to say, from the date of the youngest child attaining twenty-one—and that the order appealed against must to that extent be varied.

The contest was therefore confined to the periods which elapsed before that date.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Sargeant, for the appellants, referred to the following cases: Hilton v. Hilton, L. R. 14 Eq. 468, 21 W. R. Dig. 281; Ackroyd v. Ackroyd, L. Renshaw, Q.C., replied.

Lord HERSCHELL.—In this case two questions arise upon the construction of the will of Mr. Dalmeyer. The first turns upon a bequest by which his sons, in order of seniority, after attaining twenty-one were to have the option of succeeding to his business of an optician, such option to be intimated by notice in writing to his trustees and executors. [His lordship referred to the will, and continued:—] One of the testator's sons exercised the option of succeeding to the business. The value of the business at the time he declared his option did not exceed the total amount of his expectant share in the residue, so that no payment fell to be made by him. The time of distribution having now arrived, he has of course to be debited with the value of the business in the division of the testator's residuary estate. It is contended that he should also be debited with interest upon the sum representing that value from the time when he succeeded to the business. I can find nothing in the will to justify such a conclusion. The testator has expressly defined what the position of a son taking the business is to be. The value of the business is to be ascertained at the time he declares his option, the amount of his expectant share in the residuary estate is to be also then determined. If the value of the business exceeds the amount of such expectant share he is to refund the excess to the trustees at such times and by such instalments as the trustees may determine. The business is to belong to him on these terms, and I can see no warrant for adding the further term now contended for.

The other question which arises has reference to a claim to debit interest upon advances made to one of the testator's sons. [His lordship referred to clause 13 of the will, and continued:—] Advances were made to one of the sons from time to time, amounting in the whole to £8,200. It is not disputed that he must be debited with these in part satisfaction of the share to which he is entitled; but it is contended that in addition to this, he ought to be debited with interest on those advances from the time they were respectively made. The contention is based on the fact that the testator directed the accumulation of the surplus income of the whole of the trust premises; that the advances made, diminished pro tanto the amount of the trust premises bearing interest, and consequently the accumulations; and that if the son who received advances is allowed to have an equal share of the accumulations, he will obtain an advantage over his brothers and sisters, while the scheme of the testator was that there should be equality. If the contention be tenable I think it follows that the son receiving advances must be debited with compound interest on the sums advanced and not simple interest merely; if this be not done the equal treatment which is alleged as the justification for debiting interest, will not be secured.

I think the matter in controversy must be determined by a study of the language used by the testator. No case was cited in which any rule was laid down governing the present case.

In the case of In re Rees, Rees v. George the authorities with reference to debiting interest on sums advanced, were reviewed by the late Master of the Rolls. The attempt there made was to debit a child with interest in respect of sums advanced during the father's lifetime, and which were to be brought into hotchpot upon the distribution of the estate. The Master of the Rolls decided that interest ought to be debited from the period of distribution only. I can find nothing in that decision, or in the language of the Master of the Rolls, when read as it must be in connection with the point he was then considering, which supports the appellant's contention. I feel free, therefore, to allow myself to be guided by what appears to me the intention of the testator as indicated by the language he has used, untrammelled by any technical rule.

The first observation I have to make on the words of the will is that it prescribes only that the sums advanced are to be taken in part satisfaction of the shares to which his sons may become entitled in the trust premises. It does not provide that the sums advanced "with interest thereon" shall be thus taken in part satisfaction. I turn then to the clause which ascertains the share to which the children are entitled. It no doubt directs the investment of the surplus income of the whole residuary estate, and its accumulations at compound interest; but this must be read subject to the clause immediately following which sanctions the diminution of the trust premises to the extent of the sums advanced under its authority. They then cease to bear any income which the trustees can invest. The surplus income which is to be invested and accumulated must, in my opinion, refer to the income of the trust premises which the trustees receive. When the period of distribution arrives the trustees are to stand possessed of "the said trust premises with the accumulations thereof" in trust for his children. This, I think, must mean the accumulations actually in the hands of the trustees as the result of their investment and accumulation of the surplus income. I cannot see any warrant for treating the sums advanced to a son as if they had continued part of the trust premises vested in the trustees the income of which was to be accumulated and so added to the actual accumulations as a condition of allowing the son, who has received the advances, to share equally in the accumulations with the other children.

Of course the same result in a matter of figures might be arrived at in other ways than by debiting compound interest on the advances. It was suggested during the argument that the accumulations ought to be regarded as accretions to the expectant shares of the several children; and that as from time to time advances were received by one of them, his interest in the accumulations ought to be treated as pro tanto diminished: but this is not in my opinion the scheme of the will. The persons who are to share in the division of the trust premises and the accumulations thereof are to be ascertained only at the period of distribution. I quite admit that the conclusion at which I have arrived does involve some inequality of treatment. The son who has obtained advances will be placed in a position of advantage as compared with the other children; but I am not satisfied that the testator did not so intend. When a father makes advances to some of his children during his lifetime it is conceded that, though the sums advanced are to be taken into account, when he has directed division amongst his children of his residuary estate, no interest is to be debited in respect of the advances. Yet in that case the result is that there is not complete equality of treatment. The child who has obtained the advances may have had the use of the money many years before the other children receive anything; and it may not unreasonably be presumed that if the father had retained the money and received the income thereof, the estate left by him for distribution would have been greater. In the present case, having postponed the division of his estate for a lengthened period, it seems to me that he may have intended to put his trustees in loco parentis so far as advances to his children were concerned, and that these advances should be treated in the same manner as if made by himself. I do not dwell upon this or assert that it was his intention. I only give it as a reason why I am not prepared to depart from that which I understand to be the meaning of the provision which the testator has inserted in his will. Moreover, I think that it would not in all cases necessarily secure fair treatment if effect were given to the contention of the appellants. It may be that no injustice would be done, where as in the present case an adult child receives advances; but the clause which authorizes these advances is not limited to such a case. It would apply equally where the trustees paid a sum of money for the purpose of apprenticing an infant or establishing him in some profession or business; and I can well conceive hardship arising in such a case, if interest could be debited in respect of such advance in the manner proposed. For these reasons I think that the judgment should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., stated the facts, and proceeded:—Now, taking the will it seems to me clear that the testator has not directed that Thomas is to be debited with interest upon the value of the business to which he had succeeded when the time came for the division of the residuary estate. The words are "he shall be debited with the value thereof" and in case "such value" shall exceed—as I read it—what is coming to him when the residuary estate is divided, then he is to refund such excess in such way as the trustees may direct. There is not a word about his being debited with interest, when the division takes place, over and above the value of the business. The appellants would read this clause as if it ran "he shall be debited with the value thereof with interest thereon," which is clearly not what the will says nor as far as I can see what the testator intended.

Now, as regards the moneys advanced to the son Sydney for his advancement in life the will directs "that the sums so advanced are to be taken in part satisfaction of the share he is entitled to upon the distribution of the testator's residuary estate." Here, again, there is no direction that the moneys which the trustees may advance to Sydney for his advancement in life are to be debited with interest upon the division of the residuary estate. As regards these advances the trustees are placed by the testator in the same position as he would have been in had he not died. They are to do what presumably the father might have done had he been alive. It is not, in my experience, the usual thing for a father when he makes provision for his son in life to charge him interest upon money he then advances to him, and unless it be stipulated for, I certainly should draw the inference that the advances were made free of interest, not that they were to be interest-bearing loans. By the will the testator has not directed that either Thomas or Sydney is to be debited with interest upon what they may receive out of the testator's estate prior to the division of his residuary estate whenever that might take place. But it was argued for the appellants that as regards the advancements made to Sydney unless the will directed the contrary, the rule of the Court of Equity was that in dividing the residuary estate of a testator which was to be equally divided amongst his children, interest upon moneys advanced by way of advancement of a child in life was always debited with interest from the time of its having been so advanced down to the period of distribution of the residuary estate. The reason assigned for this rule was that otherwise those of the children who had not had advances made to them for their advancement in life were not on an equality when the time came for the distribution of the estate with those who had had such advances, inasmuch as those to whom advances had been made had had the use of the money advanced and had deprived the estate of its use, which, if it had not been advanced as regards the interest accruing thereon, would have gone to swell those accumulations in which all, when the division came, were to participate in, equally.

But this, with submission, begs the question as to what the children at the time of distribution were to participate in equally. In my judgment, by this will, it is directed that the children are to participate equally in the capital of the testator's estate, together with the accumulations which may happen to have been made after making the advances and other disbursements as directed by the will, subject to this: that, in making the division, Thomas and Sydney are to bring into account what they have in fact had out of the testator's estate—the one, the value of the business, the other, the moneys advanced. It is in what the trustees might have in hand when the period of distribution arrives that the children then living were to participate as tenants in common, not in what the trustees might have had if no advancement to the son had been made. If the rule exists, and the reason assigned for it is well founded, surely the money advanced to Sydney for his advancement in life must be debited with compound interest and not merely with simple interest, for the hypothesis is that the child advanced must make good to the estate that which he has had to the impoverishment of the estate, which cannot be brought about unless compound interest upon the advances is calculated. The appellants' counsel, when faced with this, flinched from asserting that any rule existed to debit advances with compound interest, and it consequently appears to me that the suggested reason for the rule has no existence in fact. Authorities were then resorted to to support the existence of the rule, and In re Rees, Rees v. George, in which the cases upon the subject are collected in the judgment of Sir George Jessel, was referred to. Neither the case itself, nor the cases therein cited are authorities for the proposition now contended for—viz., that interest is to be debited from the date of the advances made till the period of division of the residuary estate. It will be seen that the struggle in these cases has been to get interest allowed upon advances prior to the death of the tenant for life, which was the period of distribution, and that the attempt has been universally unsuccessful. How these cases can be said to show that there is the hard and fast rule in equity as now contended for I do not see, for the cases, when looked into, in my opinion, show nothing of the sort. In my judgment, whether you look to the suggested reason for the rule, or to the cases cited, the appellants fail to establish the existence of the rule. My brother Kekewich was quite right both on the construction of the will and upon the non-existence of the rule contended for; and this appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I regret that with one part of the judgments delivered—that is to say, as to the advances out of residue—I am unable so concur. [His lordship then stated the facts and continued:—] The case of Thomas, with regard to the value of the business, depends upon considerations different from those affecting the advances. By "advances" throughout my judgment are meant, not advances on loan, but gifts by way of advancement.

The Court of Chancery never assumed jurisdiction to correct any inequality between children where that inequality was brought about by the plain disposition of the parent made during lifetime or by will. It only interfered to prevent inequality, or a greater inequality, than the parent had plainly intended in cases where the parent, having had occasion for expressing his intentions, had done so by directing an equal division, or, as the case might be, a definite inequality. Thus, with reference to advances made to children by a parent during his lifetime, followed by a will taking no notice of the advances, the will was treated as precluding the taking of the earlier advances into consideration. But advances made after the date of the will were, as a general rule, treated, in the absence of express declaration to the contrary, as operating an ademption of the whole or part of the testamentary provision for the advanced child, according as the advances were equal to or greater than, or were less than the testamentary provision.

A will can have no effect except on property which the testator has at the time of making it or afterwards acquired. Advances made before the date of the will cannot come out of the property dealt with by the will, and the fact of such advances having been made does not, if they are mentioned in the will, affect the scheme of distribution which the testator intends to apply to the property.

But although, of course, the will can only operate on property which the testator has at the time of his death, that event may happen at any moment; and it has been thought a reasonable presumption that the scheme of distribution indicated by the will should not be disturbed by advances subsequently made.

The business and its assets form, in the event which has happened, no part of the residuary estate of the testator. No presumption of equality arises with reference to this gift, but the testator's intention must have effect given to it according to the terms of the will. He could, of course, impose any terms which appeared satisfactory to him. As in the case of the mansion and grounds of Sunnyfield, where three-quarters only of the value was to be paid by the sons exercising the right of pre-emption; he might make the terms as favourable as he pleased to the son succeeding without infringing any doctrine of a court of equity. What he really does is to direct a value to be placed on the assets which are to belong at once to the son, and that the son is to be debited with their value "in the division of my residuary estate"; if the son died before the division he never would be debited at all, and he would get the business for nothing. The only provisions for payment at all, arise in case the value should be in excess of the expectant share of the son, and then payment was to be made of the excess only and by such instalments as the trustees should think fit. There is no reason for departing from this scheme, and the son is only to be debited on the division, though, as from the date fixed for distribution, he will, of course, be debited with interest.

The advance to Sydney and the younger children stands on a wholly different footing. Clause 12, dealing with the residuary estate, divides the assets into equal shares, so that we get the testator's direction for equality as the governing rule in dealing with residue, a rule not to be departed from without plain reason to be derived from other parts of the will. It is important to observe that the real and substantial reason is how far an advanced child is to share in the accumulations arising from the residue as diminished by the advances made to him. He cannot be charged with any part either of a capital sum advanced or of interest thereon so as to be made liable to repay. The charging of interest in such a case is only an arithmetical device adopted for the purpose of ascertaining how much more he is to receive. The true principle applicable to advances out of a fund which, independently of the advances, is to be equally divided, is that the unadvanced are not to be in a better or worse position, except so far as is expressly provided by the settlor by reason of the advance—in other words, the unadvanced children are to be placed as far as possible in the same position as if no advances had been made.

All the cases cited in In re Rees, Rees v. George, where the subject was discussed at length by the late Master of the Rolls (Sir George Jessel) recognize and profess to go upon this principle. In Hilton v. Hilton Malins, V.C., uses language which seems to me to be an enunciation of this principle. In Field v. Seward, Bacon, V.C., says it is necessary in order to carry out the testator's intention that there should be, as far as possible, equality. In In re Rees, Rees v. George, the testator had given his widow a life interest in his residue, and subject thereto had directed his trustees to divide his residue among children who being sons should attain the age of twenty-one, or being daughters should attain twenty-one or marry under that age, with a direction that advances, whether made in his lifetime or under a power in the will, should be brought into hotchpot. Sir George Jessel says, "He," the testator, "means that none of the children who have not been advanced or who have received less than others shall suffer"; and lower down, "therefore charging interest is only to be regarded as a mode of calculation by which, in order to place the children on an equality, the estate is put in the same position as if no advance had been made." True it is that in the case before him interest was charged on advances only from the widow's death, but that was expressly rested on the grounds that until her death she took the whole income; and so the children on whose account alone the hotchpot clause was introduced could take no benefit from interest charged before that date and would lose nothing by its being withheld.

Turning again to the will before us, we find three clauses of advancement: one in clause 6 to advance any son who has attained twenty-one either the whole or any part of his then expectant share of the legacy of £4,000; the second is in clause 11, dealing with yearly sums applied out of surplus income for the maintenance or education of any son or daughter who should have attained twenty-one years, which were to be taken in part satisfaction of the share to which he or she or his or her issue might respectively become entitled of the said trust premises. The third is clause 13, which authorizes advances out of capital to an extent not exceeding in the whole one half of the capital share, and directs that the sums advanced are to be taken in part satisfaction of the shares to which his sons or their issue might respectively become entitled of the said trust premises. The directions as to part satisfaction contained in clauses 11 and 13 are necessary to ensure that the advances shall be charged not only against the advanced children themselves, but also against their issue, and do not show any intention that advances under these powers are to be treated on a different footing from advances out of the legacy of £4,000. Any advances made to a son out of the £4,000 legacy would clearly disentitle the son advanced to subsequent interest in respect of the advance, so that if the whole £4,000 were advanced to a son he would get no subsequent interest. The distinction between clauses 11 and 13 as to advances out of income and capital respectively, seems intended only for the purpose of fixing the amount that may be advanced, since any income not advanced under clause 11 at once becomes capital. In clause 13, where the capital of the share is mentioned, "share" must mean expectant or presumptive share, since before the period for distribution there can be no vested share. What, then, is the meaning of the words "taken in part satisfaction" occurring in clauses 11 and 13? It would seem that they should have their literal meaning, and that the advances should be treated as satisfying pro tanto the expectant share in respect of which they are made at the time when they are taken. At any rate it is not right, unless there is a clear necessity, to say that they must be taken as meaning the same thing in effect as a direction that the advanced child or his issue shall be debited in the division of the residuary estate, which is the phrase used in clause 3 with reference to the value of the business. It would seem, therefore, and the equality which, as to residue, is the governing rule expressed in clause 12 requires (unless the unadvanced children are to be the worse for the advance), that the share to which an advanced child or his issue may be entitled in expectancy is to be treated as diminished by the amount of the advance as from the date when the advance is taken or made. The strict rights of the children on this view of the will would be worked out by a declaration that as between the children the accumulations from time to time of residue are to belong to them in the same proportions in which they are for the time being entitled in expectancy to the corpus, including past accumulations, with consequential directions. To give effect to this, rests would have to be taken at the end of each year as to the younger childrens' advances, and at the dates of the actual advance to Sydney with regard to his advance. The result would give to each child the exact part of the accumulations earned by his expectant share for the time being. After the period of distribution a charge of interest on the value of the business and on the advances would have to be made, and as the accumulations of residue have still continued 4 per cent. interest ought to be charged. Mr. Renshaw argued, and I think was logically bound to argue, that if the plan of charging interest against advances during the period of accumulation were adopted such interest should be compound interest, but the plan above suggested has the merit of carrying out exactly what could only be done approximately by the method of charging interest, and showing upon the face of the order made, the precise reason for the adjustment. It would readily be carried into effect by an accountant without involving more complicated account taking, than is involved in many orders of the court made in recent times.

Order appealed against varied by declaring that from the period of distribution, interest was chargeable at 4 per cent. Order in other respects affirmed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CHRIST'S HOSPITAL. (a.)

Charity — Endowed Schools Acts — Commissioners — Scheme—Excepted endowments—Compulsory application in aid of scheme — Cy-près — Jurisdiction of court—The Endowed Schools Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 56), s. 14 (1).

The effect of section 14 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, is to leave the governing body of a charity in statu quo as to the endowments thereby excepted, and no scheme affecting those excepted endowments can be forced on such governing body unless it could have been forced on them before the Act.

Where a governing body incorporated with full powers of management by Royal Charter and Act of Parliament are deprived of the bulk of their endowments by a scheme under the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, but nevertheless continue to apply the excepted endowments to proper legal objects, then, although those legal objects are only expressed in general terms in the Charter, the court cannot, under the guise of cy-près or otherwise, compel the governing body to apply the excepted endowments in aid of the scheme, however beneficial such application might be.

In the year 1890 a scheme was settled under the powers of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, for the administration of the educational endowments of Christ's Hospital. The scheme, which was opposed by the governing body, provided for the removal of the school to Horsham, the sale of the old site, and generally made great changes in the government and administration of the charity.

Owing to the opposition of the governing body all endowments given since the 2nd of August, 1819—i.e., less than fifty years before the commencement of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, were necessarily excepted by section 14 (set out at the beginning of the judgment), and these excepted endowments, together with the non-educational endowments, were still under the jurisdiction of the old governing body established by the Charter and Act of Parliament referred to in the judgment.

In 1894 Chitty, J., for the reasons stated in the present judgment, directed a scheme of these excepted endowments to be settled. The Attorney-General now brought in a scheme asking in effect that the excepted endowments should be placed under the control of the administrative body constituted by the scheme of 1890, and dealt with according to that scheme or in the alternative that the income should be temporarily applied in aid of the scheme. The income of the excepted endowments amounted to £3,364 per annum, and there was an accumulation of over £10,000 since 1890. The capital value was about £110,000.

The endowments taken by the scheme produced £45,734 per annum, and the old site, which was also taken, was expected to fetch £750,000.

The old governing body, who proposed to establish a day-school in London, objected to the Attorney-General's scheme, and had prepared a counter-scheme.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., Warrington, Q.C., and Dibdin, in support of the scheme.—The intention of the donors was to benefit the old school. That school continues as the school under the new scheme, and the endowments should belong to it accordingly. The objects of the charity being expressed in general terms in the charter, the court can direct the governors how to act, although they are statutory governors: Tudor on Charities, p. 89. The old school being gone, it is really a case of cy-près: Schools Inquiry Commission Report, p. 448; In re Shrewsbury Grammar School, 1 Mac. & G. 324; Attorney-General v. Wyggeston Hospital, 12 Beav. 113; The Berkhampstead School case, L. R. 1 Eq. 102, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 23; In re Campden Charities, 30 W. R. 496, 31 W. R. 741, 18 Ch. D. 310, 24 Ch. D. 213; Clephane v. Provost of Edinburgh, L. R. 1 Sc. App. 417, 7 W. R. H. L. Dig. 3.

Byrne, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the governing body.—Our day-school is a legal object clearly within the scope of the charity, and no case of cy-près arises. The severance of the funds has not destroyed the old charity, which continues as our proposed day-school. No scheme is necessary, but in accordance with the order of 1894 we have brought in a legal and not a cy-près scheme. In re Shrewsbury Grammar School was the case of a surplus, and the trustees were the applicants. Attorney-General v. Wyggeston Hospital was a case of gross mismanagement. In the Berkhampstead School case it does not appear under what jurisdiction the governors were appointed, or what their powers were. "Non constat" that they were statutory governors with powers like ours. In re Campden Charities was an ordinary case of cy-près. Clephane v. Provost of Edinburgh is in our favour. The jurisdiction of the court is limited: Philpott v. St. George's Hospital, 7 W. R. 659, 27 Beav. 107; In re Ashton's Charity, 7 W. R. 659, 27 Beav. 115; In re Prison Charities, 21 W. R. 213, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 199. As to change of governing body, see Attorney-General v. Caius College, 2 Keen 150. As to the effect of an agreement scheduled to an Act of Parliament, see In re East and West India Dock Co., 36 W. R. 849, 38 Ch. D. 576.

March 3.—CHITTY, J., stated the above facts and continued:—The educational endowments of this magnificent charity were split asunder by the Act of 1869. The severance was effected by section 14: That section enacts that nothing in the Act contained shall authorize the making of any scheme interfering with any endowment or part of an endowment (as the case may be) originally given to charitable uses less than fifty years before the commencement of the Act (the 2nd of August, 1869), unless the governing body of such endowment assent to the scheme. The endowments in question fall within the fifty years' limit. The governing body declined to assent to the scheme of 1890. The Commissioners were thus placed under the necessity of excluding these endowments from the operation of their scheme. This they did in express terms.

On the hearing of this action I was asked by the counsel for the Attorney-General to declare as a matter of law that these endowments necessarily and expressly excluded were included in the Commissioners' scheme. Obviously no such declaration could be made. I then directed that a scheme should be settled of the excepted endowments. The governing body were at first disposed not to object to the direction for a scheme, but ultimately they did oppose it. There was no appeal from my order, and it is now binding on all parties. In directing a scheme I left every question open, holding that all such points as were suggested at the hearing could be better dealt with when any scheme was brought in for consideration and after the parties had adduced their evidence. My reasons for directing a scheme were the altered circumstances arising out of the Act of 1869 and the Commissioners' scheme; the fact that the income of the excepted endowments had remained unapplied since the severance in 1890; and the hope, not unreasonably entertained, that with the assistance and advice of the Attorney-General, representing the Crown by virtue of his great office, some proper and reasonable arrangement might be come to between the Commissioners and the governing body. The Commissioners have power to alter their scheme, but only within the limits of the Act of 1869; and the governing body have been placed, by section 14 of the Act of 1869, in a position to bargain with the Commissioners. Since the order was made there has been much negotiation, but without result. The Commissioners, as they are entitled to do, decline to make the alterations in their scheme which the governors suggest. The governors decline to part with the rights which they conceive themselves to be entitled to by virtue of section 14 and otherwise, unless the scheme of 1890 is modified in accordance with their suggestions. The operation of section 14 of the Act is an important element in this case. The object of the section was to give effect to the intentions of charitable donors within the fifty years' limit by preserving their endowments intact from any interference by the Commissioners in the exercise of the large powers conferred on them by the statute.

The effect of the Act is remarkable. Speaking generally, and without reference to any special form of gift, the intention of the donors within the fifty years' limit was that their gifts to the hospital should be added to and form part of the general mass of the educational funds of the hospital. But in the result, and as a necessary consequence of section 14 and of the refusal of their assent by the governors, those gifts are severed from the general funds and are left as a separate charity to be administered by the governing body as they existed at the passing of the Act and according to the then subsisting constitution of the charity. The result must be taken to have been foreseen by the Legislature. Two classes of cases presented themselves for consideration during the passing of the Act. First, ancient foundations to which additional endowments had been made within the fifty years' limit; and, secondly, entirely new foundations within the limit. Between these two classes a distinction might have, but has not, been drawn. The result is that foundations of the first class have been severed into two parts. The additional endowments in the first class might have been diverted to follow the destination of the old foundations, but it is not so. They stand by themselves, and constitute in law a separate endowment. One word more on section 14. It has left the jurisdiction of this court, such as it is, wholly untouched in regard to endowments within the fifty years' limit. It has neither diminished nor increased the jurisdiction. The utmost that can be said on the subject is that, while leaving the jurisdiction of the court unimpaired, it may form some guide or assistance to the court in the exercise of its discretion within the limits of its jurisdiction. The policy of the section seems to be that the excepted endowments are not to be interfered with unnecessarily.

In the argument the scheme of 1890 was fully discussed. For the purpose of this judgment a short statement of its leading provisions will suffice. It was framed substantially in accordance with the recommendations in the report of the Royal Commissioners referred to in the preamble of the Act of 1869. The preamble states that by their report the Commissioners recommended various changes in the government, management, and studies of endowed schools, and in the application of educational endowments, with the object of promoting their greater efficiency and of carrying into effect the main designs of the founders thereof, by putting a liberal education within the reach of children of all classes, and that such object could not be attained without the authority of Parliament. It is plain that the scheme of 1890 could not have been framed without statutory authority. Such a scheme could not have been decreed by this court. Under the statute several appeals were presented to the Privy Council against some of its provisions as drawn by the Commissioners: In re Christ's Hospital, 38 W. R. 758, 15 App. Cas. 172. But the scheme as it now stands was ultimately approved by Order in Council, and became binding on the 2nd of August, 1890. It has a statutory force. The scheme, so far as relates to property comprised in it, remodelled and reconstituted the body charged with the power and the duty of general management, and thereby in point of law created a new governing body. It contemplated and provided for the removal of the great boarding-school from London, the sale of the old site, and generally made great changes in the government and administration of the charity. The available income under the scheme has fallen off gradually from 1891 to 1894. The average deficiency of income to meet expenditure is about £3,000 a year. The income of the excepted endowments would supply the deficiency. To meet the deficiency, capital funds included in the scheme of 1890 have been sold. The decrease in income during the four years is more than the loss of income through the sales.

Relying on the existing circumstances and the financial condition of the main educational charity since the scheme of 1890, the Attorney-General strongly urged that it was fit and proper that the income of the excepted endowments should be applied in aid of the income of the great school as proposed by his scheme. The main objection of the governors is addressed to the jurisdiction of the court. I proceed now to consider this objection. The appeals before the Privy Council raised questions affecting the general character and objects of the foundation as well as its governing body, and in the judgment delivered by Lord Selborne the material parts of the instruments which determine these points were stated: In re Christ's Hospital, 38 W. R. 758, 15 App. Cas. 176 to 179. It is sufficient for me to refer to that statement, without repeating it at length, but supplementing it with a few additional statements relevant to the present question and drawing attention to some particular points.

The governing body were originally incorporated and constituted governors of the charity by the Royal Charter of Edward VI. By the charter power was conferred on the governors, or a majority of them, at all times thereafter when and as often as to them it should seem expedient or necessity should so require, to ordain, constitute, and make all such fit, wholesome, and honest ordinances, statutes, and rules for the right government of the charity as to them should seem good; and a like power was conferred on them from time to time to appoint, create, and ordain such and so many officers, ministers, or governors under them in the hospital who might from time to time provide for the poor therein that they might well and justly be ordered and taken care of, and also for the order and government of the same poor as to them should seem good and convenient. The objects of the charity in reference to the education of the poor are to be found expressed in general terms in the charter and in the deed of covenant between the King and the Corporation of London, which must be read in connection with the charter. But, although the charitable objects were expressed in general terms, ample power was conferred on the governors (as already shown) of making ordinances and of appointing officers and governors for the particular regulation and administration of the charity and its property. Certain arrangements with respect to the government of this and the other hospitals part of the same original foundation subsequently gave rise to disputes between the City of London as governors of all the hospitals on the one hand, and the officers and acting governors of the several hospitals on the other; and in the year 1782 the Act 22 Geo. 3, c. 77, was passed for the purpose of giving validity to a settlement agreed on by the disputing parties. The disputes, as recited in the Act, were touching their respective rights, powers, and privileges in the ordering, management, government, and disposition of the hospitals and the estates, possessions, and reversions, and revenues thereto. The agreement settling the disputes was set out in full in the Act. The agreement contained a recital that great benefit had been derived to the charitable institutions from the mode of managing and conducting the same, and from the voluntary contributions, grants, bequests, and donations of the elected governors; and another recital showing that the agreement as to the actual ordinary management of the hospitals in accordance with the agreement, was intended to be perpetual. The Act confirmed and established the agreement according to its tenour. The effect of the Act was—in the language of the judgment in the Privy Council, 38 W. R. 760, 15 App. Cas., p. 179—"to establish a separate governing body for Christ's Hospital, with full powers of management over its possessions and affairs." This separate body has continued ever since to manage and administer the charity, subject only to such of its possessions and rights of administration as were expressly taken away by the scheme of 1890. No case of breach of trust or maladministration of any kind is suggested by the Attorney-General against the governing body. There is no case of failure of the trusts or of the charitable objects of the excepted endowments. No such point was raised by the Attorney-General, and rightly. It cannot be argued that any such failure has been caused by the operation of section 14 in severing the funds. The trusts remain and are capable of being executed.

These are the facts which give rise to the question of the jurisdiction of the court in settling a scheme for the regulation of this charity. The extent and the limits of this jurisdiction were fully discussed in the argument. Many authorities bearing more or less on the present case were cited, and reference was made to an able and useful dissertation on the subject contained in the report of the Royal Commissioners mentioned in the preamble of the Act of 1869, and in great measure founded on the opinion, given in evidence before the Commission, of eminent lawyers, such as Lord Westbury, Lord Hatherly, Sir Roundell Palmer, Mr. Wickens, and others. For the purposes of this decision, however, I think it unnecessary to examine critically the authorities cited or the opinions referred to. I prefer to state my opinion broadly. I hold that it is beyond the jurisdiction of the court to sanction the Attorney-General's scheme in the face of the opposition of the existing governing body. Their title is founded on Royal Charter and is established by Act of Parliament. To whatever lengths the court may have gone, it has never assumed legislative authority; it has never by a stroke of the pen at one and the same time revoked a Royal Charter and repealed an Act of Parliament. It has never ousted from their rights of administering the charitable trusts, such a body as the present governors against their will, and that, too, in a case where no breach of trust is charged. There is no authority in the books for any such proposition. Yet such is the proposition which underlies the Attorney-General's scheme. I consider that I am not at liberty to deprive the existing governing body of their right of control over the income of the funds vested in them, either permanently, as proposed by the scheme, or temporarily, as suggested by the Attorney-General in his reply. In a word I cannot, under guise of executing the trusts cy-près, upset the constitution of the present governing body, or, by transferring their powers and duties of administering the trusts to another body, reduce them to the position of being bare trustees of the funds vested in them. To establish such a scheme as that submitted by the Attorney-General nothing less than an Act of Parliament will suffice.

I now turn to the scheme brought in by the governors. As the Attorney-General has not had an opportunity of fully considering it, and as his views of such matters are always treated with respect by the court, the observations which I propose to make will be of a general nature only, and I shall avoid all matters of detail. [His lordship then discussed the scheme proposed by the governors, and held that they had substantially made out their case for establishing a day-school in or near London of the nature proposed, that being obviously within the scope of the charity. He referred the matter to chambers for further consideration, with liberty to the Attorney-General to bring in any further or other scheme not inconsistent with the principles of this judgment.]

Administration—Intestacy—Will subsequently found—Grant of administration revoked — Will proved—Infant next of kin shares paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act—Petition by executors for payment out.

A sum of money paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act by the administrator of a supposed intestate to meet shares of infants under the intestacy, was ordered to be paid out to the executor of a subsequently found will, after revocation of the grant of administration.

Petition.

Eliza Hood Jacomb Hood died on the 27th of October, 1889, intestate, as it was then thought. Letters of administration of her estate were granted on the 31st of December, 1889.

In December, 1894, a will was discovered and application was made to the Court of Probate to revoke the grant of administration. The grant was revoked on the 12th of August, 1895, and the will was proved on the 28th of August, 1895. Money had been paid into court by the administrator under the Trustee Relief Act to meet the shares of certain infants who were next of kin. Some of these infants had attained twenty-one and their shares had been paid out to them, but there remained still a sum in court.

This was a petition by the administrator under the intestacy and by the executor of the will for payment out to the latter of that sum. Under the will the infants took legacies, but these were smaller than their shares as next of kin. The infants whose shares had already been paid over to them had, on the application of the executors of the will, refunded the same. The infants had been served with the petition.

E. C. Macnaghten, for the petition.—I know of no case in point, but I submit that on principle the petitioners are entitled to have this fund transferred to them.

Stanley Fisher, for the infants.

NORTH, J., made the order asked for subject to an affidavit being produced that the infants' legacies had been paid or secured to them.

By a settlement of 1841 a fund was directed to be laid out in the purchase of lands to be held on trust for A. for life, with remainder as B. should by will appoint. B. died in 1886 in A.'s lifetime, having by by will directed the reconversion into money of the trust premises, and appointed a specific amount part thereof to C. absolutely, and the residue to others. The life tenant A. died after the Finance Act, 1894, came into operation. The fund had never been invested in the purchase of land.

Held, (1) that the fund must be treated as land; (2) that it was "property which passed" on the death of A., and was therefore liable to estate duty under section 1 of the Finance Act; (3) that the amount appointed to C. was a "sum charged on the property" within the meaning of section 14, sub-section (1); and (4) that the estate duty on the whole appointed fund should be borne rateably by C. and the appointees of the rest of the fund.

Originating summons.

By a settlement made in 1841 in contemplation of the marriage of the Earl of Orford with the Countess of Orford, certain property belonging to the countess was assigned to trustees upon trust, as it fell into possession, to convert into money, and to invest the proceeds in the purchase of real estate in England and Wales to be settled to certain uses therein mentioned, with remainder to the use of the earl for life, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the marriage successively in tail male, with remainder to trustees upon trust to raise portions, and subject thereto it was declared that, in case the countess died in the lifetime of the earl (which event happened), the trustees should stand possessed of the hereditaments to be purchased upon such trusts as the countess should by will or codicil appoint.

There were no sons of the marriage, and only two daughters, one of whom was the Duchess del Balzo.

The countess, by her will made in 1877, appointed all the property which she had power to appoint under the settlement of 1841 to trustees upon trust to sell and convert, and to stand possessed of the proceeds upon trusts therein mentioned.

By a codicil, the countess, after reciting the appointment made by her will, directed that the trustees of the will should, out of the proceeds of the sale and conversion, pay to her daughter the Duchess del Balzo the sum of £35,000 absolutely free from all limitations and restrictions; and subject to such payment should stand possessed of the residue of the said moneys upon the trusts which would under her will have been applicable thereto if such residue had been the whole of the same trust moneys.

The Countess of Orford died on the 9th of November, 1886.

The Earl of Orford, the life tenant, died on the 7th of December, 1894.

The trust fund had never been invested in the purchase of lands.

Estate duty had been paid by the trustees of the settlement of 1841 on the whole of the appointed fund.

One of the questions raised by this summons was how the estate duty was to be borne as between the £35,000 appointed to the Duchess del Balzo and the residue, of which the duchess was, in the events which happened, tenant for life, and Viscount Exmouth had a contingent reversion.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and MacSwinney, for the Duchess del Balzo.—Estate duty is now substituted for the duties imposed by the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, 1881 and 1889, and Stirling, J., in In re Bourne, 41 W. R. 70, [1893] 1 Ch. 188, decided that the duties under those Acts were in the nature of probate duty, and must be borne by the testator's residuary estate. In re Croft, 40 W. R. 425, [1892] 1 Ch. 652, the question was said to depend on intention, and the intention here clearly was that the £35,000 should be free from all charges. In re Shaw, 43 W. R. 315, [1895] 1 Ch. 343, is also distinguishable.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Bryan Farrer, for Viscount Exmouth.—The question depends on the Finance Act, and the Act alone must be looked at. Independently of the Act, we say that In re Croft and In re Shaw apply rather than In re Bourne.

Seward Brice, Q.C., and Rowden; Gurdon, and A. Adams, appeared for other parties.

The Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 1, provides: "In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this part of this Act, there shall . . . be levied and paid, upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided, of all property real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person, a duty called 'estate duty.' . . ." Section 6, sub-section (4), enacts, "Estate duty, so far as not paid by the executors, shall be collected upon an account, setting forth the particulars of the property, and delivered to the commissioners within six months after the death, by the person accountable for this duty. . . ." Section 8, sub-section (4), enacts: "Where property passes on the death of the deceased and his executor is not accountable for the estate duty in respect of such property, every person to whom any property so passes for any beneficial interest in possession, and also to the extent of the property actually received or disposed of by him, every trustee, guardian, committee, or other person in whom any interest in the property so passing, or the management thereof is at any time vested, and every person in whom the same is vested in possession by alienation or other derivative title, shall be accountable for the estate duty on the property, and shall within the time, &c., . . . deliver and verify an account of the property." Section 14, sub-section (1), enacts: "In the case of property which does not pass to the executor as such, an amount equal to the proper rateable part of the estate duty may be recovered by the person, who, being authorized or required to pay the estate duty in respect of any property, has paid such duty from the person entitled to any sum charged on the property (whether as capital or as an annuity or otherwise) under a disposition not containing any express provision to the contrary."

NORTH, J.—The first question is whether any duty is payable in respect of the appointed property. The Earl died after the Finance Act came into operation, and we have to look to that Act to see whether the duty is payable or not. [The learned judge read section 1 and continued:—] Among other duties which were put an end to by that section was probate duty, so that probate duty, or its equivalent, is no longer payable in the cases to which this Act applies. [The learned judge then read section 6, sub-sections 1, 2, 4, and continued:—] The property we are dealing with is property which was set free by the death of the Earl. But it was not under his will that it was disposed of; it was not his property at all, and therefore his executor had not to pay duty upon it, because his executor was only bound to pay estate duty in respect of the personal property which the deceased was competent to dispose of at his death, and this is not property which the late Earl could dispose of. The case is therefore one in which sub-section 4, and not sub-section 2, of section 6 applies. [The learned judge then read section 8, sub-sections 3 and 4, and continued:—] So that by sub-section 3 two things are provided: the executor of the deceased has to specify in a proper account all the property in respect of which estate duty is payable on the death of the deceased, whether it is the deceased's property or not; but his liability to pay estate duty is limited to the personal property which the deceased was competent to dispose of at his death. [The learned judge read section 14, sub-section 1, and continued:—] Therefore the section contemplates that in all cases coming within it, if the executor or person who has to pay duty, the trustee or whoever he may be, has paid the duty before handing over a share or a sum of money, then he may charge against the person to whom he is handing over the money, or recover from him, if necessary, the amount required for the duty.

Now, it is said that, looking at those sections, it is clear from In re Bourne (a case relating to estate duties imposed by the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, 1881 and 1889) that estate duty is analogous to probate duty, and that the incidence of estate duty must therefore be the same as that of probate duty, and that Stirling, J., so decided in respect of the estate of a testator who was dealing with his own estate. But the present case is quite different. It is not a case of dealing with a testator's own estate. It is a case of property passing under limitations with which the person dying has nothing to do, except that his death sets the property free, which passes under those limitations to persons who take what is at the present time, in equity, landed estate, with respect to which there is no probate duty existing and never was.

Now, that being so, I must look at the provisions of this Act itself, and say upon whom the estate duty payable in respect of this real estate is to fall; and it seems to me that, under the section I have read, it is intended it shall fall upon the beneficiary, and not upon anyone else; and on the beneficiary or beneficiaries, as the case may be, according to their respective interests.

Section 14, sub-section 2, shows that inasmuch as there may be difficulties at times in ascertaining what the duty is, or a dispute about it, such question may be determined by application to the court. Then sub-section (1) of that section provides that the person who has the estate may recover back any duty he has paid from a person entitled to a charge on the property; and if there is a dispute with respect to it, then it may be settled by the court. I think, therefare, that the Duchess, who takes £35,000, must bear the estate duty payable in respect of that amount. I say so independently of the 14th section of the Act, but I also think the 14th section applies, because I think that sum is, to use the language of that section a "sum charged on such property." There is a direction to sell the estate and pay that amount out of the proceeds thereof. That seems to me clearly to amount to a charge of this money upon the estate. The legatee is entitled to have the amount raised out of the estate; but if the legacy is paid off there is an end of the matter; the legatee has no further interest and cannot enforce any trust for sale. Therefore, if the person behind the legatee raise the money by mortgage and pay off the legatee, the legatee could not insist upon the property being sold. Even if a sale was necessary, the legatee could not insist on a sale of more than was necessary to pay off the amount to which the legatee was entitled. Therefore the legatee, as to the £35,000, has, in my opinion, under the 24th section a charge upon the estate. In such case "an amount equal to the proper rateable part of the whole estate duty may be recovered by the person who, being authorized or required to pay the estate duty in respect of any property, has paid such duty from the person entitled to any sum charged on such property." Now, the persons who under the settlement are liable in the first place to account for the duty are, I suppose, the trustees of the settlement. But if not, the persons to account for the duty in respect of this £35,000 would be the executors, to whom the money would have to be paid, and to whom the money is appointed; and if they have paid it themselves they clearly, in my opinion, would be entitled to charge it against the duchess in respect of this £35,000, or if it has been otherwise received by her, they might recover it back from her under this section.

As to costs, I think the rule is now established that, in the case of an appointed fund the costs must be paid rateably out of the appointed shares, and not out of the residue.

NORWICH UNION FIRE INSURANCE (Appellants) v. MAGEE, SURVEYOR OF TAXES (Respondent). (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Interest on foreign investments of English company—Profits invested abroad—Schedule D of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100.

An insurance company, having its head offices at Norwich, carried on business abroad by means of branches in New York, New Zealand, and elsewhere. In order to do so, it became necessary to have capital invested abroad, and from time to time to add to these foreign investments as the business of the company increased. For this purpose the interest accruing from these investments was set aside and invested abroad, and, although shown in the credit account of the annual balance-sheet of the company issued from the head office in England as profits, was never specifically remitted to or received in the United Kingdom.

Held, that these investments abroad were necessary for the profitable carrying on abroad of the company's business, and that the interest arising from such investments was taxable as profits.

Case stated by the Income Tax Commissioners.

At a meeting of the Commissioners, held at Norwich, the appellants, the Norwich Union Fire Insurance Co., appealed against an income tax assessment made upon them for the year ending the 5th of April, 1894, under schedule D.

The facts set out in the case were as follows:—The appellants were an English company with their registered and head office at Norwich, where the directors and shareholders met, the dividends were declared, and all the affairs of the company were directed and controlled. The business carried on out of the United Kingdom was conducted by the managers of the various branches abroad who were appointed by and acted under power of attorney signed by nine directors of the company at Norwich, and such managers had the power to accept risks and issue policies without prior reference to the head office, whereas in the case of the agencies in England covenants only were given, and the directors in the head office determined whether to accept or decline risks. The annual income of the company was derived from premiums, interest on investments, fees and profits on sales earned at the head and branch offices, the whole being brought into one account and set of books, kept and entered up at the head office as set forth in the annual balance-sheets which were issued by the head office alone.

The assessment of £65,787 made upon the appellants was based on their own return, which included profits and losses made at all the branches. This sum included an item of £17,157 for untaxed interest, and an item of £12,841 for profits made at the New York and New Zealand branches. The appellants sought to have the assessment amended by having (a) £5,502 deducted from the item of untaxed interest, as being dividends upon various foreign securities payable out of and not specifically remitted to or received by them in the United Kingdom; and (b) £12,841 deducted, as being profits made at some of the foreign branches and not specifically remitted to or received by them in the United Kingdom.

The £5,502 represented part of the profits made abroad, and instead of being specifically remitted to this country was, with other funds of the appellants, reinvested in American securities, but the amount was accounted for at the head office here and included in the general account.

It was contended by the company (a) that the dividends upon the foreign securities ought to be assessed under the 4th case of section 100 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and that, therefore, the assessment should be restricted to the sums actually received in Great Britain, and that the sum of £5,502 not having been received in this country by the company, the assessment should be reduced by that sum: Colquhoun v. Brooks, 38 W. R. 289, 14 App. Cas. 493; (b) that, as to the £12,841 profits made by foreign branches, they fell to be assessed under case 5, and as they had not been remitted to or received in this country, they were not liable to assessment. For the Surveyor of Taxes it was contended first that, even if the dividends on the foreign securities fell to be assessed under case 4, those dividends had been constructively received here: Scottish Mortgage Co. of New Mexico v. McKelvie, 24 Sco. L. Rep. 87, 2 Tax Cas. 165; and secondly, that as the company was an English company the whole of the profits, wherever made, were assessable under the first case in schedule D, whether specifically remitted to this country or not.

The Commissioners dismissed the appeal by the company, and confirmed the assessment.

The company appealed.

Bigham, Q.C., and Lochnis, for the company.—The interest arising from these various foreign investments are not "profits" that are taxable under schedule D. The money so accruing is not received either really or constructively by the company. It is not "income." The balance-sheet shows that this interest has accrued, but not as income, for it has been at once invested to form part of the reserve capital. The case of the Scottish Mortgage Co. of New Mexico v. McKelvie is distinguishable from this case, and does not apply. The business of the Scottish Mortgage Co. was to lend money out—money which they borrowed expressly for the purpose of advancing again. It was held, and quite rightly, that the profits so made were taxable.

Sir R. Webster, A.G., and Danckwerts, were not called upon to argue for the Crown.

WRIGHT, J.—The real question we have to decide is whether these investments made abroad by the company are necessary to form the trading capital required to enable them to profitably carry on their business in America. There can be no doubt that the company could not carry on, or at any rate could not so conveniently or profitably carry on, their American business unless, as their business increased, they constantly augmented their reserves in America. If the money required to increase these funds there were not raised in that country then it would be compulsory on the company to send out capital from England. It follows, therefore, that these investments are not made simply for the purpose of capital investment, but are, in fact, part of the trading assets of the company, and the interest arising therefrom is liable as a trade profit. For these reasons I think the Commissioners were right in treating the interest accruing from such investments as part of the trading gains of the company liable to income tax.

KENNEDY, J., concurred.

Appeal from the decision of North, J., reported ante, p. 309.

By an order of North, J., made on the 5th of August, 1893, the London County Council were ordered to pay the costs of the investment of certain moneys in court in the purchase of a right of way, and upon the taxation of these costs the question arose whether they were within the scale prescribed by Schedule I., Part I., of the General Order made in pursuance of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.

The facts relating to the investment in the right of way were shortly as follows. In 1888 the Metropolitan Board of Works (the predecessors of the London County Council) bought some land at Denmark-hill, which formed part of a settled estate to which one R. A. Sanders was beneficially entitled subject to certain charges. It was subsequently desired to lay out the Sanders estate for building, for which purpose it was necessary to connect a road which it was proposed to make in the Sanders estate with a road called Fawnbrake-avenue on an adjoining settled estate belonging to certain persons named Gubbins. An agreement was, therefore, on the 21st of July, 1893, entered into whereby R. A. Sanders agreed to purchase for £516 the right to extend Fawnbrake-avenue over a strip of land, 40ft. long and 5ft. wide, belonging to the Gubbins estate. It was also agreed that R. A. Sanders should within two years complete the proposed road on the Sanders estate and dedicate it to the public; that he should have a right of way over the strip of land for the purpose of completing the extension, and, after completion and until dedication, for all purposes; and that the owners of the Gubbins estate should, until dedication, have a right of way over the proposed road on the Sanders estate. This agreement was carried into effect by an indenture of the 4th of September, 1894.

Rule 2 of the General Order made in pursuance of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, provides as follows:—

"(a) In respect of sales, purchases, and mortgages completed, the remuneration of the solicitor having the conduct of the business, whether for the vendor, purchaser, mortgagor, or mortgagee, is to be that prescribed in Part I. of Schedule I. to this order, and to be subject to the regulations therein contained."

"(c) In respect of business not hereinbefore provided for, connected with any transaction, the remuneration for which, if completed, is hereinbefore or in Schedule I. hereto prescribed, but which is not, in fact, completed, and in respect of settlements, mining leases or licences or agreements therefor, reconveyances, transfers of mortgage or further charges, not provided for hereinbefore or in Schedule I. hereto, assignments of leases not by way of purchase or mortgage, and in respect of all other deeds or documents, and of all other business the remuneration for which is not hereinbefore or in Schedule I. hereto prescribed, the remuneration is to be regulated according to the present system as altered by Schedule II. hereto."

The taxing master held that the scale did not apply, inasmuch as this was the creation of an easement for the first time, and came within the decision of Kay, J., in In re Stewart, 37 W. R. 484, 41 Ch. D. 494. North, J., being of the same opinion, dismissed a summons to review the taxation.

The London County Council appealed.

W. Baker, for the appellants.—This was a purchase of property to which the scale applies. In re Stewart is distinguishable, for there the vendors merely gave a licence to lay pipes. Here the vendors parted with the whole surface of the strip. The purchase money, too, in In re Stewart was small. Here it could hardly have been larger if the freehold of the strip had been sold. The case comes within In re Earnshaw-Wall, 42 W. R. 567, [1894] 3 Ch. 156, where Chitty, J., held that the scale applied to the sale of an advowson. He referred also to Coverdale v. Charlton, 27 W. R. 357, 4 Q. B. D. 104, and In re Merchant Taylors' Company, 33 W. R. 542, 693; 30 Ch. D. 28.

Channell, Q.C., and J. Gent, for the respondent.—The case falls within In re Stewart, which was rightly decided. Moreover, this is something more than a mere sale for £516. Mutual obligations were imposed by the agreement.

W. Baker, in reply.—The only consideration expressed in the conveyance itself is the £516. The word "conveyance" is applicable to the creation just as much as to the transfer of an easement.

LINDLEY, L.J.—When you look at this agreement it is obvious that it is not merely an agreement for the purchase of a right of way across the strip. It includes that, and the £516 is the only money consideration expressed in the agreement; but each set of trustees is accommodating the other, and the Gubbins trustees stipulate not only for the £516, but for the construction of this road across Gubbins' property, and for the right to use it before it comes upon the highway, and it is agreed that when the whole thing is done it shall be a public road. That agreement, therefore, is not a mere agreement for purchase and sale. It was carried out by the deed of the 4th of September, 1894, which, again, is not a mere conveyance of this right of way for £516; but it is that, and more. On approaching the question we have to decide, it is important to observe that whether the solicitor is to be paid according to the scale of fees or not does not depend upon any abstract question of law as to whether an easement is property—in one sense it is obvious an easement is property—nor does it depend upon whether the grant of an easement can be called the conveyance of an easement. What we have to consider is the scale for the payment of solicitors. The gentleman who drew the conveyance of September, 1894, did not take up the position that the scale would apply, but considered that he might charge as he could before the scale was invented, according to the ordinary course. Relying upon a decision of In re Stewart, he took it for granted that the scale would not apply. The costs have been taken in for taxation, and the taxing master has taken the view that the scale, so far as regards what I may call shortly the purchase of that easement, the right of way, is not applicable; and, North, J., having taken the same view, the County Council have appealed to us, and the object of their appeal is to satisfy us, if they can, that the costs ought to be taxed according to the scale, in which case those costs will amount to about £12 10s., whereas unless the scale applies the costs will be about £95. The question is of a little importance in this case; but it is perhaps of more importance from a general point of view.

Now, let us look at the orders which relate to this mode of payment. There is no doubt that the language of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act of 1881, by section 2, is large enough to cover these rules and any other rules which may be made relating to the remuneration of solicitors for the work there referred to, which may be called conveyancing work and non-contentious work. Rules have been made accordingly; and the rules, which will be found at p. 345 of the 2nd volume of the Annual Practice, are so worded that it is necessary to see into which clause any particular work comes. [His lordship referred to rule 2 of the General Order.] If you look at that (clause (a)) alone, I am not prepared to say that such an agreement or conveyance as this would not fall within that clause. It is in some sense, or may be considered in some sense, as a sale and purchase of this right of way; but at the same time it is obvious, when you look at the deed, that that is not a full description of it. If you look at it as a sale of a right of way, you must add this, that it is a good deal more than that. That is important when you look at the other clauses.

I do not think (b) is material; (c) is important. [His lordship read clause (c).] Now, that takes us to the schedule, and when you come to the schedule you find this. Schedule I., Part I., is the scale schedule: "Scale of charges on sales, purchases, and mortgages, and rules applicable thereto." Then, looking down, you find the vendor's solicitor "for negotiating a sale," "for conducting a sale of property by public auction," and so on, may charge so much. Then there is "when the property is sold" and when it is not sold; then "deducing title"; then "purchaser's solicitor," which I suppose this would be, "for negotiating a purchase of property by private contract" so much, "for investigating title to freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property, and preparing and completing conveyance (including perusal and completion of contract, if any) so much. When you come to look at the scale you see it is a percentage on the amount of money consideration. Then, when you look a little further, you find that that is expanded in Part II., and then you come to the second schedule. The second schedule, I think, is the old scale. It is Part I. of Schedule I. as altered by Schedule II. Schedule II. is for business not otherwise provided for.

Now, let us see what this is. It appears to me that the language is somewhat obscure; it is not very clear whether this is within the schedule or scale rule, or whether it is within the other rule. I think, when you look at the language, when you talk about a conveyance of property and sale of property, primâ facie the language is adapted to existing property and to the transfer of it. I do not say it could not possibly be extended so as to include what is popularly called a conveyance, although the conveyance creates the thing conveyed—perhaps it might, but that is a little converting the thing; but when you look at the substance of the thing and bear in mind that, as a rule, the consideration is small, whereas the trouble may be very great, it seems to me, in a simple case, the conveyance would fall under "business not otherwise provided for." I think that would be the business point of view. That has been the view adopted already in In re Stewart, and I do not understand In re Stewart to be based upon the theory that an easement is not property; it is based upon the theory that such a deed as creates an easement for the first time is not a sale or conveyance of property within the first part of the rule, but is business otherwise provided for under the last. That, I think, is right, and it is quite consistent with that to say that the sale of an advowson is within the scale. Such a transaction as this does not strike me as coming within the rule applicable to the scale, and in this particular case I have no doubt whatever about it. I cannot conceive that such a deed as we have to deal with is a mere sale, and that the business connected with it should be paid for upon the basis of it being a mere sale. There are arrangements made between the two adjoining owners, and the mere fact that one of them gives £516 for the right to cross a piece of land, plus what the other gets out of it in other respects, does not make it a conveyance and sale in the ordinary view of business men. In this particular case I have no doubt that North, J., was right; but I am not prepared to throw any doubt upon the rule, which had better be settled once for all, that a deed creating an easement for the first time does not come within the scale rule, but comes within the other.

KAY, L.J.—I will add a few words upon the meaning of this Act. Under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act of 1881 undoubtedly there is an authority which has power to make an order prescribing and regulating the remuneration of solicitors for certain work, including the case of the creation of an easement. The words are as large as may be: This authority "may from time to time make any such general order as to them seems fit for prescribing and regulating the remuneration of solicitors in respect of business connected with sales, purchases, leases, mortgages, settlements, and other matters of conveyancing, and in respect of other business not being business in any action or transacted in any court or in the chambers of any judge or master, and not being otherwise contentious business, and may revoke or alter any such order." Therefore clearly the authority may make orders for any business which is practically non-contentious—any conveyancing or other business which is not contentious business. Therefore undoubtedly they had power to make the orders which would include the scale fee for the creation of an easement. That an easement is property nobody would think of denying, and it comes plainly, to my mind, within those words.

Then the next thing to be observed is this, that the orders which have been made, on the face of them, show they did not include every case, because by sub-section (c), to which Lindley, L.J., has referred, of order 2, it is expressly provided that in respect of business not provided for by the two former sub-sections in that order the ordinary fee shall be paid as altered by Schedule II.; so that they did not intend to make the scale to be applied to all business that was not contentious business. The authority who made the order were perfectly well aware that the orders which they did make were not so large as that.

Now, then, we have to see whether, under Schedule I., the scale can be applied to a case of this kind. This is not a transfer of any property in the ordinary sense of a transfer. It was not an existing subject of property which was conveyed from one owner to another; it was a grant out of the owner's property of a certain easement. Take other instances which were referred to during the argument. Supposing the grant had been of the passage of light over the property of A. to a window of B., that would be an easement; or supposing it had been of the right to let the smoke from B.'s chimney or from B.'s brick-kiln pass over the land of A., and a consideration paid for that, that would be the grant for the first time of an easement, and not a transfer, in the ordinary sense of that word, of any existing property. The easement never existed as an easement until it was created by the particular grant.

Now, does this Schedule I. to Part I. apply to a case of that kind? I confess that it does not seem to me to be the primâ facie meaning of the word. I take the case of the purchaser's solicitor: purchaser's solicitor "for negotiating a purchase of property"—this is a purchase of property in one sense—"for investigating title to freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property, and preparing and completing conveyance (including perusal and completing of contract, if any)." No doubt that means a conveyance of that property the title to which he investigates. Primâ facie, the word "conveyance" is not at all an apt word to describe a deed by which an easement over somebody's property is created for the first time. If the easement had existed in A. B. and was by him transferred to another person, it would come within these words plainly enough, and that would be a transfer of property. That is what primâ facie this schedule contemplates—a transfer of some existing property, and not a creation of a mere right, whether it be an easement or right—a mere right which is for the first time created by a deed which may in one sense be called a conveyance, but which is not a conveyance in the sense of being a transfer of existing things. I say this because there seems to have been some question about the words which were used by me in the case of In re Stewart. I there seem to have said: "Obviously the schedule contemplates primâ facie conveyances of land held as freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property, and the scale is fixed upon the purchase money which is paid when such property changes hands. When a mere easement is granted there is no change of property in that sense, and the purchase money is comparatively trifling in amount; but it might well be that a difficult and expensive investigation of the grantor's title might in many cases be necessary, for which a scale charge calculated on the purchase money of the easement would be a very inadequate compensation."

Now, that case came before Chitty, J., in the case of In re Earnshaw-Wall, and he, referring to the decision, quotes the words which I have read, and adds: "His words had reference to the particular circumstances of the case before him; he was not dealing with the general question, nor with the question of property passing by conveyance; he did not express any decided opinion on the point before me. I should feel bound to follow him if I thought he intended to lay down the proposition that the term 'property' did not include incorporeal hereditaments; but as I consider he did not so intend, I am free to decide as I do." That it could be imagined for a moment that my words were meant not to include incorporeal hereditaments I cannot understand. The language I used was used in a case in which the particular easement, which was a licence to lay down pipes on somebody else's land, was created by deed, and I used the word "grant" to express unmistakably, as I thought, the difference between the transfer of a thing which existed, and the creation of it by grant for the first time. I never for a moment suggested that an existing easement or an existing incorporeal hereditament of any kind, being transferred from a vendor to a purchaser, would not come within Schedule I. I most distinctly think it would; but I still remain of opinion that if the deed in question be the mere creation for the first time of an easement over land, the words of Schedule I. are not very apt to meet that case, and I do not think they are intended to meet it.

I have pointed out that it appears most distinctly upon the face of this order that Schedule I. was not intended to include them, and in fact a good many cases are left to be dealt with under Schedule II.—that is to say, according to the ordinary rules as to costs, somewhat modified by that section; and I cannot help thinking that if it had occurred to the minds of those who drew these orders, they would not have included the mere creation of an easement by deed in Schedule I., but would have left it to be dealt with by Schedule II. I think that is the right construction of these rules. Therefore I should think, in this case, that if the £516 were the purchase money for the grant of an easement created for the first time, it would not come within Schedule I. But, as has been pointed out, there is more in this case than that, because the deed by which this right or easement was created is a deed which contains a sort of give-and-take arrangement. There were advantages given to the vendor besides the purchase money, and therefore to say that the scale fee on the purchase money was the only fee that could be charged seems to me again not consistent with Schedule I. For these reasons I think that the decision of North, J., was quite right. It is obvious that it is possible that if the authority who has the power to make a rule thinks it right to make a rule which includes this case, they can do so; but I think the rule should be much more explicitly expressed than is Schedule I. of the General Orders at present.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Having heard this case argued, I think that Chitty, J.'s judgment in In re Earnshaw-Wall was right, and that the judgment of Kay, J. (as he then was), in In re Stewart was right. The main distinction between the cases is this, that in the case before Chitty, J., there was a transfer of existing property brought about by conveyance, and in In re Stewart and in this case there has been no transfer of existing property, or of prior existing property at all, and, as has been pointed out by Mr. Channell, the conveyance itself creates a right which had no existence before. It seems to me, therefore, that this case does not fall within the phraseology of Schedule I., Part I., to which we have been referred, and which the Lords Justices have called attention to; and for these reasons I think this case follows the case before Kay, J., of In re Stewart, that that case was rightly decided, and that North, J., was quite right in following it.

CHILLINGWORTH v. CHAMBERS. (a.)

Trustee — Breach of trust — Trustee beneficiary—Indemnity—Right to contribution from co-trustee.

If one of two trustees who have been guilty of a breach of trust is also a beneficiary, he is liable to make good out of his share and to the extent of it the whole of the loss that has accrued to the trust fund, and can claim no contribution from his co-trustee when the breach of trust was committed for his benefit.

Appeal from North, J. (ante, p. 32).

The facts are fully stated in the report in the court below, and it is only necessary to state here that part of the trust estate, a sum of £8,650, was invested on mortgage of certain leasehold houses to a builder named Hughes, part before and part after May, 1881.

The chief clerk found by his certificate that the whole of the loss to the trust funds, £1,580, should be borne and paid by the plaintiff. North, J., affirmed this decision, following Evans v. Benyon, 37 Ch. D. 329, 36 W. R. Dig. 208.

The plaintiff appealed.

Warmington, Q.C., and Arnold Statham, for the appellant.—Where trustees are fighting amongst themselves, the doctrine of acquiescence has never been held to be an estoppel. An innocent trustee who becomes a beneficiary after the breach of trust ought not to be put in the same position as a trustee who is particeps criminis. The true principle is that so far as he stood to make or did make a profit, he must make good that loss to the extent of his profit.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Tebbutt, for the respondent.—A cestui que trust who concurs in a breach of trust cannot turn round and take proceedings against the trustee: Trafford v. Boehm, 3 Atk. 440; Lord Montfort v. Lord Cadogan, 17 Ves. 485. who is also a cestui que trust, the deficiency must be made good first out of the estate of the one who benefited by it.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 20.—LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts, and continued:—The circumstances under which the trustees made the loans on mortgage were as follow. The borrower was a person named Hughes, a builder, and he was employed by the trustees to erect houses on the testator's property. Hughes also had other property on which he was building, and as the houses on this property were erected the trustees advanced him money on mortgages of them. The plaintiff favoured these loans both when his wife was alive and after her death, because Hughes was willing to pay and did pay 5 per cent. On the other hand, it is proved that the defendant was mixed up with Hughes in building operations, and was interested in them, and that after the trustees had agreed to make an advance to Hughes, the defendant frequently made him a temporary loan, intending that it should be repaid by Hughes as soon as he got money from the trustees; and it is proved, and in truth admitted by the defendant, that these temporary loans were so repaid. The amounts, however, of these temporary loans and repayments cannot be accurately ascertained. They probably amounted to considerably more than £1,500. The plaintiff asserts that he knew nothing about these loans and repayments until quite lately, and his counsel contended that the defendant ought to be treated as having received the trust money himself to the extent of at least £1,580, and that the defendant was in strictness liable to make good the whole of the loss sustained by the trust estate, but that the plaintiff was content with one-half and did not ask for more. On the evidence, however, I am not satisfied that the plaintiff was so ignorant of these loans and repayments as he now says he was. No hidden scheme on the part of the defendant to get the moneys ostensibly for Hughes, but really for himself, is made out. Under these circumstances the repayments of the defendant's advances cannot be regarded as breaches of trust. Hughes was a mere borrower of trust money. His liability as regards the trust money lent to him was simply to repay it with interest. This was settled in Stroud v. Gwyer, 28 Beav. 130, 8 W. R. Dig. 85, and Vyse v. Foster, 21 W. R. 207, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 309. He therefore could pay the trust money away after he had borrowed it to anyone, and no one taking it from him, even with notice of the source from which he obtained it, would incur any liability to the trustees who lent it or to their cestui que trust. See Butler v. Butler, 26 W. R. 85, 7 Ch. D. 116, 119, where the liability of persons dealing with borrowers of trust property is discussed. It is impossible, therefore, to treat the defendant as liable to make good the whole or even half of the loss on any such theory as that to which I am now referring. But, although the defendant is not bound to indemnify the plaintiff against the whole loss, it has to be considered whether the plaintiff is not bound to indemnify the defendant. I am not now alluding to the plaintiff as a cestui que trust. I will consider his position in that character presently. I am regarding him simply as a co-trustee. It sometimes occurs, though not often, that one co-trustee is bound to indemnify the other against all loss. Whether he is or is not depends on what is just as between the two, and this depends on what they have respectively done (see Bahin v. Hughes, 34 W. R. 311, 31 Ch. D. 390, and the cases there cited).

Now, in the present case the improper investment which led to the loss was made, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, in order to obtain a high rate of interest for the benefit of his own wife so long as she lived, and for the benefit of the plaintiff himself after her death. If, then, the defendant had not been interested in procuring advances for Hughes, it would require consideration before holding it to be just as between the plaintiff and the defendant to throw any part of the loss upon the defendant. In the case supposed the defendant would have strong grounds for contending that he was entitled to be indemnified against all loss by the plaintiff. It is, however, unnecessary to decide how this would have been; because, although no such scheme on the part of the defendant as I have before alluded to is proved, yet it is proved that the defendant was interested in keeping Hughes afloat and in facilitating borrowing by him, and I cannot avoid the conclusion that the plaintiff and the defendant, for personal reasons of their own, although for different ends, were both ready to run risks which as trustees they ought not to have run, and were too lax in seeing after the sufficiency of the securities they took. As between the plaintiff and the defendant, therefore, if the plaintiff had no beneficial interest in the estate, the ordinary right of one trustee to contribution from his co-trustee would exist.

Having arrived at this conclusion, it is necessary to consider what the effect is of the circumstance that the plaintiff became entitled to his wife's one-fifth share in the trust estate when she died. The plaintiff contends that if two trustees are jointly and severally liable to make good a breach of trust, and as between themselves in pari delicto, they are as between themselves entitled to contribution so as to equalize the loss to which both are equally liable. The plaintiff further contends that the fact that on the death of his wife he became beneficially entitled to a share of the trust property does not deprive him of his right to contribution from his co-trustee. On the other hand, it is contended by the defendant that a cestui que trust who concurs or acquiesces in a breach of trust cannot obtain any relief against his co-trustee. The defendant further contends that this principle applies not only when the cestui que trust is not himself a trustee, but also when he is; and that the same principle applies even although the person filling both characters does not become a cestui que trust until after the breach of trust has been committed. North, J., in his judgment, first pointed out that as between the beneficiaries the plaintiff's share was primarily applicable and had properly been applied to make good the loss arising from the breach of trust; and then he held, on the authority of Evans v. Benyon, that the plaintiff was precluded from throwing any part of that loss on the defendant. Evans v. Benyon, however, was not a case of co-trustees at all. The court did decide that a person who instigated a breach of trust could not, when he himself became a beneficiary, compel the trustees to make good the loss occasioned by such breach. It is therefore an authority for saying that if the plaintiff had not been himself a trustee, his conduct before he became a cestui que trust would have precluded him from obtaining relief against the defendant in respect of the breach of trust which the plaintiff concurred in, as above stated. In order to determine the rights of the parties it is necessary to consider, first, the plain-tiff's right in his character of trustee against the defendant; and, secondly, the defendant's right against the plaintiff in his character of cestui que trust. To the extent to which the plaintiff's right as trustee is neutralized by his obligation as cestui que trust he will have no right to contribution. But, except so far as it is thus neutralized, his right to contribution will remain. In other words, if the plaintiff as trustee is entitled to throw half the loss on the defendant, and if, on the other hand, the defendant is protected against any claim of the plaintiff in respect of his share of the trust estate, then, as that share exceeds half the loss, the plaintiff will not be entitled to anything from the defendant, and must bear the whole loss which he has sustained. On the other hand, if the plaintiff as cestui que trust is not precluded from recovering from the defendant so much as one-half the loss, the plaintiff's right as co-trustee to contribution from the defendant will still be enforceable for the excess. This, in my opinion, is how the conflicting rights of the two parties have to be adjusted, and it only remains to work them out. The plaintiff and the defendant being in pari delicto, the plaintiff's right as trustee to contribution from the defendant as co-trustee to the extent of one-half the loss is established by a long series of authorities, of which it is only necessary to mention Lingard v. Bromley, 1 V. & B. 114, and Bahin v. Hughes. On the other hand, the right of the defendant as trustee to be indemnified out of the share of the plaintiff as cestui que trust against the consequences of a breach of trust committed at his request and for his benefit is equally indisputable. It was treated by Lord Eldon as clear law in his day that a cestui que trust who concurs in a breach of trust is not entitled to relief against his co-trustee in respect of it: see Walker v. Symonds. In Mr. Lewin's work (8th edition, p. 918) many other authorities will be found to the same effect, and Lord Eldon's statement of the law was distinctly approved and followed in Farrant v. Blanchford, 11 W. R. 294, 1 De G. J. & Sm. 107. Moreover, as already pointed out, it was decided in Evans v. Benyon that this doctrine applies to a person who becomes a cestui que trust after his concurrence. Further, in Butler v. Carter, 16 W. R. 388, L. R. 5 Eq. 276, Lord Romilly stated distinctly that where one of two trustees was himself a cestui que trust he could not call upon his co-trustee to replace stock which they had both permitted to be misapplied (see p. 281). These cases are all based on obvious good sense; for if I request a person to deal with my property in a particular way and loss ensues, I cannot justly throw that loss on him. Whatever our liabilities may be to other people, still, as between him and me, the loss clearly ought to fall on me. Whether I am solely entitled to the property or have only a share or a limited interest, still the loss which I sustain in respect of my share or interest must clearly be borne by me, not by him. This rule is eminently just in such a case as this, in which the plaintiff who seeks relief has concurred in a long series of breaches of trust, and has since he became a cestui que trust confirmed all the breaches of trust which he and the defendant committed at an earlier period. The plaintiff contended, on the authority of Raby v. Ridehalgh, that the plaintiff's liability as cestui que trust to indemnify the defendant, and the extent of the plaintiff's inability to obtain relief against the defendant, was limited, not by the amount of the plaintiff's share in the trust estate, but by the benefit derived by the plaintiff from the breach of trust. But I do not understand Raby v. Ridehalgh to go as far as this. The question there was to what extent two tenants for life were bound to indemnify their trustees in respect of certain breaches of trust. The master found that the tenants for life had benefited by these breaches, and had requested the trustees to invest the trust money on mortgage, but that the two tenants for life had, not instigated or authorized the particular investments which led to the loss which the trustees were ordered to make good. The Vice-Chancellor held each of the tenants for life personally liable for the whole loss. The Court of Appeal corrected this, and decided, first, that the liability of the tenants for life was not a personal liability to indemnify the trustees, but was confined to the beneficial interests of the tenants for life; and the court decided, secondly, that the liability of the tenants for life was limited to the amounts they had respectively received, and did not extend to what other tenants for life had received nor to what the trustees had not paid over to anyone. This, under the circumstances of that case, was quite right. The whole of the life interests of the tenants for life were, however, charged with the repayment of what they were held liable for. In varying the order appealed from, the Court of Appeal treated the corrections which it made as formal rather than substantial, and I do not understand the decision to go further than I have stated; nor is there any reason to suppose that the doctrine laid down by Lord Eldon was in any way considered incorrect. Suppose a cestui que trust in remainder to induce his trustees to commit a breach of trust for the benefit of the tenant for life—perhaps his own father or mother—can such remainderman compel the trustees to make good the loss or resist their claim to have it made good out of his interest when it falls in, if some other cestui que trust compels them to make the loss good? I apprehend not; and yet in the case supposed the cestui que trust in remainder might not himself have derived any benefit at all from the breach of trust. The 6th section of the Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), appears to be based on this view of the law, and under that section (if it applied) it would, in my opinion, be just to impound the whole of the plaintiff's beneficial interest to indemnify the defendant. On these grounds I am of opinion that the decision appealed from is right, and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

KAY, L.J.—A claim is made by the plaintiff, one of two trustees, against the defendant, his co-trustee, for contribution of one-half the loss occasioned by a breach of trust committed by both by investing part of the trust money on insufficient security. Where trustees are equally to blame for a breach of trust, and are made jointly and severally liable to the cestuis que trust, if one of them pays the whole, his right to enforce contribution from his co-trustee is clear.

In Lingard v. Bromley, 1 V. & B. 114, at p. 117, Sir W. Grant, M.R., distinguished such a case from an ordinary tort, and had no doubt about the right to contribution. He then said: "There are, no doubt, many cases in which persons may be all liable severally, as well as jointly, to indemnify a third party, and yet ought not in equity to bear the burthen equally among themselves." The plaintiff and defendants in that case were assignees in bankruptcy, and the Master of the Rolls points out that the plaintiff, who had filed the bill to obtain contribution, had not derived any extensive benefit from the breach of trust, and that the defendants were not excused because they had left the matter in the plaintiff's hands, and did what he desired without examining into the matter. This was followed by the Court of Appeal in Bahin v. Hughes. The care with which the court, in administering equity between the trustees, looks into all the circumstances, is illustrated by Lockhart

v. Reilly, 1 De G. & J. 464, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 90, where a loss was occasioned by an improper investment on mortgage made by two trustees, one of whom was a solicitor, and acted as solicitor in the matter, and negotiated the mortgage in favour of a mortgagor with whom he was connected. Lord Cranworth, L.C., held him to be primarily liable as between himself and his co-trustee, and said that the fact of his acting as solicitor would alone be sufficient to justify this result. The same thing was held in Thompson v. Finch, 8 De G. M. & G. 560, 5 W. R. Ch. Dig. 100.

It seems to be essential to this claim for equal contribution that the trustees should be equally to blame for the breach of trust, and that neither of them should have derived an exclusive benefit from the breach of trust. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] In Butler v. Butler, 5 Ch. D. 554, 25 W. R. Dig. 296; on app., 26 W. R. 85, 7 Ch. D. 116, one trustee filed a bill against another, claiming to make him pecuniarily liable for a deficiency of mortgages made to a builder who repaid the defendant trustee a large part of such moneys for debts due from him to such trustee for the purchase money of the land and on account of advances made by him to the mortgagor. The plaintiff was aware that some payments were so made, but he did not know the amount. Fry, J., before whom the case first came, asked if there was any case in which such an indirect benefit had been held to make the trustee who received it primarily liable, and refused to do so; and this was supported in the Court of Appeal, James, L.J., saying that in the absence of fraud such a claim was too remote.

Suppose, then, that the plaintiff was thus directly or indirectly interested in lending the trust money to Hughes, and must be treated as being exclusively benefited by the breach of trust, the question is whether he is primarily liable to the extent of his one-fifth share of the estate.

It was argued that all the estate recovered must, first, be applied to pay the other four-fifth shares, and that the plaintiff has no right to contribution for the deficiency to pay his share.

In Trafford v. Boehm trust funds were settled by a marriage settlement (p. 442) on the husband for life, the wife for life, children, and, if none, to the husband. With the concurrence or subsequent consent of the husband an improper investment was made of the trust fund, which resulted in a loss, and after the death of the husband his widow filed a bill against the trustee of the settlement to recover the trust fund. The surviving trustee of the settlement filed a cross bill to be indemnified against the loss. Lord Hardwicke held that the estate of the husband was primarily liable. He said: "The rule of the court in all cases is that if a trustee errs in the management of the trust and is guilty of a breach, yet, if he goes out of the trust with the approbation of the cestui que trust, it must be made good first out of the estate of the person who consented to it." That this is the rule in the case of a person, cestui que trust at the time, assenting to a breach of trust is established, by dicta at least, in many cases. I take as an example Lord Langdale's words in Lincoln v. Wright: "Nothing can be more clear than the rule which is adopted by the court in these cases—that if a party having a partial interest in the trust fund induces the trustee to depart from the direction of the trust for his own benefit, and enjoys that benefit, he shall not be permitted personally to enjoy the benefit of the trust whilst the trustees are subjected to a serious liability which he has brought upon them. What the court does in such a case is to lay hold of the partial interest to which that person is entitled, and apply it, so far as it will extend, in exoneration of the trustees who, by his request or desire or acquiescence, or by any other mode of concurrence, have been induced to do the improper act." In Walker v. Symonds, 3 Swans. 64, Lord Eldon said: "It is established by all the cases that, if the cestui que trust joins with the trustees in that which is a breach of trust, knowing the circumstances, such a cestui que trust can never complain of such a breach of trust. I go further, and agree that either concurrence in the act or acquiescence without original concurrence will release the trustee; but that is only a general rule, and the court must inquire into the circumstances which induced concurrence or acquiescence, recollecting, in the conduct of that inquiry, how important it is, on the one hand, to secure the property of the cestui que trust, and, on the other, not to deter men from undertaking trusts from the performance of which they seldom obtain either satisfaction or gratitude." This refers only to an attempt by the cestui que trust to make the trustee liable for any loss which the cestui que trust may suffer by reason of a breach of trust which he instigated or concurred in. Such a claimant is estopped by his concurrence in the breach of trust. But, as I have shown, this estoppel does not exist where the claim is for contribution by one trustee against another. The fact of the claimant being equally to blame for the breach of trust does not bar such a claim. Then what difference does it make that the trustee so claiming is also interested in the trust estate? If he takes no benefit directly or indirectly by the breach of trust, can his interest be laid hold of to indemnify his co-trustee? If he does benefit, is the whole of his interest liable, or only to the extent of the benefit received? The decisions and dicta on this question are not easy to reconcile.

In Booth v. Booth, where the testator's widow, who was entitled to the income of the residue till his youngest child should attain twenty-one, concurred in a breach of trust by the trustees carrying on the business of the testator whereby his capital in that business was ultimately lost, Lord Langdale said: "That the widow concurred seemed to be quite clear, and any interest to which she may be entitled is the proper fund to resort to in the first instance. If she has obtained any benefit from the breach of trust, the trustee ought to be compensated in respect of it." That seems to indicate a limitation of the liability to the amount of the benefit derived by the beneficiary.

The question came before the Court of Appeal, and seems to have been carefully considered in Raby v. Ridehalgh, where tenants for life of equal half-shares in the trust estate induced the trustee to lend the trust money on mortgage so as to secure a higher rate of interest than the public funds in which the trustees desired to invest. There were no powers of investment in the will creating the trust. The tenants for life did not request the trustees to invest on the particular mortgages which turned out deficient. The trustees were held liable for the loss, and it was declared by the original order that the life interests of the tenants for life were liable to recoup the trustees in terms which would make each life interest liable to its full extent, and each also liable for the whole deficiency. On appeal Turner, L.J., intimating that the court did not go the length of ordering the cestui que trust personally to recoup the trustees, and doubting whether the trustees had any power to invest on mortgage, and holding the trustees liable, continued thus: "The next question is, What is the extent of liability which attaches upon the cestuis que trust for life in consequence of their having induced the trustees to commit the breach of trust?" He then points out that they had received the income of the improper investments, and that the trustees were entitled to stand in the place of the remaindermen for the purpose of recovering against the cestui que trust for life who instigated the breach of trust, or their estate the benefit actually received by them in consequence of such breach of trust. One tenant for life, John Spenser Raby, was living; the other, William Raby, had died since the institution of the suit. The decree was altered, and as altered declared that J. S. Raby and the estate of W. Raby were respectively liable to the extent of the interest on the mortgages received by them respectively to make good to the trustees the amount they had to pay, and that the life estate of J. S. Raby and what was due in respect of the life estate of W. Raby were respectively liable to pay the amount for which each of them was respectively so liable. Turner, L.J., expressly treats the tenants for life as having instigated the breach of trust, and particularly pointed out that the life interest of each cestui que trust ought not to be made liable for the whole, but each estate only for so much of the income of the improper investments as each tenant for life had respectively received. If these receipts were not sufficient to recoup the trustees in full, it would seem that the court considered that the rest of the loss must be borne by them, and this was the effect of the decree as altered.

Here we have a plaintiff who was trustee and also cestui que trust as to one-fifth of the property; and, if the case of Raby v. Ridehalgh applies, it follows that he is not estopped by his concurrence in the breach of trust from claiming contribution. But as cestui que trust he is prevented from requiring the co-trustee to make good any loss sustained by him in that character. The loss he seeks to make his co-trustee share is not the loss of his one-fifth share as cestui que trust, but the amount he has had to pay as trustee to recoup the deficiency of the trust estate. If he is primarily liable to the extent of his one-fifth share, this claim must fail. If liable only to the amount of the benefit received from the improper investment, the balance of the loss after deducting that amount must be shared by himself and his co-trustee. On the whole I think that the weight of authority is in favour of holding that a trustee who, being also cestui que trust, has derived as between himself and his co-trustee an exclusive benefit by the breach of trust must indemnify his co-trustee to the extent of his interest in the trust fund, and not merely to the extent of the benefit which he has received. I think that the plaintiff must be treated as having received such an exclusive benefit. I am of opinion, for these reasons, that the plaintiff's action fails, and that the appeal must be dismissed. It is said that section 6 of the Trustee Act, 1888, does not apply to this case—I suppose because this proceeding was pending at the passing of that Act. The statute does not define the extent of the liability of a concurring beneficiary; the 6th section is rather addressed to describe the case in which the court may, if it shall think fit, impound all or any part of the interest of the beneficiary by way of indemnity to the trustee, and also to provide that consent of a beneficiary for this purpose must be given in writing.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an application by a trustee who is also a cestui que trust of trust property, against his co-trustee, to have him held liable to contribute towards a loss which had been occasioned by their breaches of trust, and which loss has been made good to the trust estate out of the applicants' share therein. The facts are these. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] There appear to be three rules which have application to a case like the present, and may be shortly stated as follows: (1) That a cestui que trust cannot make a trustee liable for losses occasioned to him by a breach of trust which the cestui que trust has authorized and consented to; (2) that in such a case a trustee is entitled to be recouped out of the interest of the cestui que trust in the trust funds any loss he may sustain by reason of his having to make good such breach of trust; and (3) that as between two trustees who are in pari delicto, the one who has made good a loss occasioned by a breach of trust for which the two are jointly and severally liable may obtain contribution to that loss from the other. The question is how these rules are to be applied in the present case.

As to the existence of the first rule, Lord Eldon, as long ago as the year 1818, in Walker v. Symonds, 3 Sw. at p. 64, states: "It is established by all the cases that if the cestui que trust joins with a trustee in that which is a breach of trust, knowing the circumstances, such a cestui que trust could never complain of such a breach of trust." And in 1841 Lord Langdale in Fyler v. Fyler, 3 Beav. at p. 560, states the rule as follows: "If all this has taken place—i.e., the breach of trust—with the consent of the parties now complaining, it certainly appears to me that they would not have any right to maintain this suit for volenti non fit injuria. If they have authorized this course of dealing with their own fund, it would be in the highest degree unjust to permit them to establish a claim against those who have acted under their authority." As to the second rule, this was held by Lord Hardwicke in the year 1746, in Trafford v. Boehm, 3 Atk. at p. 444: "The rule of the court in all cases is that if a trustee errs in the management of the trust and is guilty of a breach, yet if he goes out of the trust with the approbation of the cestui que trust it must be made good first out of the estate of the person who consented to it." And Lord Langdale, in Lincoln v. Wright, 4 Beav. at p. 432, states the rule thus: "Now, nothing can be more clear than the rule which is adopted by this court in these cases, that if one party, having a partial interest in the trust fund, induces the trustee to depart from the direction of the trust for his own benefit, and enjoys that benefit, he shall not be permitted personally to enjoy the benefit of the trust whilst the trustees are subjected to a serious liability which he has brought upon them. What the court does in such a case is to lay hold of the partial interest to which that person is entitled, and apply it, so far as it will extend, in exoneration of the trustees who by her request and desire, or acquiescence, or by any other mode of concurrence, have been induced to do the improper act." The judgment of Turner, L.J., in Raby v. Ridehalgh, appears to me to proceed upon the same principle, for he held cestui que trust who had been privy to and instigated a breach of trust liable out of the trust shares to recoup the trustees. A question has arisen under this judgment as to what amount of the cestui que trust's interest the trustee is entitled to impound. For the reasons given by Lindley, L.J., I am of opinion that Turner, L.J., did not intend to cut down the rule which had theretofore in my opinion existed—viz., that a trustee may be entitled to impound the cestui que trust's interest in so far as it will go to recoup him for the losses he has had to make good. It is not stated whether the amount impounded in this case was not sufficient to indemnify the trustee. I do not doubt, had the plaintiff in the present case not been a co-trustee with the defendant, but only a cestui que trust of the estate of which the defendant was trustee, that, inasmuch as the plaintiff had authorized and consented to the breach of trust which is now complained of, he could not claim contribution from the defendant to make good the loss he had sustained; and, what is more, that the defendant would have been entitled to impound the plaintiff's interest in his one-fifth share to exonerate him from any loss he might have been called upon to make good by reason of the breach of trust. It was argued by Mr. Warmington for the plaintiff before us that the facts showed that the plaintiff did not authorize or consent to the breach of trust which was committed knowing the circumstances of the case, for he had been induced into agreeing to advance the trust moneys to the builder Hughes by the defendant concealing from the plaintiff the fact that he wanted Hughes to have the trust moneys advanced to him in order that he, Hughes, might thereout pay to the defendant debts which Hughes might owe to him.

I am of opinion that no concealment has been established against the defendant. The foundation upon which the charge was based was that there was evidence that some of the trust moneys, after they had been advanced by the plaintiff and the defendant to Hughes upon mortgage, had been paid by him to the defendant. I think there was such evidence; but what was there necessarily wrong in this? It is very far from establishing the charge of concealment. I am of opinion upon the evidence that the plaintiff knew far more of these loans to, and the repayment thereof by, Hughes than suggested at the bar. Mr. Swinfen Eady, for the defendant, showed us that the plaintiff in his affidavit before this point was taken by his counsel had therein stated that he knew the following: "Some of the moneys so borrowed by the said James Hughes as aforesaid were paid by him direct to the defendant." That allegation fails, and it is not true to say that the plaintiff did not authorize or consent to the breach of trust, for he did so well knowing the facts relating thereto. It appears to me that the truth as to the motives of the plaintiff and the defendant is that the plaintiff was desirous of obtaining a higher rate of interest for his wife, and afterwards for himself, than he otherwise would have obtained had the trust funds not been lent to Hughes upon mortgage; and that the defendant was desirous that Hughes should have the trust money advanced to him upon mortgage, for it bettered his chance of being paid by Hughes that which Hughes might owe to him. I now come to the third rule, which is that where two trustees concur in committing a breach of trust and are in pari delicto, the one, if he has made good the loss occasioned thereby to the trust estate, can obtain contribution from the other. The existence of this rule is not disputed at the bar: see Lingard v. Bromley. The real question is how is this rule to be applied in the present case, which arises not between two trustees who are merely trustees, but between a trustee who is also a cestui que trust and his co-trustee who is not. In my judgment the true view is that the plaintiff in this case can only bring into play the third rule (i.e., the rule as to contribution between co-trustees) if and when he had made good to the cestui que trust any loss they had sustained by reason of the breach of trust complained of over and above his share in the trust property; but this he has not done. As before stated, if he had not made good this loss and the defendant had, the plaintiff's share could have been impounded for that purpose by the defendant until he had been recouped what he had paid, and the plaintiff therefore was not in a position to ask for contribution from the defendant until the plaintiff had paid more than the amount of his share. When he had done so, then it seems to me he would have been entitled to ask for contribution towards what he had paid over and above his interest in the trust funds. But there yet remains to the plaintiff of his share in the trust funds the sum of £150, and consequently, in my judgment, there is nothing upon which the plaintiff can bring into play the operation of rule 3. For these reasons I think that North, J., was quite right in deciding as he did, that the plaintiff was entitled to no contribution from the defendant. This appeal must be dismissed.

Election law — Parochial elector—Local government - Woman—Qualification—Ownership — Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 2, sub-section 1; s. 43.

A woman is not entitled to be on the parochial electors' register by reason of her ownership of property within the parish.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division, ante, p. 78, [1896] 1 Q. B. 1, affirmed.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court (reported ante, p. 78, [1896] 1 Q. B. 1) which had dismissed an appeal from the decision of a revising barrister who had disallowed a claim by a married woman to be placed on the parochial electors' list for a certain parish in respect of the ownership of property within the parish.

The facts of the case are as follows.

The appellant, a married woman, was the owner of freehold property in the parish of Milborne St. Andrews, but was not an occupier in that parish, as she lived more than three miles therefrom. She claimed to have her name entered on the parochial electors' register of the said parish in respect of her property there. The property was of sufficient value to sustain an ordinary ownership claim, and her husband had no interest, nor was he qualified to be on the register in respect of it. The revising barrister disallowed the claim, on the ground that, as by section 2, sub-section 1 of the Local Government Act, 1894, it was provided that the parish meeting for a rural parish should consist of parochial electors, namely, persons registered in such portion either of the local government register of electors or of the Parliamentary register of electors as relates to the parish, and that, as the appellant was neither entitled to be on the local government register—ownership of property being no qualification in that respect—nor entitled to be on the Parliamentary register, being disqualified by her sex, she could not be placed on the parochial electors' register. From this decision she appealed to the Divisional Court (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Grantham and Vaughan Williams, JJ.) who affirmed the decision of the revising barrister: see ante, p. 78.

Section 43 of the Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), provides that: "For the purposes of this Act a woman shall not be disqualified by marriage for being on any local government register of electors or for being an elector of any local authority, provided that a husband and wife shall not both be qualified in respect of the same property."

appellant.—Prior to the Local Government Act of 1894 unmarried women were, if owners of property, qualified to vote for boards of guardians and urban sanitary authorities, and it was not the intention of the Legislature to take away this franchise because they are not entitled to be on the Parliamentary electors' register. The Legislature intended that a woman should be entitled to be on the register in respect of ownership in the same way that a man is entitled to be on the Parliamentary register, and section 43 provides that a woman shall not be disqualified from being on the register owing to her being married. A woman is qualified to vote at a municipal election by section 63 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50). This qualification was extended to the rural parishes by the County Electors Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 10), ss. 2-4.

Boydell Houghton, for the respondent.—A woman is entitled to be on the local government register if she is an occupier; but ownership is not a sufficient qualification. Section 43 does not confer any further qualification upon her; it merely says that a woman who is otherwise qualified is not to be disqualified by reason of her marriage.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the appellant, a married woman, was the owner of freehold property in the parish of Milborne St. Andrews, in the county of Dorset, but was not an occupier in that parish. She claimed to have her name placed on the parochial electors' list for that parish in respect of her ownership of such property. Whether she has a right to have her name placed on such register depends entirely upon the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1894. It has been contended on her behalf that section 43 of that Act confers upon her a right to have her name put upon the parochial electors' register. That section, however, does not say she shall be so qualified; it merely provides that if she is otherwise qualified she shall not be disqualified by the fact that she is married. That section does not imply that a woman shall be qualified by reason of ownership. Qualification to be on the parochial electors' list depends upon section 2, sub-section 1 of which defines parochial electors as being "persons registered in such portion either of the local government register of electors or of the Parliamentary register of electors as relates to the parish."

Now, the persons who are qualified to be on the local government register are occupiers. Therefore, if a woman is an occupier, she may be qualified to be on that register, and section 43 expressly provides that if she is qualified, the fact of her being a married woman shall not be a disqualification. But the appellant in this case is not an occupier; therefore she is not entitled to be placed on the local government register. As regards the Parliamentary register, the appellant, being a woman, is, of course, disqualified from being on that register.

Then, by section 44, sub-section 1, it is provided that "the local government register of electors and the Parliamentary register of electors, so far as they relate to a parish, shall together form the register of the parochial electors of the parish; and any person whose name is not on that register shall not be entitled to attend a meeting or vote as a parochial elector."

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case the appellant claims to have her name placed on the parochial electors' list for the parish in which she owns some property, but in which she is not an occupier. Now, how is the parochial electors' list drawn up? By the Local Government Act, 1894, parochial councils are established, and section 2 of that Act defines parochial electors as being persons registered in such portion either of the local government or of the Parliamentary register of electors as relates to the parish. Then by section 44 it is provided that those two registers, so far as they relate to a parish, shall together form the register of the parochial electors, and that no person whose name is not in that register shall be entitled to vote. Then section 43 provides that no woman shall be disqualified by marriage from being on any local government register. That section does no more than remove any disqualification arising from marriage, provided the woman is otherwise qualified. In my opinion the word "property" in that section merely means the land or house in respect of which the woman may be qualified, and does not import an ownership qualification. I do not think that section 3, sub-section 2, on which counsel for the appellant relies, has anything to do with the qualification of electors. I am of opinion that the appellant is not entitled to be on the parochical electors' list, for as she is not an occupier she cannot be on the local government register, and being a woman cannot be on the Parliamentary register. We must construe the words of the Act of Parliament as we find them, and it is not for us to consider whether this construction of the Act may in certain cases disfranchise some women who formerly were qualified by ownership to vote for local boards and boards of guardians.

RIGBY, L.J.—In my opinion this is a very plain case. Before the Act of 1894 was passed there was the local government register of electors for the county council or town council, the qualification for which was occupation, and not ownership. As regards, however, the election of poor law guardians and local boards this register did not apply, and ownership of property constituted a qualification in those cases. The Act of 1894 abolished that qualification, giving the right of electing in those cases to the parochial electors, but it was provided that those who were on the Parliamentary register should be entitled to vote as parochial electors. No one, therefore, now is entitled to be upon the local government register in respect of ownership, and no woman can be upon the Parliamentary register. A woman is not disqualified by this Act from being on the parochial electors' register by reason of her sex, but merely from getting on that register by means of the Parliamentary register; she has still the right to get on the local government register by being an occupier. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

a ship and her owners for damage by collision, and the plaintiffs apply for an order to join the pilot as a defendant to the action, the judge ought to exercise his discretion by refusing to make such order on the ground of inconvenience.

Appeal from an order of Sir Francis Jeune.

This was an action in rem brought by the owners of the steamship Cumbræ against the owners of the steamship Germanic for damage by collision in the River Mersey.

The defendants having put in a defence of compulsory pilotage, the plaintiffs applied for leave to add Robert Llewellyn Roberts, who had been the pilot in charge of The Germanic at the time of the collision, as defendant to the action.

Sir Francis Jeune granted the application.

The owners of The Germanic and the pilot appealed.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Butler Aspinall, for the appellants.—The case of The Bowesfield, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., shows that there is no power in an action in rem to add a party as a defendant to a claim in personam. Even if there is power, such a course is embarrassing. If the case against the ship and the case against the pilot are tried together, the Admiralty rule as to division of damages where both vessels are to blame will apply as regards the ship, but will not apply as regards the pilot. Again, the pilot may claim the right to be tried by a jury, while the action in rem would be tried by a judge with assessors, so that there might be different findings as to the same facts.

They cited Reg. v. Judge of City of London Court, 40 W. R. 215, [1892] 1 Q. B. 273.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., Pickford, Q.C., and A. D. Bateson, for the respondents.—The learned judge had jurisdiction to join the pilot as defendant under ord. 16, r. 4, and no injustice will result from the order.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed. The plaintiffs originally brought their action against the ship and the owners and other persons interested in her. They now want to join somebody else as defendant—viz., the pilot, and they ask for the assistance of the court to enable them to do so. It is unnecessary to determine whether the court has jurisdiction to join the pilot. I will assume that the court has jurisdiction, and the question then arises, How ought the jurisdiction to be exercised? There can be no doubt that if we should be of opinion that the learned judge has exercised jurisdiction unadvisedly, we have the power, and it is our duty, to alter his order. Now, if it should appear to the judge on such an application that one course which was open to him would lead to great inconvenience, while another course would not lead to any inconvenience, the proper exercise of his discretion would be to avoid the risk of great inconvenience, and to choose the other course. He was asked to join the pilot as defendant, and it is clear that if he made such an order, it would in all probability lead to great inconvenience. The pilot would have a right to be tried by a jury, and there can be no doubt that he would be advised to claim that right. So the case between the two ships and their owners would be tried by a judge sitting with assessors, while the case between the ship to which the pilot did not belong and the pilot would be tried by a judge with a jury. Such a course would manifestly be unseemly and inconvenient. There would also be a difficulty as to drawing up the judgments. If, on the other hand, the case were allowed to remain as it is, there would be no such inconvenience. It is true that the plaintiffs have a legal right, after the present action has been tried, to sue the pilot, and to have their case against him tried before a jury. But I do not think they are likely to avail themselves of that right, whether they succeed or fail in this action. I am, therefore, of opinion that the learned judge ought to have exercised his discretion by refusing the application.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. TRUSTEES OF THE LONDON PAROCHIAL CHARITIES. (a.)

Metropolis—Land set apart for the purposes of interment—Sold under the authority of an Act of Parliament—Michael Angelo Taylor's Act (57 Geo. 3, c. cxxix.)—Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 72), ss. 3, 5.

Land formerly used as a burial ground, situate in the City of London, was purchased by the Commissioners of Sewers under the provisions of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, and was in part used by them for public purposes. The Commissioners sold the residue, and the purchasers proposed to erect buildings thereon. An action was brought to restrain this building.

Held, that the land in question had been sold or disposed of under the authority of an Act of Parliament within the meaning of section 5 of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, and might therefore be built upon.

This was an action by her Majesty's Attorney-General at the relation of the Vicar and Churchwardens of the parish church of St. Botolph Without, Aldersgate, in the City of London, and by the Vicar and Churchwardens as plaintiffs, in which an injunction was sought to restrain the defendants from erecting buildings on a piece of land in the immediate neighbourhood of that church, contrary to the provisions of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, and the Metropolitan Open Spaces Acts, 1881 and 1887.

The land in question lies between a street called Little Britain on the north and the site of a wall on the south dividing it from what was formerly the churchyard of St. Botolph, though now converted into a public garden.

This land (along with an additional strip now thrown into Little Britain) was acquired by virtue of the powers conferred by Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, 57 Geo. 3, c. cxxix., by the Commissioners of Sewers for the City of London in the years 1884 and 1885, for the purpose of widening Little Britain, and was purchased by them in part from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners (whose title was derived from the Dean and Chapter of Westminster), and as regards the residue from a body of charity trustees who held it upon trust to permit the churchwardens of the parish of St. Botolph to erect, for such purposes as the parishioners in Vestry assembled should direct.

At the time when the Commissioners of Sewers bought the land acquired by them, it was to a large extent covered by old houses, known as Nos. 77, 77½, 77A, 78, 79, 81, and 81A, Little Britain. All these houses, except No. 77½, abutted on Little Britain, but No. 77½ lay behind the others, abutting on the south side of the tower of St. Botolph's, and was approached by a passage-way bounded on the south by the wall above mentioned, and which was surrounded by a rail. The soil of this passage-way was included in the purchase. No. 79 had a small yard abutting on this passage; the other houses (except No. 81) actually abutted on it.

In the passage were two set of gates, one set at the entrance from Little Britain, the other about the middle. Near the end of this passage, close to No. 77½, were some steps which led to a gate in the railing through which the churchyard might be entered.

The Commissioners of Sewers pulled down all these houses and widened the street, and they, in 1887, resold the surplus lands which they did not require, being the piece of land as to which this dispute has arisen, to the same charitable trustees above mentioned, and from whom part of the lands had been bought.

This land was for some time used as a public garden. In 1891 the estates of the parish trustees became vested in the defendant trustees, and they, with the sanction of the Charity Commissioners, agreed to let the land for building purposes, and the defendants Heather and Bailey proceeded to excavate for the purpose of laying the foundations.

The writ in the action was issued on the 23rd of October, 1894.

By section 3 of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, the erection of buildings on any "disused burial ground" is prohibited. By section 4 of the Open Spaces Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 96), it is enacted that in the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, the expression "burial ground" shall have the same meaning as in the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881, as amended by the Act of 1887, and that the expression "disused burial ground" shall mean any burial ground which is no longer used for interments, whether or not such ground shall have been partially or wholly closed for burials under the provisions of any statute or Order in Council.

By section 1 of the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act, 1881, the expression "burial ground" includes any ground, whether consecrated or not, which has been at any time set apart for the purposes of interment.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Stokes, for the plaintiffs, argued that on the evidence the land in question had been set apart for burials, and that even if not set apart, yet it had been used as a burial ground; and, further, that section 5 of the Act of 1884 did not apply to any sale subsequent to the coming into force of that Act, and that there had not been, within the meaning of that section, a sale under the authority of any Act of Parliament.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts as above set forth, and referred to the statutes, and continued:—The first question to be inquired into, therefore, is whether any part of the land as to which the dispute has arisen is shown to have been "at any time set apart for the purposes of interment." Now, the meaning of these words has been the subject of judicial decision.

It has been determined by North, J., and the Court of Appeal in In re Poneford and Newport District School Board, that they do not necessarily involve actual use for the purposes of interment; land, therefore, which has been set apart, though it may never have been actually used for the purposes of interment is within the definition. On the other hand, it has been determined by North, J., in In re Ecclesiastical Commissioners and City of London Brewery Co., that land actually used for the purpose of interment need not necessarily have been set apart for these purposes. In that case the land in question was the site of a church in which burials had taken place; but it was held that the site had not been set apart within the meaning of this definition, and might consequently be built upon.

In the light of these decisions, I have to consider the documentary and other evidence adduced as to the title to and nature of the land in question. [His lordship then referred to the evidence, and in the result found that, except as to the site of the passage-way, no part of the land in question had been set apart for burials; but his lordship found that the site of the passage-way had once formed part of the churchyard, and consequently was at one time set apart for the purposes of interment, and continued:—]

It was, however, contended on the part of the defendants that even then no order ought to be made, because the case fell within an exception from the operation of the Act of 1884 under section 5, which runs: "Nothing in this Act contained shall apply to any burial ground which has been sold or disposed of under the authority of any Act of Parliament." The language of this section, notwithstanding its apparent simplicity, presents difficulties of interpretation when applied to the facts of the present case. It was said on behalf of the plaintiffs (1) that this section did not apply to a sale subsequently to the 14th of August, 1884, the date of the passing of the Act; and (2) that the site of the passage-way had not been sold or disposed of under the authority of any Act of Parliament within the meaning of the section. The first of these points has already been considered in two cases—viz., Trustees of St. Saviour's Rectory v. Oyler, before Bacon, V.C., and In re Ecclesiastical Commissioners and New City of London Brewery Co., before North, J. These two learned judges appear to have arrived at different conclusions, and, having carefully considered their judgments, I think that the construction placed on the enactment by North, J., is, for the reasons given by him, to be preferred; and I therefore hold that section 5 may apply to the sale to the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London, notwithstanding that that sale did not take place until 1885.

The second question appears to arise for the first time. The sale in 1885 was made under the provisions of sections 80 and 81 of the Statute 57 Geo. 3, c. cxxix., commonly known as Michael Angelo Taylor's Act. The effect of these provisions has been repeatedly considered by the courts particularly, Thomas v. Daw, and Gard v. Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London. The effect of them may be thus stated. Certain public bodies within the limits of the bills of mortality and the parishes of St. Pancras and St. Marylebone (among which bodies are included the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London) are thereby empowered, for the purpose of improving the the streets within their jurisdiction, to adjudge that "any houses, walls, buildings, lands, tenements, and hereditaments" (words of the widest import and amply sufficient to include a burial-ground, whether used or disused) or any part thereof prevent them executing a proposed improvement. Such an adjudication has been held a necessary preliminary to the taking of any further steps: see Thomas v. Daw. The adjudication being made (of course good faith is requisite, but as to this no question has been raised), the bodies in question have power (section 80) to treat, contract, and agree with the several owner or owners, occupier or occupiers, of all such houses, walls, buildings, lands, and hereditaments of whatsoever nature, tenure, kind, or quality for the purpose of the improvements, and to pay for the same such price as might be agreed upon; and (section 81) all persons, including particularly trustees and feoffees in trust for charities, are empowered to treat and agree with the public body for the absolute sale of the property and sell and convey it accordingly. Section 82 confers compulsory powers for the acquisition of such lands; and section 84 requires the purchase money in the case of sales by incapacitated persons to be paid into this court, and dealt with according to its orders.

It appears from the documents in evidence that this course was strictly pursued. There was an adjudication by the Commissioners of Sewers, a treaty or negotiation between them and the charity trustees, resulting in the ascertainment of the price by an arbitrator, payment of the purchase money into court, and a conveyance. The Commissioners derived their power to purchase, and the charity trustees their power to sell, from the statute.

Each step was taken under and in accordance with the authority conferred by the statute, and from that authority alone the sale derives its validity. I can come to no other conclusion than that the passage way (which was included in the lands taken by the Commissioners) was sold under the authority of an Act of Parliament—viz., 57 Geo. 3, c. cxxix. Why, then, does not the case fall within section 5 of the Act of 1884? It is said that some limitations must be put on the words of the enactment, otherwise a sale by a tenant for life under the power conferred by the Settled Land Acts would fall within it, with the result that a disused burial ground if sold by a tenant for life might be built upon, while if sold by an absolute owner could not. I should be very slow to arrive at any such conclusion, and if to escape from it some limitation must be put on the language of the Act, that will have to be considered when the case arises.

It is enough on the present occasion to say that whatever limitation is to be imposed it ought not, in my judgment, to exclude from the operation of section 5 a sale effected under such circumstances as that of 1885.

The result is that the action must be dismissed.

In re HEMP, YARN, AND CORDAGE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Winding up—Contributory—Underwriting contract — Termination of authority to apply for shares—Register of members.

An underwriting letter containing an offer (to be binding for two months) by the underwriter, in consideration of a premium, to take up such shares in a company as the public should not take up in answer to an invitation for public subscription, was addressed to the promoters of the company. The capital was offered to the public a few days after the date of the underwriting letter, but the underwriting letter was not accepted until a date at which the subscription list had been closed, the invitation to the public having proved an almost total failure. The promoters afterwards applied for shares in the underwriter's name, and the shares were allotted to him and his name placed on the register of members of the company. The company afterwards went into liquidation, and the underwriter's name still being on the register the liquidator sought to make him liable for calls.

Held, that the underwriter was not liable as a contributory, for when the underwriting letter was produced to the company it showed on the face of it that the offer had been accepted out of time, and there had never been a ratification with knowledge of the facts so as to enable the liquidator to rely on an estoppel.

This was a summons by the liquidator in the winding up under supervision of the above-named company for payment of calls by certain persons, among whom was a Mr. W. H. Hindley, who had signed an underwriting letter, dated the 17th of June, 1892, and addressed to the Northern Assets Corporation (who were promoters of the above-named company), and accepted on the 1st of July, 1892.

The material part of the underwriting letter was as follows:—

"Gentlemen,—I agree for the consideration below stated, upon the public issue, to subscribe for 400 ordinary shares of £5 each, £1 5s. paid, of the above issue, on the terms of the company's prospectus about to be issued . . . and to pay the instalments on the dates to be specified in the said prospectus as above, in consideration of which you are to pay me a commission of 1 per cent. on the . . . ordinary shares, and I hereby authorize you, in the event of my not applying for shares . . . as above mentioned, to apply for shares . . . in my name, and the directors of the company to allot the same to me thereon. But if on the public issue of the prospectus the whole of the above issue is bonâ fide subscribed by the public, then no allotment is to be made to me; but should the said issue be only partially subscribed by the public, then I am only to be allotted my proportion of the deficiency pro rata with the other persons or firms who shall have signed or entered into agreements with or underwriting letters to you similar, mutatis mutandis, to the arrangements hereby made. In either case it is agreed that the said commission upon the total sum guaranteed by me—viz., £2,000—is to be paid out of the moneys received by you from the vendors. This engagement is binding on me for two months from this date."

The letter was addressed to the Assets Corporation, and stated at its head the share and debenture capital of the company.

(a) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The capital had been offered to the public on the 20th, 21st, and 22nd of June, 1892, with the result that the shares were not taken up by the public, there having only been nine applications in all, and in consequence by the 1st of July the public subscription list had been closed.

Afterwards the underwriting letter with an application for shares was produced to the board of the company, who allotted the shares in question to Hindley without his knowledge, and his name was placed on the register of members, where it remained at the date of the winding up.

Hindley knew that his name had been placed upon the register, but he disputed his liability as a contributory on the ground that he was not aware of the real state of the facts regarding the acceptance of the offer in the underwriting letter, and also on the ground that he had in no way ratified the application by the Assets Corporation.

Buckley, Q.C., and W. F. Hamilton, for the liquidator.

Astbury, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for Hindley, raised the objection that in the circumstances he was not liable as a contributory. The application was sent in after the authority given by the contract had expired. Therefore there was in fact no application. There cannot be ratification without knowledge of the facts. The Assets Corporation ought not to have applied as they did, but an opportunity ought to have been given to us to apply before the application was made. A reasonable time should be given to the person signing the contract to apply himself before an application is made in his name.

They referred to Harvey's Oyster Co., Ormerod's case, 42 W. R. 701, [1894] 2 Ch. 475; Re Henry Bentley & Co., 69 L. T. Rep. N. S. 204; Brussels Palace of Varieties v. Prockter, 10 T. L. R. 72.

Hamilton.—There was a contract to take shares, which cannot be repudiated after there has been a winding up. Hindley is estopped from disputing his liability to pay calls by reason of the lapse of time.

He cited Oakes v. Turquand, L. R. 2 H. L. 325, 16 W. R. H. L. Dig. 15, and Kent v. Freehold Land Co., 16 W. R. 990, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 493.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 19.—Vaughan Williams, J.—I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Hindley ought not to be placed upon the list of contributories. It is true that his name appears upon the register of shareholders, and that it was placed there in respect of shares allotted to him in pursuance of an application signed in his name, under a power contained in an underwriting letter which he himself signed, and which is addressed to the London and Northern Assets Corporation, who seem to have been intimately connected with the promotion of the Hemp, Yarn, and Cordage Co. But it seems to me that, notwithstanding these facts, Mr. Hindley ought not to be placed on the list of contributories, because the Northern Assets Corporation had no right to use the powers under the underwriting letter at the time when they actually did use them. The underwriting letter, which is, in substance, an offer, is dated the 17th of June, 1892. The capital of the company was offered to the public on the 20th, 21st, and 22nd, and the offer contained in the letter was not accepted until the 1st of July, 1892, as appears upon the face of the letter, which has the acceptance and date of acceptance written on it. On the 1st of July the subscription list had been closed, the invitation to the public proving an almost total failure, only nine applications having been made.

Now, it seems clear that as the offer in the underwriting letter is an offer, in consideration of a premium, to take up such shares as the public should not take up in answer to the invitation for public subscription, the Northern Assets Corporation, to whom it was addressed, could not wait to see the result of the invitation to the public, and then accept Mr. Hindley's offer to underwrite after the invitation to the public had proved a failure. If there was no authority to sign the application for shares at the time when it was signed, then it seems to me that there was no contract between Mr. Hindley and the company in pursuance of which shares could be allotted to him; and the mere fact of his name being on the register, even though with his knowledge, will not make him a member.

But then it may be said that Mr. Hindley ratified the act of his assumed agent by not taking steps to get his name removed from the register, and that he cannot after liquidation get his name removed from the register. The answer to this seems to be that the underwriting letter was produced to the board before the allotment, and on the face of it showed that the offer had been accepted out of time. This is not a case in which there was a voidable contract by Mr. Hindley with the company to take shares, or a voidable authority to apply. In such a case, liquidation having intervened, it would be too late to avoid; but it is a case where there never was an authority to sign, or a contract by Hindley with the company, and where there never has been ratification with knowledge of the facts, the company cannot rely upon an estoppel, because they were wrong in allotting shares in pursuance of the authority produced to them, which on the face of it was out of time.

As against Mr. Hindley, therefore, the application must be dismissed, with costs.

Local government—County council—Bye-law for good rule and government—Use of profane or obscene language—Reasonableness—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 23—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 16.

A bye-law for the good rule and government of a county made by a county council under section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act and section 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888, prohibited any person from singing profane or obscene songs or using profane or obscene language "in any street or public place, or on land adjacent thereto."

Held, that the bye-law was unreasonable and invalid, not only because it extended the prohibition to land adjacent to a street or public place, but because it did not restrict the offence to cases where the song was sung or the language used to the annoyance of any person or of the public.

A bye-law for good rule and government made under section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, does not require confirmation by the Local Government Board.

Case stated by justices of the county of Worcester.

An information was preferred by the respondent against the appellant charging him with having unlawfully used obscene language in a public place in the county contrary to the bye-laws of the county council.

It was proved that the appellant had used the language complained of when standing on a public footpath in the presence of a number of persons.

The bye-law in question was No. 3 of a set of bye-laws "for the good rule and government of the county" made by the county council under the powers conferred on them by section 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888, and section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882; the bye-laws were duly sent to the Secretary of State, and had not been disallowed by the Queen in Council under section 23 (4) of the last-mentioned Act.

Bye-law No. 3 provided that "no person shall in any street or public place, or on land adjacent thereto, sing or recite any profane or obscene song or ballad, or use any profane or obscene language.

The justices convicted the appellant and imposed a fine of ten shillings under the provisions of the bye-laws as to penalties.

The question was whether the conviction was good.

Crump, Q.C., for the appellant.—The conviction is bad. This bye-law is unreasonable, because it purports to create a new offence, and is repugnant to the general law of the land. Bye-laws for good rule and government under section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, can only prohibit the doing of things which are contrary to law or are done to the annoyance or injury of the inhabitants. The mere use of objectionable language cannot be made an offence unless the public or some members of it are annoyed thereby; and, further, to make punishable the use of such language on any land adjacent to a public place is clearly unreasonable. The general law on this subject appears from section 28 of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, which provides for the punishment of persons who use profane or obscene language "in any street" and "to the annoyance of the residents or passengers"; and the bye-laws of a local authority cannot go beyond the statutory provisions relating to the same subject-matter. These bye-laws required to be confirmed by the Local Government Board under section 187 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and this has not been done: they are therefore wholly invalid.

He cited Johnson v. Mayor of Croydon, 16 Q. B. D. 708, and Everitt v. Grapes, 3 L. T. N. S. 669.

Channell, Q.C., and Brooke-Little, for the respondent.—The bye-law is reasonable if it be reasonably construed. The words relating to land adjacent to a public place must be construed to refer to the use of objectionable language on land so near to a public place that the language is audible in the public place: Edmonds v. Company of Watermen, 1 Jur. N. S. 727. Under section 28 of the Towns Police Clauses Act it is not necessary that the offender himself should be in the street: Reg. v. Thallman, 12 W. R. 88, 33 L. J. M. C. 58. But even if the words as to adjacent land are too wide, the rest of the bye-law is not invalidated by them; it is severable. The use of obscene language must be presumed to annoy the inhabitants, and it is unnecessary to specify this in the bye-law.

Crump, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question is whether this bye-law is valid or invalid. If it is valid there is no reason why we should disturb the conviction. Several points have been raised to induce us to think that the bye-law is bad. First, as to the objection that these bye-laws have not been confirmed by the Local Government Board: this is disposed of by looking at the section under which they are made. These are bye-laws for "good rule and government," and they come into force if they have been duly sent to the Secretary of State, and have not been disallowed by the Queen in Council within the prescribed period: the Local Government Board have nothing to do with them.

The serious point is whether this bye-law is bad as being unreasonable. It is said that it goes a great deal too far; and that is a formidable objection. The court has no sympathy with persons who sing obscene songs or use obscene language, but it is important to see that bye-laws such as these do not go beyond the powers of those who make them. They were made under section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which is incorporated in section 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888. I do not see that that section gives any power to make a new criminal offence. I do not mean that such bye-laws can do no more than reiterate the provisions of an Act of Parliament. If that were so they would be of very little use. But they must be within the authority under which they are made, and I have no hesitation in saying that this bye-law goes too far. The effect of the words "or on land adjacent thereto" is to make an extremely wide prohibition—far beyond what is necessary for good government. It would cover the case of a man using profane language in his own stable or in his house. Such a wide prohibition is tyranny, and I have no doubt that it is bad.

It does not, however, follow that the rest of the bye-law is bad. There is plenty of authority to show that a bye-law may be severed, and that one part may be bad and the rest good. This bye-law is severable. We may strike out the words "or on land adjacent thereto" and the bye-law will read, "No person shall in any street or public place sing or recite any profane or obscene song," &c. But, reading it in that way, there is not a word to show that it is to be construed so as to import the words "to the annoyance of the public." If we turn to public statutes dealing with the same subject-matter, such as the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, we find that the offence lies in using the objectionable language "to the annoyance of the residents or passengers." But under this bye-law it seems to me that a person might be convicted if he sang a bawdy song, although no one was near or could have been annoyed. I cannot agree with the argument that such words as "to the annoyance of the public" are to be implied. Such a bye-law as this goes far beyond what is reasonable for securing the good government of the county. It is unreasonable, and we must hold that the conviction was bad.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I have the strongest desire to uphold this conviction, for what the respondent did was to use obscene language on a public footpath in the presence of a number of people. But if we hold this bye-law to be good, it will form a precedent of a bye-law for good government all over the country, and it would be dangerous to have bye-laws so unrestricted as this. In Acts of Parliament dealing with such matters restrictions always accompany a provision of this kind. In places to which the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, applies there is no infringement of the Act of Parliament unless the language used is shown to be to the annoyance of the residents or passengers. Can it be right that a local authority to whom power is given to make bye-laws for good government should reject those restrictions and make a bye-law in such terms as those which we are considering? Under this bye-law a man would be guilty of an offence if he admitted having used profane language although no human being heard him. It is said that such words as "to the annoyance of the public" must be imported into this bye-law; but it seems to me, on the contrary, that anyone who was arguing to obtain a conviction under it would be entitled to say that it was clear, upon contrasting it with the language of the Act as to streets in towns, that the omission of words as to the annoyance of the public showed that the bye-law was intended to have a wider application than the statute. The restricting words are absent, and if the bye-law is to be read as if it applied only where members of the public are annoyed, it ought to say so, for a person charged is entitled to have the offence clearly stated in the bye-law under which he is charged.

I am impressed with the view that this bye-law ought not to be allowed to form a precedent, and I am brought to the conclusion that it is bad, not only because of the words "or on land adjacent thereto," but because it is not restricted to cases where the public is annoyed.

Divorce—Judicial separation—Alimony pendente lite—Application for injunction.

Where in a suit for judicial separation the wife obtained an order for alimony pendente lite, the court refused to grant an injunction restraining the husband from parting with his property.

Motion on behalf of the petitioner in a suit for judicial separation for an injunction restraining the respondent, the husband, from further dealing with certain leasehold property which he had sold, and for the appointment of a receiver of the proceeds of the sale.

On the 22nd of August the respondent entered an appearance to the suit. On the 22nd of October he filed his answer, and on the 26th of October an order was made on the respondent for the payment by him of alimony pendente lite at the rate of about £31 a year, with liberty to the petitioner to apply for an increase. Directly the order was made the respondent put up his leasehold property for sale, and the contract for sale was made on the 30th of October.

It was alleged by the petitioner that the respondent intended to leave the country. This he denied. The alimony had been paid up to date.

Rooth, for the petitioner, in support of the motion.—The court would make this order in such a case, where permanent alimony has been allowed: Sidney v. Sidney, 17 L. T. N. S. 9. Unless the injunction is granted now, the husband may dissipate his property, and the court will not be able to enforce any order it may make as to alimony, as in this case this is the only property the husband has: Noakes v. Noakes, 26 W. R. 284, 4 P. D. 60. In Newton v. Newton, 34 W. R. 123, 11 P. D. 11, no order had been made for alimony at all when the injunction was asked for; that distinguishes that case from this.

Barnard, for the respondent.—This being a suit for judicial separation, even if an order for permanent alimony had been made, this court could not order the husband to secure it. Certainly no security can be required for alimony pendente lite, and therefore the ground of the application for an injunction fails. This court follows the rules of the ecclesiastical court: Hyde v. Hyde, 13 W. R. 545, 4 Sw. & Tr. 80.

HENDERSON BROTHERS v. SHANKLAND & Co. (a.)

Ship — General average — Prior particular average damage—Constructive total loss—Amount of general average contribution—Deduction of one-third new for old.

A ship, after receiving a particular average damage, incurred a general average loss, and on arrival in port was condemned as a constructive total loss, and sold.

Held, that, in order to ascertain the amount to be contributed to by ship and cargo in general average, the value of the ship must be taken just before the general average sacrifice was made; that such value was to be arrived at by deducting the estimated cost of repairing the particular average damage from the value of the ship before that damage; and that from the value so ascertained the amount realized by the sale of the ship must be deducted, the balance being the amount to be contributed to in general average.

Held also, that, in estimating the cost of repairing the particular average damage in such a case, a deduction of one-third new for old could not be made.

Appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J., in favour of the plaintiffs at the trial of the action without a jury, reported in 1 Com. Cas. 252.

The action was for an order in regard to a sum of money paid by the plaintiffs into a bank in the joint names of the plaintiffs and defendants in respect of general average contribution.

The plaintiffs were the owners of cargo on board The Woodburn, a sailing ship belonging to the defendants.

The Woodburn, while on a voyage from Chittagong to Dundee with a cargo of jute, encountered a heavy storm, and suffered considerable damage, and, the ship being laid on her beam ends, in order to save both ship and cargo, her masts were cut away, and other general average sacrifices made.

The ship then put into Calcutta, when, upon examination, it was found that it would cost more to repair her than she would be worth when repaired. She was accordingly condemned as a constructive total loss, and sold for £883.

The question in the action was what was the amount to be contributed to in general average.

The value of the ship before the storm was £6,000. The estimated cost of repairing the general average sacrifice was £5,797, and the estimated cost of repairing the particular average damage by the storm was £3.429, making a total estimated cost of £9,226. The estimated cost of repairing the general average sacrifice was thus 63 per cent. of the total estimated cost.

The plaintiffs contended that the amount to be contributed to by ship and cargo in general average should be ascertained as follows:—Deduct £3,429, the estimated cost of repairing the particular average damage, from £6,000, the value of the ship, and the balance, £2,571, was the value of the ship which was in peril at the time the general average sacrifice was made. From this sum £883, the amount realized by the sale of the ship, must be deducted, leaving £1,688 as the amount to be contributed to by ship and cargo in general average.

The defendants contended that the proper method was to deduct the £883 from the £6,000, which left £5,117 as the total loss sustained by the ship. Of this sum 63 per cent. was attributable to the general average sacrifice, and the sum so ascertained was the amount to be contributed to in general average.

They also contended that, upon the plaintiffs' calculation, a deduction of one-third new for old should be made from the estimated cost of repairing the particular average damage.

Mathew, J., held that the plaintiffs' contention was correct, and directed the adjustment to be made on that principle.

The defendants appealed.

Bigham, Q.C., and Leck, for the defendants.—The true mode of ascertaining the amount to be replaced in general average is to take the difference between the sound value of the ship and the amount for which she sold, which gives the total loss to the shipowners, and 63 per cent. of that sum is attributable to the general average sacrifice. There was a conjoint loss caused partly by the storm and partly by the general average sacrifice, and 63 per cent. of that conjoint loss was caused by the voluntary sacrifice, and must be made good in general average. That was the value of the ship at the time she was saved by the general average sacrifice. If the plaintiffs' contention is correct, the estimated cost of repairing the particular average damage may be equal to or more than the original value of the ship, and then the ship must be taken to be of no value when the general average sacrifice was made, though she may sell for a considerable sum. Such a result shows that that contention cannot be correct.

They referred to Lowndes on General Average, 4th ed., p. 303.

T. E. Scrutton (Joseph Walton, Q.C., with him) for the plaintiffs.—To ascertain the amount to be made good in general average, the value of the ship must be taken just before the general average sacrifice. The practical way of settling that value is to deduct the cost of repairing the previous particular average damage from the sound value of the ship. That is the rule as stated in Arnould on Marine Insurance, 6th ed., p. 904. That is the practical working rule, which, though not mathematically accurate, has always been adopted. If the repairs were equal to or exceeded the value of the ship, then the ship would be of no value as a ship when the general average sacrifice was made, but would only be of value as a wreck. He referred on this point to Shepherd v. Kottgen, 26 W. R. 120, 2 C. P. D. 585. Next, a deduction of one-third new for old is never made when the repairs are not effected. Arnould on Marine Insurance, 1048, and Phillips on Insurance, 3rd ed., s. 1543, show that in estimating the repairs to see if the ship is a constructive total loss such a deduction is not made. That principle applies here.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—There has in this case been a general average sacrifice, and the question is, How is that general average sacrifice to be dealt with as between ship and cargo? I desire to abjure all figures, and to deal with the case, as the learned judge has done, apart from the figures. At the time when the ship sailed she was worth a certain sum. She encountered a severe storm, and sustained considerable damage therefrom. After she had sustained that damage the storm continued, and there was danger that the ship and cargo would be lost, the ship being on her beam ends, and the captain did something to save both ship and cargo. What he did was a general average sacrifice, and in respect of that general average sacrifice the shipowners were entitled to general average contribution.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The learned judge was asked to state what was the proper rule for adjusting the amount to be contributed to in general average. First of all the value of the ship has to be ascertained. At what time has that value to be ascertained? Is it the value of the ship at the commencement of the voyage, or at the beginning of the storm which caused the two sets of damage, or just before the general average sacrifice was made? It cannot be the value at the commencement of the voyage, because the ship might be damaged by two or three storms before the storm which gave rise to the general average sacrifice; she might have had to put into port to have the particular average damage repaired, and might thus have been considerably reduced in value. Nor, for somewhat similar reasons, can it be her value at the beginning of the particular storm. The true time for calculating her value is just before the general average sacrifice is made. That is what the learned judge held, and I therefore agree with him. Then comes the next question, How is the value of the ship at that time to be ascertained? The ship had sustained a particular average damage before that time. What is the practical mode of ascertaining her value? The ship on arrival at port may be repaired, or the repairs may not be made but merely estimated. Neither from the repairs actually done nor from the estimated cost of the repairs can the true theoretical value of the ship be ascertained. But to avoid a conflict of evidence on the question, to avoid calling surveyors on both sides as to her value, a practical working rule, which has been adopted and universally accepted, is to take the difference between the value of the ship before the storm and the estimated cost of the repairs necessary to restore her to her condition before that damage, and the difference between those two sums will be the value of the ship at the time when the general average sacrifice was made. That is the rule stated in Lowndes on General Average, 4th ed., 303, and was adopted by the learned judge in this case. It has been always used in general average adjustment cases, and is the general practice of merchants, and is therefore embodied in the law of England. It is then said that a deduction of one-third new for old must be made from the estimated cost of repairing the particular average damage. But in estimating the cost of the repairs as between shipowners and underwriters, so as to see if the ship is a constructive total loss, it seems that such a deduction should not be made. The reason for this, as stated by Phillips on Insurance, 3rd ed., s. 1543, rests upon the benefit derived from the repairs. But it is never allowed where the repairs have not been made. That rule is applicable to this case. The learned judge was therefore right in saying that such a deduction is not allowed where the repairs have not been made. There is a passage in Arnould on Marine Insurance, 6th ed., p. 1048, fortified by Phillips on Insurance, 3rd ed., s. 1543, and the judgment of Story, J., in Peele v. Merchants' Insurance Co., 3 Mason's Rep. 27, which, speaking of a constructive total loss, supports the view that in estimating the probable cost of repairs a deduction of one-third new for old should not be made.

The judgment of Mathew, J., was right upon both points, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question, in popular language, is, What did the shipowner lose by the general average sacrifice? To determine that, we must find out what he had at risk, what was the value of the ship at the time when that sacrifice was made. If the ship has been previously damaged by perils of the sea, her value would be her value before the particular average damage, less the sum necessary to repair that damage. To ascertain what the shipowner has lost by his general average sacrifice we must then deduct from the value so ascertained the amount for which the ship subsequently sold. That will give the amount to be made good by general average contribution. That is the principle upon which Mathew, J., stated that the adjustment must take place. It is said, however, that a deduction of one-third new for old must be made from the estimated cost of repairing the particular average damage. In my opinion that deduction cannot be made. The passage from Arnoulds on Marine Insurance, 6th ed., p. 1048, and Phillips on Insurance, s. 1543, seem to me to be authority against making such a deduction where the repairs have not been done. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In dealing with a general average sacrifice we must take the value of the ship at the time when the general average sacrifice is made. The main difficulty I have felt is how to ascertain the value of the ship at that time. It is impossible to ascertain it accurately. It must be estimated, and it involves a good deal of conjecture. Mathew, J., adopted this rule: Deduct the estimated cost of repairing the previous particular average damage caused by perils of the sea from the value of the ship before being so damaged, and that will give the value at the time when the general average sacrifice was made. I do not think that any general rule will do complete justice. It has been said that injustice might be done if we adopted such a rule. If, for instance, the particular average loss has swallowed up the whole value of the ship as a ship, the value at risk when the general average sacrifice was made might be reduced to nothing. But we must not be led away by such extreme cases from applying the practical working rule, otherwise expert witnesses would have to be called in each case to speak as to the value of the ship at that time. Then, as regards the deduction of one-third new for old from the cost of repairing the particular average damage, such a deduction is not allowed, as between shipowners and underwriters, in estimating the repairs so as to see if there has been a constructive total loss. In laying down a general rule we may as well follow the rule that is applicable to a constructive total loss. The general rule, even though it may in extreme cases reduce the value of the ship to nothing, seems to me to be a good general working rule.

Appeal dismissed.

Bankruptcy—Protected transaction—Bona fide dealing with bankrupt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 49.

The protection afforded by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to a bona fide transaction with a bankrupt entered into before the date of the receiving order extends to the case where the transaction in question constitutes the act of bankruptcy on which the receiving order was made.

Appeal from a judgment of Wright, J.

This was an interpleader issue. The plaintiff Shears was a cab proprietor, and on the 25th of May, 1895, he purchased for £300 the cabs and horses which formed the stock of a Mrs. Sills, who was also a cab proprietor. On the same day Mrs. Sills absconded. On the 27th of May the plaintiff removed the cabs and horses to a repository, where they were sold for £377. On the 20th of June a receiving order was made against Mrs. Sills, in which it was stated, as the acts of bankruptcy committed by the debtor, that she on the 25th of May, 1895, with intent to defeat or delay her creditors, departed from her dwelling-house, and on the same day made a fraudulent delivery or transfer of her property, or some part thereof, to the plaintiff. Mrs. Sills having been adjudicated bankrupt, the defendant, the trustee in bankruptcy, claimed the sum of £377, which the owner of the repository had retained. The owner of the repository interpleaded, and an interpleader issue was ordered to be tried. At the trial before Wright, J., without a jury, the learned judge found that the plaintiff had purchased the goods bona fide without knowledge that the bankrupt had any intention to defraud her creditors, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the transaction was protected by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The defendant appealed.

J. G. Witt, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the defendant.—Assuming that the plaintiff acted bona fide in this transaction, the transaction is not protected by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act. That section does not protect an act which is void in itself, it merely protects an act which is valid in itself from the effects of a foregoing act of bankruptcy. It therefore does not apply to an act which is itself an act of bankruptcy. Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1849 and the earlier Bankruptcy Acts it was expressly held that the corresponding sections did not protect an act which was void in itself as being an act of bankruptcy: Hall v. Wallace, 7 M. & W. 353; Smith v. Canman, 2 E. & B. 35. The only protection is from the effects of a foregoing act of bankruptcy. [RIGBY, L.J.—In the Act of 1849, s. 133, it is said that bona fide transactions are to be deemed valid, "notwithstanding any prior act of bankruptcy by such bankrupt committed." But there are no such words in the present Act.] The effect is the same. Section 49 speaks of "any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time."

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Duke, for the plaintiff, were not called upon to argue.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—It has been argued that in deciding this case we ought to have regard to what was held to be the law before the present Act was passed and to the general law of bankruptcy. But the law of bankruptcy is purely statutory, and it was after the decisions which are now relied on that the Legislature passed the present Act. It seems to me that if they had heard of those cases, they took care to prevent them from having any further effect; and the only question which we have to consider is—What is the law under the present statute, the Bankruptcy Act, 1883? Section 49 of that statute protects from the consequences of their acts persons who have innocently parted with their money in payment for an assignment of a bankrupt's goods, or who have innocently entered into any transaction with a bankrupt for valuable consideration. "Subject to the foregoing provisions of this Act with respect to the effect of bankruptcy on an execution or attachment, and with respect to the avoidance of certain settlements and preferences, nothing in this Act shall invalidate, in the case of a bankruptcy—(c) any conveyance or assignment by the bankrupt for valuable consideration; (d) any contract, dealing, or transaction by or with the bankrupt for valuable consideration, provided that both the following conditions are complied with, namely: (1) the conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, as the case may be, takes place before the date of the receiving order; and (2) the person (other than the debtor) to, by, or with whom the conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction was made, executed, or entered into, has not, at the time of the conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time." Is the present case within those words? The argument for the appellant seeks to insert a whole clause—"unless such dealing or transaction itself constitutes the act of bankruptcy." But we have no right to add such words; we must read the section as it stands. Here, according to the finding of the learned judge, Mr. Shears entered into a dealing with the bankrupt, Mrs. Sills, before the date of the receiving order, and at that time he had no notice or knowledge of any act of bankruptcy committed before that time. As a matter of fact no act of bankruptcy had been committed before that time. He therefore acted innocently, and he is within the words of the section, and it follows that he is protected by the section. I think that the Legislature in the present Act meant to include such a case as this, and I pay no regard to what may have been held under other Acts. The appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—With regard to the facts, the learned judge held that Mr. Shears had no knowledge of any intention on the part of Mrs. Sills to defeat her creditors. I think that he was justified in coming to that conclusion. It is, however, said that the case does not come within section 49. The argument is that the transaction, being itself the act of bankruptcy, is not protected. But, looking at the section, it seems to me clear that all its requirements were complied with in this case. It was a transaction for valuable consideration, it was before the date of the receiving order, and Mr. Shears had no notice of any act of bankruptcy committed previously. The transaction is therefore protected. Our attention was called to a case decided under the Act of 1849. But the words of that Act, "notwithstanding any prior act of bankruptcy," are different from those of the present Act, under which we must decide this case. It may well be that different language was used intentionally. I therefore think that the appeal fails.

RIGBY, L.J., concurred.

Solicitor — Costs — Taxation — Agreement—Retainer of costs—Settled account—Payment—Order for delivery of untaxable bill—Jurisdiction—The Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), ss. 37, 41—The Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), s. 8.

A settled account, though coupled with the retainer of agreed costs, is not payment as between solicitor and client unless a proper bill is delivered.

In re Thompson, 42 W. R. 462, [1894] 1 Q. B. 462, explained and corrected.

The court can order delivery of a bill whether or not it has jurisdiction to refer it for taxation when delivered.

The decision of the Privy Council in Duffett v. McEvoy, 10 App. Cas. 300, 33 W. R. Dig. 238, approved and followed.

Summons by a client against his solicitor for the delivery of bills of costs, and to have the same referred for taxation.

From 1883, when the client was an undergraduate at Oxford, down to 1894 the solicitor had been engaged in procuring him money loans.

It was verbally agreed that the solicitor's remuneration should be a percentage on the sums advanced in lieu of the usual scale charges, on account of the solicitor's special facilities for obtaining loans.

The solicitor retained such percentage out of the sums from time to time advanced, merely furnishing his client with cash accounts containing items of lump sums expressed to be for "costs," "agreed costs," or "on account of costs."

Such accounts were approved and signed by the client, and no proper bill of costs was ever delivered.

The loans were made at a reasonable rate of interest, and no charge of fraud or improper conduct was made against the solicitor.

Farwell, Q.C., and Sington, for the client.—We are primâ facie entitled to a bill.

Scrutton, for the solicitor.—No order can be made, and for the following reasons. First, retainer of costs coupled with the cash accounts which are settled accounts is payment within the Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 41, though no formal bill was delivered: In re Bignold, 9 Beav. 269; Turner v. Hand, 27 Beav. 561; In re David, 30 Beav. 278; Ex parte Hemming, 28 L. T. O. S. 144, 5 W. R. Dig. 141; In re Thompson, 42 W. R. 462, [1894] 1 Q. B. 462. The decision in In re Street, L. R. 10 Eq. 165, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 130, contra, was commented on in In re Hall and Barker, 26 W. R. 501, 9 Ch. D. 538. Secondly, the cash accounts are agreements within the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, s. 8: In re Frape, 41 W. R. 417, [1893] 2 Ch. 284; In re Thompson. Thirdly, a bill now delivered would be discharged by the previous payments: Hitchcock v. Stretton, 40 W. R. 555, [1892] 2 Ch. 343—that is to say, discharged more than a year ago. It could not, therefore, be referred for taxation under the Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 41, and by section 37 power to order delivery is limited to cases in which there is power to tax.

Farwell, Q.C., in reply.—First, retainer is not payment unless a bill has been delivered: In re Street; In re Stogdon, 56 L. J. Ch. 420, 35 W. R. Dig. 60; In re West, King, and Adams, 40 W. R. 644, [1892] 2 Q. B. 102. The report of In re Thompson in the Law Reports is wrong. The Law Journal report, 63 L. J. Q. B. 187, shows that a proper bill was delivered. Secondly, the alleged agreements must be taxed to see that they are reasonable: In re Frape. Thirdly, the power to order delivery is not merely ancillary to or limited by the power to tax: Duffett v. McEvoy, 10 App. Cas. 300, 33 W. R. Dig. 238; In re West, King, and Adams.

CHITTY, J.—This is an application by a client for the delivery of formal bills of costs by his solicitor, and for taxation of those bills. The solicitor acted for the client from 1883 to 1894, a period of ten or eleven years. The application was made in January, 1895. It cannot be questioned on the facts that no bill of costs was ever delivered. By bill of costs I mean what the Solicitors Act, 1843, says—viz., a bill of fees, charges, and disbursements. I entirely dissent from the argument that there are two kinds of solicitors' bills. There is only one, as is shown by numerous authorities. In the present case accounts have from time to time been made out by the solicitor and delivered to the client. If these accounts had been between a tradesman and his customer, they might, as to many of them, be properly taken to be settled accounts. I need hardly go into the question of what a settled account is. The common law called it an account stated. An account may be stated between ordinary persons, and where items on both sides are shown the statement may, and generally does, result in a payment at law. I mean that it results not only in payment of the balance actually paid, but in payment of the whole account.

It is argued that the same principle applies as between solicitor and client—viz., that a settled account amounts to payment of a bill. I decline to travel over the cases for the third or fourth time. I followed In re Street in In re Stogdon. Counsel for the solicitor has pointed out that Jessel, M.R., made some observations on In re Street in In re Hall and Barker, but those observations were addressed to another part of the case—viz., whether the bills were to be treated as one bill or separate bills. I have already, in In re Stogdon, expressed my opinion as to the true explanation of Ex parte Hemming, and Stirling, J., has adopted my explanation in Hitchcock v. Stretton. I am sorry to have to refer to it again, but the explanation is that in Ex parte Hemming a proper bill was substantially delivered. There is no authority for the proposition that a mere settled account, where no proper bill has been delivered, is payment within the statute of 1843. Perhaps it may be useful to observe that since the recent Act of 1881 on the subject there may be a true bill delivered in particular cases, as, for instance, where the scale applies, the bill merely stating one scale item. There may also be a bill within the Act of 1881 referring to costs as agreed. In considering that statute I am brought face to face with the enactment in section 8, that the bill delivered is not conclusive against the client. The agreement is one of which the fairness and reasonableness may be questioned. In In re Frape the Court of Appeal took that view, and Lindley, L.J., observed that it was impossible to decide whether the agreement was unfair or unreasonable without taxation. I add that it is impossible to say anything at all on the subject until a proper bill for fees, charges, and disbursements has been delivered to the client. Till then the court is not in a position to say whether the agreement is fair or the charges reasonable. There is, of course, nothing to prevent a person sui juris settling an account if he likes after a proper bill has been delivered.

(a.) Reported by G. ROWLAND ALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Counsel for the solicitor argued that I had no jurisdiction to order a bill to be delivered unless I could also order taxation. He said there could be no taxation where there had been payment. I reply, there has been no payment of any bill. Many of the so-called accounts merely contain the words "costs," "agreed costs," or "on account of costs." The question of jurisdiction falls to the ground, and cannot be maintained as a general proposition. There is a case in the Privy Council which I consider to have been well decided, and follow without reluctance. I refer to Duffett v. McEvoy. The judgment turned on a colonial statute, but it was founded on an examination of the meaning of section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, and it consists in showing that the colonial Act was the same as the English Act, the lengthy section 37 being split up into several sections. With regard to the Solicitors Act, 1843, Lord Blackburn says that the provision in section 37, authorizing courts and judges to order bills to be delivered in the same cases where they are authorized to refer bills, does not mean that no bill shall be ordered to be delivered until it is ascertained to be taxable. He also says, if there has never been a bill at all, a bill can be ordered to be delivered without an order for taxation necessarily following. The result of that case is that the court can order delivery of a bill whether or not it has jurisdiction to refer it for taxation.

Now, the solicitor in this case sets up an oral agreement—viz., that in regard to the raising of loans for the client there should be a uniform charge of 5 per cent. on the amount. An oral agreement, however, is not within the statute of 1881. But here and there in the fourteen documents called "settled accounts" there are references to agreed costs, and counsel for the solicitor argued that by examining the amounts charged for costs I could ascertain that the charge was 5 per cent. on the loan business. I am not sure that that is made out. I do not propose to prejudice that question. There is a notable difference between the total amount charged and the scale charges. I have a tabular statement showing that the total amount deducted for costs was £3,178, whereas the scale fee was £589. The difference is £2,600. But the tabular statement does not exhaust the matter. The solicitor transacted other business besides loans, as to which no oral agreement is alleged. I do not intend to express any final opinion, but I must observe that the 5 per cent., having regard to the sums raised, is largely in excess of the scale fee. Perhaps it can be justified, but primâ facie a case of serious overcharge appears on the loan transactions. They were loans to raise money for a young man at Oxford just after attaining twenty-one. The loans went on as he grew older. Though he began without a consummate knowledge of the law of costs, knowledge which is hardly to be expected in an Oxford undergraduate, he gained experience later on. The later loans were made for the purpose of repaying the former loans.

On the question of fairness it is to be noted that the young man was in a position to give, and did give, security. The solicitor got him out of financial troubles. No charge of fraud is or can be made against the solicitor.

I must mention one authority which at first sight seems to support the argument that there can be payment of a bill where no proper bill has been delivered, but only a cash account. In In re Thompson, the judgments speak of the delivery of a bill of costs. From the report of the facts in the Law Reports, it is not easy to make out what document the judges are referring to as a bill of costs. It is evident that there is something omitted in the Law Reports, for it appears by the Law Journal report (63 L. J. Q. B. 187) that there was an order for the delivery of a bill of costs, and delivery of a bill in pursuance of such order. By some slip that bill is not mentioned in the Law Reports, and counsel was enabled to argue that the cash account delivered in that case was a sufficient bill. Counsel urged the lapse of time as a bar to this application, but rightly admitted that no statute of limitations applied. He appealed to the court to exercise its discretion by refusing to make the order. If the matter is one of discretion, the court looks at the circumstances. But, on the correspondence, the solicitor says he is quite ready to deliver a bill, so I am not putting on him a task too hard of performance. I order a bill to be delivered and taxed. I hold there has been no payment, so that section 41 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, preventing taxation after a year, does not apply. Though the solicitor may show before the taxing master that some of the agreements were fair and reasonable, I send it to the taxing master to inquire.

Usual order for delivery of bills of fees, charges, and disbursements and for taxation thereof, with a direction to the taxing master to certify whether any and what agreements within the Act of 1881 have been entered into between the solicitor and his client, and, if so, whether any and which of such agreements are or are not fair and reasonable. Costs reserved. Solicitor to have two months for delivery of his bills.

Leave to appeal was asked for and refused, but it was subsequently granted by the Court of Appeal.

county court action was dismissed with costs. The costs in the county court were taxed at the sum of £48. This was a motion on behalf of the defendants for a stay of execution under the order made by Chitty, J., on the 15th of November, 1895, until the plaintiff had paid the county court costs to the applicants or until further order, but the object was to obtain a set-off of the costs of the unsuccessful application before Chitty, J., and the costs of the county court proceedings under ord. 65, r. 14, and r. 27, reg. 21. See Annual Practice, 1896, pp. 1149, 1166.

The court having refused this motion, was thereupon asked to allow a set-off of the costs of the motion and the costs of the county court action.

Russell Roberts, for the applicants.—A set-off may be allowed, under ord. 65, r. 14, and r. 27, reg. 21, of the costs of the application for a certiorari which we were ordered by your lordship to pay to the plaintiff against the costs of the county court action, which the plaintiff was ordered to pay to us, notwithstanding his solicitor's lien on the costs recovered by him. It is a question for the court's discretion, and, unless the discretion is exercised in our favour, we shall not get the costs awarded to us by the county court. He cited Robarts v. Buée, 26 W. R. 393, 8 Ch. D. 198; Knapman v. Wreford, 18 Ch. 300, 29 W. R. Dig. 3; In re Glanvill, Ellis v. Johnson, 34 W. R. 309, 31 Ch. D. 532; In re Crawshay, Dennis v. Crawshay, 45 Ch. D. 318, 39 W. R. Dig. 160.

Badcock, for the plaintiff.—Barker v. Hemming, 28 W. R. 764, 5 Q. B. D. 609, decided under the practice before 1883, shows that ord. 65, r. 27, reg. 21 will not apply where the set-off is of the costs of different proceedings. The application is out of time. It should have been made when the application for a certiorari was dismissed with costs: Automatic Weighing Machine Co. v. Combined Weighing, &c., Co., 37 W. R. 636. Moreover, the case of distinct and different proceedings does not come within ord. 65, r. 14, as was decided by the Divisional Court in Edwards v. Hope, 33 W. R. 672, 14 Q. B. D. 922, followed in Blakey v. Latham, 37 W. R. 569, 41 Ch. D. 518, and compare the bankruptcy cases of Ex parte Griffin, Re Adams (No. 2), 28 W. R. 714, 14 Ch. D. 37, and In re Bassett, Ex parte Lewis, ante, p. 240, [1896] 1 Q. B. 219. But if the court has a discretion here under this rule, the solicitor's lien ought to prevail.

Russell Roberts replied.

CHITTY, J.—The defendants did not ask at the hearing that the payment of the costs, which they were ordered to pay, of their unsuccessful application for a certiorari might be delayed till after the trial of the county court action, and the order stands as an order to pay the amount of the taxed costs. On that order the plaintiff had a present right to those costs, and his solicitor had a lien on them for his costs of the county court action. The lien was for an amount exceeding the costs recovered in the High Court. The costs in the High Court would be taxed by the taxing master, those in the county court by the registrar of the county court. The costs would be taxable under different jurisdictions and different allocaturs, and, I think, that being so, that ord. 65, r. 27, reg. 21, does not apply.

Ord 65, r. 14, on the authorities gives the court a discretion of allowing a set-off notwithstanding the solicitor's lien. Now, does that rule apply to distinct and different proceedings? The Divisional Court have held that it does not, and also exercised their discretion in favour of the solicitor, and the Court of Appeal did not interfere with the decision, and approved the court's exercise of its discretion: see Edwards v. Hope, which was followed by Kay, L.J. (then Kay, J.), in Blakey v. Latham. I am not bound to say whether costs in the High Court can be set off against costs in the county court under the rule, the proceedings being entirely distinct. If the Divisional Court was right in Edwards v. Hope, I think that the rule does not apply in such a case, but I am not deciding the point. There is some connection between the different proceedings here, and I assume that the case is within ord. 65, r. 14, and I have to exercise my discretion. I ask why I should exercise it against the solicitor, as I see no grounds for so doing. He has fairly earned the money in respect of which the lien arose. I accordingly dismiss the motion.

Russell Roberts.—Will your lordship order a set-off of the costs of this motion and the costs of the county court action?

CHITTY, J.—I must must not shelter myself behind the discretion conferred by the rule from deciding the point of principle which is now clearly raised. I hold that the principle adopted by the Divisional Court and Kay, L.J., applies to this case, and that it is not within ord. 65, r. 14. I therefore refuse to make any order for a set-off.

Application dismissed.

Inland revenue — Estate duty — Voluntary covenant to pay money on death of covenantor—Liability of estate of covenantor—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2, 6, 7, 8, 9.

A testator who died after the Finance Act, 1894, came into operation had covenanted to pay, within six months of his decease, a sum of money to the trustees of his son's marriage settlement.

Held, that under the Finance Act, 1894, estate duty was payable upon the sum covenanted to be paid, and that such duty should be borne, not by the covenantees, but by the testator's residuary estate; for the covenant, although a debt for all other purposes, was not a debt which, under section 7 of the Finance Act, could be deducted in ascertaining the estate duty; and the covenantees being creditors were not persons taking under the will within the meaning of section 9.

Adjourned summons.

Upon the marriage of his son, in 1891, the testator covenanted with the trustees of the son's settlement that his executors or administrators would, within six months after his decease, pay to the trustees of the settlement the sum of £25,000.

The testator died in February, 1895, and estate duty was paid upon the £25,000 by the executors.

This summons was taken out to determine whether the trustees of the settlement were liable to repay to the executors the amount of estate duty so paid.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Marcy, for the executors.—Succession duty would have been payable before 1894, and it is only fair and reasonable that the trustees of the settlement should pay estate duty.

[NORTH, J.—I have nothing to do with what is fair and reasonable, but am only concerned with the provisions of the Act.] Attorney-General v. Montefiore, 37 W. R. 237, 21 Q. B. D. 461, and In re Higgins, 34 W. R. 81, 31 Ch. D. 142, show that succession duty would have been payable. In re Croft, Deane v. Croft, 40 W. R. 425, [1892] 1 Ch. 652, and In re Orford, ante, p. 383, [1896] 1 Ch. 257, show that the whole of the estate duty should not be borne by the estate of the covenantor.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., B. Farrer, and A. R. Kirby, for other parties.

NORTH, J.—The trustees are entitled to £25,000, and to have it paid without deduction. The Crown is entitled to receive duty, and has received it from the executors. Here the trustees of the settlement are creditors in respect of the covenant, and they are in the fortunate and unusual position of escaping payment of duty under the Succession Duty Act. The Finance Act, 1894, imposes new duties similar in some respects to those previously existing. Under section 1 the duties are to be levied and paid on all property passing on death. Section 2 defines property passing on death, and section 6 provides for the collection and recovery of estate duty, which is to be paid by the executors by sub-section 2. The duty is levied on the estate after payment of funeral and testamentary expenses and debts. This £25,000 is a debt. By section 7, however, allowance is only to be made for a debt or incumbrance created by the deceased for full consideration in money or money's worth for his own benefit; so this £25,000 cannot be deducted. Section 8, sub-sections 3 and 4, provides for the executor's affidavit and accounts. Section 9 does not apply, for it provides for the way in which duty is to be borne by persons taking under the will, and not by persons taking as creditors of the estate. This is a debt which cannot be excluded in ascertaining the estate duty payable to the Crown, but is a debt for all other purposes. The trustees are creditors for the £25,000, and cannot be charged with duty.

Custom—Games—Claim for inhabitants of adjoining parishes.

The inhabitants of more than one parish cannot claim by custom a right of recreation on land situate in one of the parishes.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, who was in possession of a piece of land in the parish of Beddington, Surrey, against the defendants, inhabitants of the parish, to restrain a trespass on the said land.

The defendants claimed, on behalf of themselves and all the inhabitants for the time being of the said parish and of two adjoining parishes, that the land had from time immemorial been an open piece of common land, and that there had been and still was an ancient custom in the said parish of Beddington for all the inhabitants for the time being of the said parish and of two adjoining parishes to use the same for recreation and for exercising and playing all lawful games, sports, and pastimes upon the said piece of land, and that for such purposes the said inhabitants were entitled to access to the said piece of land.

Warmington, Q.C., and W. Clode, for the plaintiff. —A custom for the inhabitants of several parishes to exercise the right of recreation on land in one of the parishes is bad in law: Gateward's case, 6 Rep. 59*b*; Hammerton v. Honey, 24 W. R. 603.

Johnston Edwards and W. P. Baildon, for the defendants.—The custom is good: Hall v. Nottingham, 24 W. R. 58, 1 Ex. D. 1; Fitch v. Rawling, 2 H. Bl. 393; Bourke v. Davis, 38 W. R. 167, 44 Ch. D. 110; Earl of Coventry v. Wilkes, 12 W. R. 127, 9 L. T. N. S. 384.

KEKEWICH, J.—I assume that the right alleged is in itself good in law. But is it properly claimed for all the inhabitants for the time being of the parish and of the adjoining or contiguous parishes of Carshalton and Mitcham? Though there is no authority exactly deciding it, all the cases directly point to such an allegation being bad, and I think I ought to consider the point settled. The defendants rely on Fitch v. Rawling, where the court held that an ancient and laudable custom that all the inhabitants for the time being of a parish used and were accustomed to have and still ought to have of playing lawful games upon a close every year was good, but the court also held that a claim for all persons for the time being in the parish was bad. It is therefore clear that a custom beyond all the inhabitants of the parish may be bad. But it is suggested that the custom is good if confined to inhabitants of a particular district, which term may be taken as meaning two or three adjoining parishes in addition to the parish in which the land is situate. I cannot assent to that view. I cannot find in any of the cases anything which would justify me in saying that the use of the word "district" means more than the particular division known to the law in which the particular property is situate. It might be situate in a parish or a manor or some other division. But I am unable to see how a number of parishes can, without specific evidence, be said to be situated in a particular district so that land in one of the parishes is land in a particular district. There must, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff.

Employers and workmen — Apprentice — Compensation for injuries — "Estimated earnings" — Mode of calculating in case of apprentice — Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 3.

An apprentice, when suing his employer under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, for personal injuries, cannot recover, under section 3 of the Act, more than for three years of the wages he is receiving as an apprentice, and in such case the value of the tuition he receives ought not to be included as part of his "earnings" within the meaning of that section for the purpose of increasing the compensation to which he would otherwise be entitled.

Appeal by the defendant company from a judgment of his honour Judge Granger, sitting at the Redruth County Court, in the county of Cornwall.

(a.) Reported by F. T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for a sum of £80, in an action brought by the plaintiff, through his next friend, under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the defendants, his employers.

The plaintiff was a boy about eighteen years of age at the time when the injuries were received. The boy was, when he was about fourteen years of age, apprenticed to the defendants at their foundry works at Redruth. There were no articles of apprenticeship, but the arrangement was a verbal one, and under this arrangement the boy was to be apprenticed according to the customary mode for the usual period of five years—from the age of fourteen to the age of nineteen years—and this apprenticeship began about April, 1891.

He was to receive 1s. a week for the first year, 2s. a week for the second year, 3s. a week for the third year, and so on, increasing by 1s. a week for each year.

At the time he received the injuries now sued for he had entered upon the fifth year of his apprenticeship, and was receiving 5s. a week as his wages; but he was still in a state of pupilage.

On the 29th of May, 1895, the plaintiff was working in the fitting shop where he was generally employed; he was boring holes in a bar of iron with a drill, and while so engaged his fingers were caught in the cog-wheels while he was putting the handle back to throw the machine out of gear. His fingers were greatly crushed, and parts of them had to be amputated.

He then brought this action to recover from his employers £107 for the injuries so received.

The judge found that there was a defect in the machine which had not been remedied, owing to the negligence of a person entrusted with the duty of seeing that the machinery in the fitting shop was in a proper condition, and he found in favour of the plaintiff.

As to the question of damages, the judge thought it an extremely difficult one; that by section 3 the compensation was to be estimated by the average of the plaintiff's earnings, but that it would be a farce to hold that the plaintiff in this case should only be compensated according to the nominal wages of 5s. a week which he was then getting. He therefore held that he must take into consideration the question of what a lad of his qualifications would earn if he were to get work in the district, and that the evidence showed that he would get about 14s. to 18s. a week, and he thought that for the serious injuries received he ought to award the plaintiff £80, which he accordingly did.

During the hearing of the case the engineer, in his evidence, stated that "after a young man like the plaintiff gets out of his pupilage he would get 14s. to 18s."

The defendants appealed.

Section 3 of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), provides: "The amount of compensation recoverable under this Act shall not exceed such sum as may be found to be equivalent to the estimated earnings during the three years preceding the injury of a person in the same grade, employed during those years in the like employment and in the district in which the workman is employed at the time of the injury."

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (Ellis Hill with him), for the appellants.—The point raised on this appeal upon the construction of section 3 of the Employers' Liability Act is not covered by any authority. The sole question now raised is as to the proper measure of damages which an apprentice can recover under section 3. There is a fixed standard of damages laid down by the section; but the county court judge has rejected that standard, and in awarding damages here he has awarded them on a different scale from that laid down in the Act. By the section the compensation is not to exceed the equivalent of the estimated earnings during the three years preceding the injury of a person in the same grade, employed in the same employment in the district. Applying that to this case, the plaintiff at the time of the accident was receiving 5s. a week, and we say that the very utmost he would have been entitled to would have been at the rate of 5s. a week for three years, or 156 weeks—that is, in all, £39. He would only be entitled to that £39 on the assumption that, upon the true construction of the section, he would be entitled to have this 5s. a week taken as his estimated earnings for the three preceding years. But in the year preceding the injury he was receiving only 4s. a week, and so on; so that if we take as his "estimated earnings" what he actually received during the three years, it would amount to much less than £39. However, for this case we are willing to concede that the plaintiff is entitled to this sum of £39; but the judge has given £80, which, we contend, he cannot do under the Act. Section 3 of the Act lays down the mode in which compensation is to be awarded, and that mode must be followed, and no other. This statute was intended to apply to workmen in the usual meaning. If the plaintiff in this case is a workman, he is a workman at low wages, and those wages must be taken to be the wages he is receiving, and to be the proper basis of compensation. If he is not a workman, then the Act does not apply at all.

(He was stopped.)

Bosanquet, Q.C. (J. A. Hawke, with him), for the respondent.—The question is not what the plaintiff or men in the position of the plaintiff might have been earning during the three years; we have to look at the grade of the plaintiff at the time of the accident and at his position then, and the evidence showed that after a young man like the plaintiff gets out of his apprenticeship he would get from 14s. to 18s. a week. By the section we have to take the estimated earnings of a person in the same grade in the like employment in that district; that means that we are to take as the basis the wages which represent the average earnings in that trade and in that district. The judge has simply taken that into account, and that is all he has taken into account. The apprentice here was still in his apprenticeship; he was therefore receiving, in addition to the 5s. a week in money, his training and tuition, and this training has to be taken into account in estimating what his wages were. He was receiving so much in money and so much money's worth in teaching, so that his salary was not confined to the 5s. a week, but included in addition a sum which would represent the value of the teaching he was receiving. If that be so, the judge had power to go beyond the 5s. a week, and to give judgment for the amount for which he did give judgment.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., in reply.

WILLS, J.—With regret I come to the conclusion that this judgment must be reduced. One is very sorry to cut down anything in the case of an accident so serious as this, but we are bound by the Act of Parliament. [The learned judge read section 3.] Now, the evidence here was that this boy at the time when this injury was received was earning 5s. a week, and he was earning it in a state which was described as one of pupilage. He was a pupil fitter, and the inference from the facts is that 5s. a week is the normal wage of a pupil fitter. There was no evidence to qualify that, as the only evidence given which would go to increase that sum was the statement of the engineer that a young man when out of his pupilage could get from 14s. to 18s. a week. He would then be out of his pupilage, and he could not get that 14s. a week without going through this pupilage. It is clear that if he could get 14s. a week elsewhere, he would not stay at these works for 5s. Therefore he was in the "grade" of a pupil fitter, and he could not get more than 5s. a week. That being so, he cannot get beyond the £39, which Mr. Walton has now expressed his willingness to accede to.

But upon the question of the "estimated earnings" of the plaintiff, I cannot altogether accede to the view that Mr. Walton for the appellants was willing to accede to in this case. He said he was willing to take it that the "estimated earnings" might be calculated on the basis of the 5s. which the plaintiff was receiving at the time of the injury. But I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of the view that you are to take the average of the person's earnings, or rather the average of the earnings in the like employment in the district for the three years preceding the injury. It is, however, unnecessary to decide that point, as it has been conceded for the purposes of this case. Then it was argued by the counsel for the respondent that the word "earnings" includes tuition. I cannot think that anything so vague was intended by the Act to be taken into account. It is impossible to ascertain the pecuniary value of the tuition, and I cannot think that the word "earnings" was intended to include the money, and in addition the value of the tuition. It would, no doubt, include such things as food, clothing, lodging, or the like, but I think it would not include tuition.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the limit which the plaintiff can recover here cannot exceed the three years, or 156 weeks' wages of a pupil fitter. I agree that "earnings" means money, or food, or clothes, or the like.

Judgment reduced to £39; leave to the plaintiff to appeal upon terms as to costs.

COOK v. WHITE. (a.)

Adulteration — Food — False warranty — Summons — Time for serving summons—Purchase for test purposes —Food and Drugs Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30), s. 10.

That part of section 10 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1879, which provides that in the case of the sale of a perishable article the summons shall be served within twenty-eight days of the purchase for test purposes, does not apply where the purchase for test purposes was not made from the person charged with the offence.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

Section 25 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, provides that if any person charged under section 6 shall prove that he purchased the article in question as the same in nature, substance, and quality as that demanded of him by the prosecutor, and with a written warranty to that effect, &c., he shall be discharged from the prosecution; and section 27 provides for the punishment of persons giving a false warranty in writing.

Section 10 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1879, provides, inter alia, as follows: "In all prosecutions under the principal Act, and notwithstanding the provisions of section 20 of the said Act, the summons to appear before the magistrates shall be served upon the person charged with violating the provisions of the said Act within a reasonable time, and, in the case of a perishable article, not exceeding twenty-eight days from the time of the purchase from such person for test purposes of the food or drug for the sale of which in contravention to the principal Act the seller is rendered liable to prosecution."

On the 28th of April, 1895, milk was purchased from Lilley & Brown, trading as M. A. Brown & Sons, for the purpose of analysis. The certificate of the analyst stated that the milk contained 7 per cent. of added water, and a summons was issued.

At the hearing of the summons, on the 26th of May, Lilley & Brown proved to the satisfaction of the court that they bought the milk in the same state as they sold it, with a written warranty from White, and the summons was accordingly dismissed.

A summons under section 27 was then taken out against White for giving a false warranty. The summons was not served till the 27th of May.

The magistrate dismissed the second summons on the ground that, milk being a perishable article, the summons ought to have been served within twenty-eight days of the purchase for test purposes.

Macmorran, Q.C., for the appellant.—The latter part of the section does not apply where the purchase for test purposes is not made from the person charged with the offence.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The magistrate was wrong. The words "such person" in the latter part of the section refer to the person who is charged, that is to say, in the present case, to White.

There has been no sale by White for test purposes. It is difficult to see how that part of the section can apply to prosecutions of this kind. It might apply if the purchase from the original vendor were made for test purposes. But where that is not the case it cannot apply. There might be no sale by the second vendor for a considerable time after the sale by the original vendor.

Under the circumstances the summons seems to have been served within a reasonable time.

KAY, L.J., after stating the facts, proceeded:—The question is whether the summons against the warrantor, the respondent in this case, ought to have been served within twenty-eight days. The construction urged for the respondent before the magistrate would lead to an absurdity, because the warrantor might have sold the milk with the warranty more than twenty-eight days before the sale by the retail dealer, in which case it would be impossible to take out a summons against the warrantor within twenty-eight days. I do not think that is the meaning of the Act. The section means that, where a summons is taken out against the person from whom a perishable article of food was purchased for test purposes, it must be served within twenty-eight days. If such purchase for test purposes is made from the warrantor then the summons must be taken out and served on him within twenty-eight days. But if there is no purchase for test purposes from him, then the summons must be served within a reasonable time.

In this case I think the summons was served within a reasonable time. Therefore the appeal must be allowed, and the case sent back to the magistrate to hear and determine.

CLIFTON COLLEGE (Appellants) v. THOMPSON, SURVEYOR OF TAXES (Respondent), AND GOVERNING BODY OF CHARTERHOUSE SCHOOL (Appellants) v. GAYLER, SURVEYOR OF TAXES (Respondent). (a.)

*Inland revenue—Inhabited house duty—Public school—Head master's house—School buildings—Chapel, library, &c.—Mode of assessment—*43 Geo. 3, c. 55, Schedule B—14 & 15 Vict. c. 36.

In the Clifton College case an assessment was made of £1,978 upon the college in respect of inhabited house duty. The buildings assessed comprised the school itself, the head master's house, the chapel, library, sanatorium, gymnasium, racquet courts, fives courts, swimming baths, carpenter's shops, museum, garden, and playground, all of which were within one boundary. The head master held his house under a lease subject to his continuing to hold that post; he resided there himself, together with sixty-seven boarders; he paid no rent. With the exception of the sanatorium, no one slept in any of the other buildings.

Held, that the head master was the occupier of his dwelling-house, and was taxable in respect of such occupation with inhabited house duty. He did not, however, in any sense occupy the various other buildings; there was nothing to show that they belonged to or were occupied with his dwelling-house, and they could not be themselves treated as dwelling-houses.

In the Charterhouse case an assessment of £3,000 for inhabited house duty was made upon the governing body of the school. The buildings assessed were the head master's house (the head master was bound by the school statutes to reside in the house, he paid no rent, and to okin sixty boys as boarders), two assistant masters' houses (these masters paid rent and took in boys as boarders), the chapel, hall, library, classrooms, laundry, science rooms, museum and theatre, carpenter's shop, drawing school, sanatoriums, swimming baths, racquet courts, lodges, and other buildings.

Held, that the head master and assistant masters ought to be treated as the occupiers of their houses respectively. They occupied the houses for their own profit, and not merely as representatives of the school or the governors, and they were therefore assessable to the inhabited house duty. The governing body were not assessable for the other premises, as, with the exception of the sanatoriums, they were not inhabited dwelling-houses taken by themselves.

CLIFTON COLLEGE (Appellants) v. THOMPSON, SURVEYOR OF TAXES (Respondent).

Case stated for the opinion of the court pursuant to the Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 59).

This was an appeal by Clifton College from a decision of the Inland Revenue Commissioners confirming an assessment of £1,978 for the year ending the 5th of April, 1894, under inhabited house duty upon the said college. The description in the assessment of the property assessed was "college, sanatorium, land and buildings, house and stable."

The foundation of Clifton College, where some 600 boys are educated, consists of a charter bearing date the 16th of March, 1877.

The buildings assessed comprised the school itself, the head master's house and offices, in which the head master and his family resided and sixty-seven boys were boarded, a chapel, library, sanatorium, gymnasium, racquet courts, fives courts, swimming baths, carpenters' shops, museum, and other buildings, and eleven acres of garden and playground, all within one boundary.

The head master's house was not joined to the other buildings. With the exception of the head master's house and the sanatorium, no one slept or resided upon or otherwise used any of the school buildings during the night time, and they were used during the daytime alike by all the boys at the college, whether boarders or day boys.

The surveyor of taxes contended that the whole of these buildings, with the offices, yards, and one acre of the garden and playground, were chargeable with inhabited house duty under the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, as an inhabited dwelling-house.

The appellants contended that the school premises, except the head master's house, were exempt from the exemption in the Inhabited House Duty Act, 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, Schedule B, Case 4: "Any hospital, charity, school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons"; and, further, that the last-named Act was an Act to charge dwelling-houses and buildings in connection therewith required for the purposes of the inhabitants of the dwelling-house, and did not include the buildings described as above forming part of the school premises; and, further, that no profit arising from the college was payable to any individual person, but any profit that was made was used for the improvement and advancement of the college and its interests.

The question for thhe opinion of the court was whether the aforesaid school buildings were liable to the inhabited house duty or not.

Cohen, Q.C. (A. T. Lawrence with him), for the appellants.—In the schedule to the assessment the college is distinguished from the head master's house, the description of property being in the one case "college, sanatorium, land, and buildings" occupiers "Clifton College," and in the other case "head master's house," the occupier being described as "the head master." A lease of this house for fourteen years was granted to the head master, provided he should so long continue head master. The master's house should be assessed separately, because he is described as the occupier. The college cannot be assessed in respect of the various buildings, and the head master's house under rule 1 of Schedule B of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55. The other buildings, do not come within rule 2. It cannot be said that they "belong to and are occupied with" the head master's dwelling-house. They are not dwelling-houses at all. Cheape v. Kinmont, 2 Tax Cas. 418, does not apply to this case. The head master is occupier for the time being, and has an exclusive right of possession. [The court here called on the other side.]

Sir R. Finlay, S.G. (Danckwerts and Lord R. Cecil with him), for the respondent.—The head master occupies the house ex officio, and his occupation comes under rule 1. Practically the master must reside there. The house is vested in the company, and is held for the general purposes of the college. The college is rightly assessed in respect of the master's house, and the whole premises are to be assessed, because the boys who reside in the master's house use all the different parts of the establishment, and therefore the whole establishment must be regarded as one. These other buildings are assessable, if, in fact, they are used for purposes which entirely fall within the terms of the Act. There are two cases on this point—one, The Corporation of Glasgow v. Inland Revenue, 18 Sc. L. R., p. 1, in favour of the contention; the other, Riley v. Read, 27 W. R. 414, 4 Ex. D. 100, 1 Tax Cas. 217, against it. The principle laid down in the latter case by Kelly, C.B., cannot be sustained. Sections 1 and 2 of 57 Geo. 3, c. 25, show that houses used solely for purposes of trade were assessable as inhabited dwelling-houses under 48 Geo. 3, c. 55. The expression "inhabited dwelling-houses" is not confined to houses which are used otherwise than for the purposes of business. The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 15), provides by section 13, sub-section 2, for the exemption of houses occupied solely for business, even though a caretaker should dwell therein. The Legislature therefore regarded such houses as being within the Act as inhabited dwelling-houses, but provided for their being taken out upon proof of certain things. [WRIGHT, J.—Is not the case of the London Library v. Carter, 2 Tax Cas. 594, against you?] In that case the building was merely for the purpose of recreation. In the present case we have various buildings which could not exist separately. The inhabitancy must be taken as a whole. Riley v. Read does not govern this case. These buildings come within rule 5. The head master's house and the other buildings are used for a common purpose: Lambton v. Kerr, 43 W. R. 541, [1895] 2 Q. B. 233, see judgment of Charles, J.

WRIGHT, J.—Before giving judgment we wish to hear the arguments in the Charterhouse case.

GOVERNING BODY OF CHARTERHOUSE SCHOOL (Appellants) v. GAYLER, SURVEYOR OF TAXES (Respondent).

This was a case stated by the Inland Revenue Commissioners on the application of the governing body of Charterhouse School to obtain the opinion of the court whether the assessment in respect of inhabited house duty had been properly made.

The assessment against which an appeal was heard before the general commissioners acting for the division of Godalming, in the county of Surrey, on the 21st of November, 1890, was in respect of a charge of £3,000 for the year 1890-91 for inhabited house duty made upon the governing body in respect of several of the buildings at Godalming known as Charterhouse School. Such buildings came into existence wholly or primarily for the purposes of the said school.

The buildings which formed the subject of the assessment were as follows:—

The head master's house, which comprised the private residence of the head master and his family and boarding accommodation for about sixty boys. The head master, who holds this house upon the terms of article 28 of the school statutes does not pay any rent, nor does he do repairs.

Two assistant masters' houses, for which rent is paid and in each of which boys are boarded; the chapel, large hall, library, classroom, laundry, science rooms, museum and theatre, carpenter's shop, drawing school, sanatoriums, swimming bath, racquet courts, lodges, and some other small buildings and stabling.

The appellants contended that the head master's and assistant masters' houses were separately inhabited dwelling-houses, and that they only, with their respective household offices, were separately and distinctly liable to the duty. They relied upon the 14th rule of Schedule B, 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, submitting that the masters' dwelling-houses were distinct properties, and that each of the masters was an occupier within the meaning of that rule, and of the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, and therefore the proper person to be charged. They also relied upon rule 2, claiming that if the dwelling-house was assessed to house duty, the other buildings were not liable for charge, except they were used as domestic offices such as are named in that rule. They also claimed that rule 3 showed that it was not the intention of the Act to charge buildings (even though they communicated) in cases where distinct and separate dwelling-houses existed which could be charged with the duty.

The surveyor of taxes submitted that for the purposes of the assessment the governors of the school were the occupiers, the three masters referred to being in the position of servants only, placed in the houses for the purpose of carrying on the business of the school; that the whole of the premises included in the charge were within one curtilage (rule 2) and used in conjunction with the residential portion; that rule 3 relied on by the appellants showed that all premises were liable to be included in the valuation of house duty, except the buildings specifically excepted.

The commissioners determined that the assessment was properly made in one sum upon the governing body as occupiers in respect of the whole of the buildings referred to, and confirmed the charge.

The questions for the opinion of the court were (1) whether the determination of the commissioners was correct, or whether the three masters' dwelling-houses were separately chargeable under 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, or not; (2) whether any of the other aforesaid buildings ought to be included in the assessment.

Cohen, Q.C. (Lewis Coward, with him), for the appellants.—In this case the head master holds his house upon the terms of article 28 of the school statutes. It is kept in repair for him, and his rates and taxes are paid, but he is bound to reside in it. The assistant masters are appointed by the head master and occupy houses for which they pay rent, but the governing body keep them in repair and pay the rates and taxes. These houses, if they can be assessed at all, must be assessed separately. [KENNEDY, J.—We wish to know what is the Solicitor-General's argument as to that.]

Sir R. Finlay, S.G.—They are properly assessed as a whole, and fall within what Lord Shand called in the case of Cheape v. Kinmont, 2 Tax. Cas. 418, "one subject."

Cohen, Q.C.—The buildings assessed here do not come within rule 5. [KENNEDY, J.—Is there any authority which shows that as regards assessment there is any difference whether a person occupies a house virtute officii or otherwise?] In Martin v. Assessment Committee of West Derby Union, 31 W. R. 489, 11 Q. B. D. 145, which was the case of a police superintendent who had an official residence which was not part of the police station, it was held that he was rateable to the poor rate, as his occupation was a beneficial one. In Bent v. Roberts, 26 W. R. 128, 3 Ex. D. 66, a superintendent who lived within the boundary of a police station was held not to have such an occupation as to render him liable to pay inhabited house duty. The governing body ought not to be assessed in respect of the head master's house, for he has exclusive possession and does not occupy it as a servant; nor in respect of the under masters' houses because they are not the servants of the governing body, but have to obey the head master. The other buildings are not occupied with and belonging to the masters' houses, they do not belong to one more than another, but are used by all the boys. The assessment cannot be upheld.

Sir R. Finlay, S.G. (Danckwerts and Lord R. Cecil with him), for the respondent.—The governing body are the occupiers of the houses, the masters only residing there virtute officii. The exclusive possession of the masters does not prevent the legal possession being in the governing body. Tennant v. Smith, 3 Tax. Cas. 158, see p. 166, where Lord Watson says the bank are the occupiers, and their agent resided there as a servant. See also In re The Union Bank of Scotland, 1 Tax. Cas. 195. It is established as a principle that if a resident is resident ex officio, or as a servant, the owner of the property is to be treated as the occupier. The governing body are in occupation of the classrooms, library, hall, and other buildings, and of the houses of the masters, who, in point of law, are servants of the governing body. Hayman v. Governors of Rugby School, 22 W. R. 587, L. R. 18 Eq. 28, see judgment of Malins, V.C., at p. 87. The whole of this establishment must be taken together and treated as being subject to the inhabited house duty.

CLIFTON COLLEGE.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case the head master is not bound to reside in the house which he does occupy, and there is nothing to show that his occupation is in any degree less than the occupation of any ordinary tenant, except in one respect, and that is that, under the lease which has been given to him, the lease will come to an end if he ceases to hold the office of head master; in all other respects he seems to us to be, in the fullest sense, in the occupation of the house. That being so, it seems to me that he is the person taxable for his house under these Acts; and if he is the person taxable for that dwelling-house, he is not, under rule 2 of Schedule B, assessable for anything that is not occupied with it. I do not think it can be said in any sense that he occupies the various buildings outside his own house as to which questions in the case arose—the chapel, library, sanatorium, gymnasium, racquet courts, fives courts, swimming baths, museums, and so forth. There is nothing in the case to show that those belong to and are occupied with the master's dwelling-house.

Then, that being so, the only ground upon which the Crown could succeed would be that the college is assessable for the remainder of the premises, as being a dwelling-house, or as including some other dwelling-house to which the rest is attached and occupied with that dwelling-house. But the matters I have just mentioned do not appear to me to be matters that can be treated as inhabited dwelling-houses at all.

Boys do not dwell in or inhabit any classroom or gymnasium or any of these other matters; they neither dwell there nor inhabit there; nor does anybody else as far as the case shows. Then, in addition to that, on the second point to which I have adverted, it seems to me that the weight of authority in this country is to the effect that nothing is inhabited as a dwelling-house for the purposes of these Acts unless somebody sleeps there. It is not necessary for us to express any opinion upon that point, but that seems to me on the whole to be the conclusion to which authority in this country, as distinguished from Scotland, leads. There is one other point. Even if the college were to be treated as in the occupation of the master's house in this case, I should hesitate long before I held that all the other matters enumerated in the case came within rule 2 of Schedule B, and were of the same nature as a coachhouse, stable, brewhouse, washhouse, laundry, bakehouse, dairy, and all the yards and courts and other premises within the curtilages. It is not necessary to decide that now, and it may arise, I understand, in the Charterhouse case. It does look at first sight as if the marginal note correctly represented for once what the sections refer to—namely, household offices.

Therefore, as regards this case, I think the appeal must be allowed.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree, and for the same reasons.

Appeal allowed with costs.

CHARTERHOUSE CASE.

Jan. 17.—WRIGHT, J.—This is a case of great difficulty and doubt, to my mind, as regards one part of it, that is, as regards the head master's house; but, after giving to it the fullest consideration that we can, we have both come to the conclusion that the head master ought to be treated as in the occupation of his house. It is true he has to reside there, and that is a very strong part in favour of the Crown. He pays no rent—that is not material except as evidence; he does not do the repairs, that is not material except as evidence; the governors have the right to come in and do the repairs, and that again is consistent with his being the occupier; but if he lives there as any other person lives there, what to us for the purpose of to-day seems to be the turning point is that he occupies the building for the purpose of keeping boarders there for his own profit. I do not think myself I can usefully add anything to that. It seems to me that we ought to consider him in his capacity, at any rate, as a boarding-house keeper. Whatever his position may be in other capacities, he does inhabit that dwelling-house as an occupier for his own purposes, and not merely as the representative either of the college, the statutory corporation who are the owners of the house, or of the governors who have the control of it. That being so, we think as regards his house that he is assessable to the inhabited house duty. The same thing applies more strongly to the other masters' houses, but I need not say anything about them.

Then, if so, it follows from our judgment (if it is a right judgment) in the Clifton College case, that the college are not assessable for the other parts of the premises, because the other parts of the premises, with the exception of the sanatorium and one or two other portions of the premises which have been mentioned, are not inhabited dwelling-houses taken by themselves. The boys may possibly in some sense inhabit portions of those premises, but they do not inhabit them as dwelling-houses. In this view of the case it does not become necessary to consider whether these schools and other premises could be regarded as being appurtenances to the masters' houses within the meaning of the second rule, and I do not myself think that the case has been stated with much reference to that point. When the masters come to be assessed, if they are assessed, it may be a very serious question to consider, but I do not think we ought to decide it now. The college has been assessed, I think, for the whole.

Cohen, Q.C.—Yes.

WRIGHT, J.—I think the appeal must be allowed.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree, and only wish to add one or two sentences. It seems to me impossible to say, looking at the real relation of the parties and the position of the head master to a place like the Charterhouse, although he is bound to occupy it as head master, and although he ceases to occupy it if he ceases to be head master, that he is occupying as the agent or servant of the governing body so as to make his occupation simply their occupation; it is sufficient occupying and inhabiting for the purpose of being assessed for inhabited house duty for the purposes of this case. With regard to the other houses the masters apparently in each case hold their houses upon the terms of paying such a sum by way of rent as may be considered sufficient in each case. Therefore, as my brother said, it is an a fortiori case.

WRIGHT, J.--I ought to add as to the question whether the same buildings may be assessed under rule 5 as halls or offices, it does not appear to be raised in this case, and the assessment is not put upon that ground.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MANDER AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Inland revenue — Succession duty — Freehold premises devised subject to leases — Increased value at determination of leases — Liability of successor — Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 15, 20, 21, 42.

Joseph M., who died in 1873, devised two freehold premises to George M. These houses were at the date of testator's death let on leases at rents not purporting to be rack-rents. In 1877 succession duty was paid in respect of both houses, based on the rents then reserved by the said leases. In 1888 both houses were sold to the defendants, who were the tenants of one of the houses. In 1889 the leases expired, and the defendants became entitled in possession to the full value of the houses, which value was greater than the rents reserved by the said leases. The Crown claimed that under sections 20 and 21 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51 duty became payable in 1889 by the defendants in respect of the increased value accruing to them upon the determination of the leases as an annuity during the residue of the lives of the defendants equal to the increase of annual value.

Held, that the defendants were not "successors" at all; they had bought property to which George M. had already succeeded, and were not liable to pay duty as successors. They were only liable by virtue of section 42 for what George M. would have been liable for—namely, duty on the increase of value by the falling in of the leases calculated as an annuity during the residue of George M.'s life equal to the increase of annual value.

Information by the Attorney-General.

The following were the facts of the case as set out in the information:—

(1) Joseph Martin, who died on the 2nd of August, 1873, by his will dated the 5th of February, 1872, and proved on the 19th of September, 1873, devised two freehold messuages and premises, being No. 363, Oxford-street and No. 37, Poland-street, respectively, in the county of Middlesex, to his nephew, George Martin, in fee simple.

(2) At the testator's death the house and premises, No. 363, Oxford-street, were let on a lease (not purporting to be at rack-rent) dated the 17th of August, 1867, for a term of years expiring on the 25th of December, 1889, to the defendants, Charles Tertius Mander and Samuel Theodore Mander, in consideration of a premium of £350, and at the yearly rent of £165; and the house and premises, No. 37, Poland-street, were let on a lease (not purporting to be at rack-rent) dated the 7th of May, 1869, for a term of years also expiring on the 25th of December, 1889, to William H. Gregg, in consideration of a premium of £50, and at the yearly rent of £50.

(3) George Martin in 1877 passed the usual succession duty accounts under the will of Joseph Martin, and paid duty in respect of the two houses, which was assessed on the then present rental thereof as reserved by the said leases.

(4) In June, 1888, both the said houses were put up for sale by auction by George Martin, but were bought by private treaty before the sale by the defendants, the tenants of the house in Oxford-street, and conveyances (subject to the said leases) were executed to the defendants accordingly.

(5) The leases expired on the 25th of December, 1889, and the defendants then became entitled in possession to the full enjoyment or value of the said houses. The annual value of the houses was at the end of the leases considerably greater than the rents reserved by the said leases.

(6) Under the foregoing circumstances, and having regard to the sections 20 and 21 of the Succession Duty Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51) duty became payable on the 25th of December, 1889, by the defendants, in respect of the increased value accruing to them upon the determination of the leases as an annuity during the residue of the lives of the defendants equal to the increase of annual value.

(7) Application was duly made on behalf of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to the defendants, for payment of such duty as aforesaid, but the defendants have refused and still refuse to pay the said further duty, and they contend that no such duty is payable.

It was asked by the information that it might "be declared that on the 25th of December, 1889, the date of the determination of the said leases of the messuages and premises, Nos. 363, Oxford-street, and 37, Poland-street, respectively, succession duty became payable in respect of the increased value of the said property accruing to the defendants on such determination, and that the interest of the defendants in such increased value is to be considered to be of the value of an annuity equal to the difference between the annual value of the said property on the 25th of December, 1889, and the rents reserved by the said leases, such annuity being payable from the 25th of December, 1889, during the residue of the lives of the defendants, and that the defendants were and are personally accountable to her Majesty for such duty accordingly."

The Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), provides as follows:—

Section 20.—"The duty imposed by this Act shall be paid at the time when the successor, or any person in his right or on his behalf, shall become entitled in possession to his succession, or to the receipt of the income and profits thereof; except that if there shall be any prior charge, estate, or interest, not created by the successor himself, upon or in the succession, by reason whereof the successor shall not be presently entitled to the full enjoyment or value thereof, the duty in respect of the increased value accruing upon the determination of such charge, estate, or interest, shall, if not previously paid, compounded for, or commuted, be paid at the time of such determination, &c."

Section 21.—"The interest of every successor, except as herein provided, in real property, shall be considered to be of the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of such property, after making such allowances as are hereinafter directed, and payable from the date of his becoming entitled thereto in possession, or to the receipt of the income or profits thereof during the residue of his life, or for any less period during which he shall be entitled thereto, and every such annuity, for the purposes of this Act, shall be valued according to the tables in the schedule annexed to this Act, &c."

Section 15.—" . . . Where any succession shall, before the successor shall have become entitled thereto or to the income thereof in possession, have become vested by alienation or by any title not conferring a new succession in any other person, then the duty payable in respect thereof shall be paid at the same rate and time as the same would have been payable if no such alienation had been made or derivative title created; and where the title to any succession shall be accelerated by the surrender or extinction of any prior interests, then the duty thereon shall be payable at the same time and in the same manner as such duty would have been payable if no such acceleration had taken place."

Section 42.—"The duty imposed by this Act shall be a first charge on the interest of the successor, and of all persons claiming in his right, in all the real property in respect whereof such duty shall be assessed . . . and the said duty shall be a debt due to the Crown from the successor, having, in the case of real property comprised in any succession, priority over all charges and interests created by him; but such duty shall not charge or affect any other real property of the successor than the property comprised in such succession," &c.

Sir R. Webster, A.G. (Vaughan Hawkins with him), for the Crown.—The defendants are the successors to the increased value caused by the falling in of the leases. There was thus a succession within 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51. Section 20 provides that the succession duty is to be paid on the successor becoming entitled in possession; but that in the case of outstanding interest it is to be paid on the determination of such interests. Section 21 provides that the interest of a successor in real property shall be considered as an annuity. Section 15 provides for the duties payable in respect of transferred interests, and treats an alienee as a successor. Therefore the defendants who take as alienees must be treated for the purposes of the Succession Duty Act as successors. An alienation has taken place here within the intention of section 20: Solicitor-General v. The Law Reversionary Interest Society, 21 W. R. 854, L. R. 8 Ex. 233.

Asquith, Q.C. (Joseph Gatey with him), for the defendants, was not called on to argue.

WRIGHT, J.—Whether we are right or wrong, this case seems to us free from doubt. In this case the defendants have not succeeded to anything at all; they bought a property to which George Martin had already succeeded. The full enjoyment of it was deferred for a time within the meaning of section 20, and as to the duty payable on the falling into possession of the reversionary estate, the payment of that duty would be postponed (unless George Martin or his friends had chosen to pay it sooner) until the leases fell in. Then what is the position of things? The Crown really rely on section 15—there is nothing else in the Act on which they can rely—as showing that the duty ought to be paid in relation to the estate in the Manders, the alienees, during their lifetime. But section 15, directly it is looked at, turns out not to apply at all, because it says: "Where any succession shall, before the successor shall have become entitled thereto or to the income thereof in possession, have become vested by alienation"; then, in consequence, the view which the Crown seeks to establish is established. But that is not this case. The succession had become entirely and fully vested in the reversioner George Martin, upon his taking possession of the estate in succession to Joseph Martin in 1873, subject only to postponement by reason of section 20 of the payment of the duty on the falling in of the leases until they should fall in. Therefore, the defendants are liable only by virtue of section 42, and in that case they are liable only for what George Martin would have been liable for.

If it is agreed that that is the case, the amount is fixed on the basis which has been agreed upon in letters which have passed between the parties; if it were not, we should have to ask what amount (if anything) George Martin remained liable for beyond what he had accounted for, which would mean what was the increase of value by the falling in of the leases on the basis of his own life; and that would be all. It is unnecessary to direct an account now.

It is needless to say we do not in the slightest degree differ from anything that has been said in the case of Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society, which was an entirely different case, for there the succession did not happen till the law society had become the alienee of the whole estate of William Dermer.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree entirely, and for the same reasons.

Probate—Administration—Foreign and English wills—Independent—Probate of English will only.

If a testator makes two independent wills, one disposing of property in this country and the other disposing of property abroad, the former alone is admitted to probate.

A testator, a domiciled Englishman, made a will and four codicils relating exclusively to his property in America, in which he directed the executors thereof to realize his property there and remit the proceeds to his London bankers, to be placed to the account and credit of the executors of any will he might make dealing with his English property, or of his administrators if appointed in this country. Subsequently he made a will in England with totally different executors to those of the American will, and by it he directed the executors of that (the English will) to stand possessed of the moneys remitted from America in the manner before mentioned on the same trusts as those declared by the will of the residue of his English property, with power to direct the American executors when they should realize.

The court held that these were independent wills, and refused to admit the American will to probate.

Motion on behalf of the three executors of an American will and codicils, and of an executor of an earlier English will and codicils, of the Right Honourable Sir Charles Augustus Murray, late Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the King of Portugal, who died in Paris on the 3rd of June, 1895, a domiciled Englishman. The wills and facts are fully set out in the judgment.

Nov. 25 and Dec. 9.—Bayford, Q.C., and Bargrave Deane, in support of the motion.—Difficulties have arisen about proving the American will, as the authorities there require the testimony of the surviving witnesses of the will and evidence of the death and handwriting of the others. Difficulties have arisen in tracing the witnesses; but if the American will is admitted here the American courts will follow the English probate, and dispense with the above formalities.

The facts and arguments are set out in the judgments, where the cases cited are referred to except In the Goods of Bolton, 36 W. R. 287, 12 P. D. 202.

Jan. 16.—BARNES, J.—In this case Mr. Bayford moved for an order that a certain will of the deceased and codicils thereto, dealing exclusively with his property in America, should be included in the probate which was about to be obtained of what I may term the English will and codicils thereto. The original American will and codicils are in America, but the case was for convenience argued on what I understand are copies thereof. From the copies of these documents it appears that on the 18th of August, 1870, the testator, then at Lisbon, executed a will there, by which he gave all his estate, real and personal, within the United States of America to his executors thereinafter named, upon trust to realize his said real and personal estate and apply the proceeds, after payment of his debts in the United States and a small bequest to his executors, in the following manner: To remit the residue of the said proceeds to his bankers in London, with instructions to have it placed to the credit of his wife and two other persons, or the executors of any will he might make according to the laws of England, or to any administrator of his effects in that country should he fail to name any executor or executors, or naming such and he or they declining to act, and he appointed certain persons at Boston and New York executors of his said will; and he expressly declared that his said will referred only to the estate, real or personal, of which he might be possessed at the time of his decease within the United States of America, and should not in any manner invalidate or interfere with any testamentary disposition theretofore or thereafter made by him of property belonging to him in England or elsewhere, not being in the United States of America; and he thereby confirmed every such testamentary disposition as fully as if the same were therein repeated, and he revoked all other and former wills made by him respecting any property, real or personal, belonging to him in the United States of America. The testator made four codicils to this will, all of which, I gather, were so made before the English will. In one of these, dated the 21st of June, 1871, he declared that his said will and codicils were to apply only to his estate, real and personal, in the United States, and should not apply to any estate which he might have in England or elsewhere. In another of the said codicils, dated the 2nd of October, 1874, he directed his executors to sell and convert into money, under the powers of the said will, only so much of his real and personal estate within the United States of America as might be required to pay the debts and legacies mentioned in his said will and codicils, and from time to time, as and when they should be so directed by the executors of any will he might make according to the laws of England, to realize his said real and personal estate which should not have been realized for the purposes aforesaid, and remit the proceeds to his bankers in London, with directions to them to have the same placed to account and credit with them of Henry Earl of Ducie, Charles Adolphus Earl of Dunmore, and Herbert Henry Walford, or the successors or successor of them, or of other the executors or executor for the time being of any will he might make according to the laws of England, or should there be no executors or executor then of any administrator for the time being of his effects in that country; and from time to time, as and when the rents, interest, dividends, and annual income should become due and payable to be received on such part or parts of his said real and personal estate as should not for the time being have been so realized, to remit the same to his said bankers, with directions to them to have the same placed to the account and credit with them of the persons or person thereinbefore mentioned. The codicils also made certain changes in the executors, but all those named were Americans.

On the 2nd of November, 1885, the testator made a will in England, in which, after certain bequests and devises, he recited the said codicil of the 2nd of October, 1874, to his American will, and then directed the executors of that (the English) will to stand possessed of the moneys so to be remitted by his executors in the United States of America as the proceeds of his real and personal estate in that country, upon the trusts thereinafter declared concerning the capital of the residue of his real and personal estate in Great Britain; and he directed the executors of that (the English) will to stand possessed of the moneys so to be remitted by his executors in the United States of America as rents, interest, dividends, and annual income of his real and personal estate in that country upon the trusts thereinafter declared concerning the annual income arising from the investment of the residue of his real and personal estate in Great Britain; and he thereby gave the executors of that his (English) will full and uncontrolled power to give directions to his executors in the United States of America to sell and dispose of his real and personal property in the United States of America, or any part or parts thereof, at such time or times and from time to time as they in their sole discretion might think fit, and to defer to give such directions until such time or times as they in their sole discretion might think fit; and he directed that his executors of that his (English) will should not be answerable or accountable to any person or persons whomsoever, or to any court of law or equity whatever, for any loss, injury, or prejudice which might be sustained, arise, or happen by or to his real and personal estate in the United States of America, or any part or parts thereof, either from giving or deferring to give such directions as aforesaid, or for any deficiency in price on the sale of the same, or any part or parts thereof, nor for any banker or other person in that country with whom or into whose hands the said property or the proceeds thereof (whether capital or income) or the securities for the same might be deposited or come, nor for the insufficiency or deficiency of any bills drawn or negotiated by way of remittance, nor for any omission to give notice of dishonour, or other defect of management whatever; but that his executors in the United States of America should be solely responsible for his estate in that country and for the moneys arising therefrom, to the entire exoneration of the executors of that his (English) will, until the same moneys should be remitted and the bills of remittance duly honoured, and the moneys thereby payable be actually received by Messrs. Drummond (the bankers) and placed by them to the account and credit with them of the executors of that his (English) will; and as to all other his property, both real and personal, of what nature or kind soever, after discharging all costs and expenses incurred in converting the same into money, he directed his executors to stand possessed of the same upon certain trusts therein declared; and he appointed his son Charles James Murray and Herbert Henry Walford and Reginald John Smith the executors and trustees of that his (English) will; and he declared that any wills or will made or to be made by him according to the form prescribed by the laws of the United States of America, and which might exclusively apply to any property within that country, should not affect or in any manner interfere with the disposition and bequests thereby (that is, by the English will) made. To this will there were several codicils, but they did not contain anything which affects the question before me.

I think it is clear from the documents, the material portions of which I have referred to, that the testator intended the two sets of documents to be kept entirely distinct. He appointed executors to act in America under his American will and codicils, and executors in this country to act under the English will and codicils, and his intention was that the American executors should, after realizing so much of his property in America as they required for the purpose of paying his debts and the legacies given by his American will and codicils, realize the residue under the directions of his English representatives, and hand the proceeds thereof over to the latter in this country, to be dealt with by them when received as directed by the English will and codicils. It is equally clear that, apart from any technical question, the reasonable and simple course to adopt in this case is to prove the English will and codicils in this country, and the American will and codicils in the United States. For, even if all the documents were included in the probate granted by this court, it would still be necessary for the purpose of dealing with the American assets to obtain a further grant of probate from the proper court in the United States; which would, however, as the deceased was, if I correctly understand, a domiciled Englishman, probably follow the decision of this court and grant probate ancillary to that granted in this country as being the country of the testator's domicile. But it was stated to me that there are formalities to be complied with in order to prove the American will and codicils in the United States of America, and that, although they can be complied with, there is some difficulty in doing so, and that it would be more convenient to allow both sets of documents to be included in the probate in this country, so that the executors might be able to obtain from the proper court in America a grant of probate ancillary to that granted by this court.

It was also urged that both sets of documents together formed the last will of the deceased, and should therefore all be included in the probate. The question for my decision does not, in my opinion, depend on matters of convenience, but upon whether or not the court ought to include the American will and codicils in the probate. If the testator had made an English will only, which disposed of all his real and personal estate, the grant of probate by this court would not extend to the testator's assets in a foreign county, for, as is pointed out at page 300 of Williams on Executors, vol. 1, 9th edition, "the probate was never granted except for goods which, at the time of the death, were within the jurisdiction of the ordinary who made the grant. Though if it should become necessary that the courts of the foreign country where the assets were situated should grant probate or administration for the purpose of giving a legal right to recover and deal with them, such courts, by the comity of nations, would probably follow the decision of the Court of Probate in this country as being in the country of domicile." See also per Lord Brougham in Attorney-General v. Hope, 2 Cl. & Fin. 84, after inquiry made by him of the judge of the Prerogative Court and the King's Advocate. In the same way, if the deceased had died intestate, the grant of administration obtained here would not extend to his assets abroad, though the foreign courts would probably follow the English grant. Again, if he died leaving a will not appointing any executors to act in this country and disposing only of property in a foreign country, that will is not entitled to probate in this country: see In the Goods of Coode, L. R. 1, P. & D. 449, 16 W. R. Prob. Dig. 11, per Sir J. P. Wilde, "for the object of this court in making grants is to enable the executors or administrators to adminster property in this country." See also In the Goods of Mann, [1891] P. 293, 39 W. R. Dig. 179, and In the Goods of Tucker, 34 L. J. P. & M. 29, 13 W. R. Prob. Dig. 1.

It follows, in my opinion, that if two independent wills are made, one disposing of the testator's property in this country, and the other disposing of his property abroad, the former alone should be admitted to probate in this court. If, however, the two wills are not independent, the case is different. The English will, if last, may incorporate the foreign will, as in the cases of In the Goods of Lord Howden, 22 W. R. 711, 43 L. J. P. & M. 26, and In the Goods of Harris, 18 W. R. 901, L. R. 2 P. & D. 83, and then the probate should include both documents, as they virtually become one document. So also the foreign will, if last, may incorporate the English will, in which case the foreign will would not be limited in its operation to property abroad, and both would be included in the probate. In the present case the two wills with their respective codicils are independent documents, and were intended by the deceased to be so. The English will, although it mentions the American will and the codicil of 1874, does not in my opinion incorporate the American will or its codicils, and was not intended to do so. Applying the foregoing observations, it follows, in my judgment, that the American will and codicils disposing as they do of property in the United States of America only, and appointing separate executors thereof, ought not to be included in the probate to be granted by this court of the English will and codicils.

It was also argued that the American will did in fact incorporate the English will, because the former contained the clause that it was not in any manner to invalidate or interfere with any testamentary disposition theretofore or thereafter made by the testator of property belonging to him in England or elsewhere not being in the United States of America, and confirming every such testamentary disposition as fully as if the same were repeated in the American will, and because the American will, though earlier in date than the English will, should be taken as speaking from the death of the testator. I am, however, of opinion that the American will does not incorporate the English will, and that the clause just referred to could not confirm a will not then in existence. The statute does not enact absolutely that a will shall speak as if it had been made just before the death of the testator, but only that it shall do so in respect of the property comprised in it: The Wills Act, 1837 (7 Wm. 4 and 1 Vict.), c. 26, s. 24. I was also referred to the Finance Act, 1894, but I am of opinion that that Act does not affect the question which I am called upon to decide—viz., what documents ought to be admitted to probate. There have been a number of cases on this question of English and foreign wills, and they do not all seem to be consistent; but my judgment follows the principles indicated in those cases in which the matter appears to me to have been most fully considered: see especially In the Goods of Lord Howden.

I therefore order that the American will and codicils be not included in the probate, and according to the practice copies of the American will and codicils must be filed in the registry, together with an affidavit verifying them; and a note must be appended to the probate that such affidavit has been filed.

TREVOR v. HUTCHINS. (a.)

Administration—Statute-barred debt—Fund in court—Creditor administrator of debtor—Right of retainer—Payment out.

By an order made in the presence of A. as legal personal representative of B., a fund of B. in court was carried to the credit of the separate account of B.'s personal representative, and inquiries were directed as to the persons entitled to the fund. A. was also in the position of a statute-barred creditor of B. While the inquiries directed by the order were pending A. applied to have the fund paid out to him as the legal personal representative of B., in order that he might be in a position to retain thereout the statute-barred debt. B. had other creditors whose debts were not statute-barred. The fund did not exceed the amount of the statute-barred debt.

Held, upon these facts, that the court would not order payment out of the fund to A.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

A firm of Tulloch, Brodie, & Co., who failed in 1807, executed a deed of arrangement for the benefit of their creditors. In 1875 an action was brought for the administration of the trusts of that deed. Large sums of money had been paid into court in the action.

By a certificate, dated the 2nd of August, 1883, certain sums were found due to George Hartwell, deceased, as the last surviving partner of several firms who were creditors of Tulloch, Brodie, & Co. The amount of such sums was ordered to be carried over to the account of the legal personal representative of George Hartwell, deceased, when constituted.

A considerable sum was standing to that account on the 13th of April, 1889, when Major Ricketts, as the representative of a creditor of one of the firms, presented a petition and asked for the distribution of the fund in court on the ground that it had passed to the creditors of that firm. An order was made on the petition directing inquiries, and the chief clerk found by his certificate, dated the 23rd of November, 1892, that the fund belonged (inter alia) as to one-fourth to George Hartwell. In August, 1893, on the further hearing of the petition, the share of George Hartwell was ordered to be carried over to a separate account, and an inquiry was directed as to the persons entitled, and in what shares and proportions.

George Hartwell died in 1842, insolvent and indebted to his son Francis Hartwell. Francis Hartwell died in 1867, leaving his son Francis Grant Hartwell his executor.

On the 3rd of July, 1890, letters of administration de bonis non to the estate of George Hartwell were granted to Francis Grant Hartwell, who was a party to the proceedings when the order of August, 1893, was made. He had since died, and appointed his widow, Elizabeth Hartwell, his sole executrix. She, having proved the will and taken out letters of administration de bonis non to the estate of George Hartwell, thus became legal personal representative of both George Hartwell and of his creditor Francis Hartwell. The last inquiries, directed in August, 1893, as to the persons entitled to the share of George Hartwell had not been answered. Elizabeth Hartwell now applied to have the fund paid out to her as administratrix of George Hartwell, with a view to retain the debt due by George to Francis Hartwell, deceased, whose personal representative she also was. Stirling, J., being of opinion that the debt was statute-barred, refused to order the fund to be paid out to the administratrix of George Hartwell in order to enable her to acquire a right of retainer, such right being an anomaly and one which ought not to be extended.

The administratrix appealed.

Buckley, Q.C., and Fawcus, for the appellant.—It is true that if a receiver be appointed adversely to the executor, the right of retainer is gone: In re Jones, Calver v. Laxton, 34 W. R. 249, 31 Ch. D. 440; Richmond v. White, 27 W. R. 878, 12 Ch. D. 361. But the appellant is the only person who can give a good discharge for the money standing to the credit of this action. In point of law, constructively, whether there is an action or not, the legal personal representative is always the person who is paid. Although Loy v. Duckett, Cr. & Ph. 305, is apparently against the appellant, Lord Cottenham did not in that case refuse to pay the legal personal representative; he simply ordered the other parties interested to be brought before the court. This being a windfall coming in to the estate after a long lapse of time, there was no reason for suing earlier. There being no fraud, the reason for the rule that a fund in court ought not to be paid out to an executor so as to enable him to retain a statute-barred debt does not apply; and an executor may retain a statute-barred debt.

They referred to Peacock v. Saggers, 4 De G. F. & J. 406; Coombs v. Coombs, L. R. 1 P. & D. 288, 14 W. R. Dig. 23; In the Goods of Brackenbury, 25 W. R. 698, 2 P. D. 272.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Brabant, for the respondents, were not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think the practical solution of this does not appear to present any real difficulty. There is a fund in court which is standing to the credit of the legal personal representative of George Hartwell. George Hartwell owed money to the estate of Francis Hartwell, and the same person is the legal personal representative of them both. By the order under which this fund was carried over to what I may call the separate account of the executors of George Hartwell, an inquiry was directed in order to ascertain who the persons were who were beneficially entitled to George Hartwell's share. That was done in the presence of George Hartwell's then legal personal representative. That inquiry has not been answered, and George Hartwell's legal personal representative comes to the court and says, "Before that inquiry is answered give me all this money." Now, is it right that the court should accede to that request? The object of it is to enable the legal personal representative of George Hartwell, when she has got this money, to prefer herself as the legal personal representative of Francis Hartwell, and to pay herself in that character what is due to Francis in full, and leave the other creditors of George to go without anything, as far as I know. Now, pending that inquiry, which was directed in the presence of George Hartwell's legal personal representative, ought we to enable the appellant to defeat the object of that inquiry, by paying this money out of court to the appellant? I think not. Supposing she had waited until that inquiry was answered, what would be the position of affairs? The position of affairs would be, I assume, that her name would not appear amongst the persons certified as having a valid claim as a creditor against George Hartwell's estate, because Francis Hartwell's debt has been barred. She would not therefore appear amongst the persons certified to be beneficially entitled to this fund under the inquiry to which I have alluded. Of course, in that event the right of retainer never would arise at all; because she would not have anything placed in her hands to retain. She has no right to retain until she has money in her hands. But she now says, "in order to save me from that certificate"—in other words, "in order to defeat the inquiry which was directed in my presence, help me to get the money out of court and defeat the inquiry altogether." I do not think we ought to do it. I was rather struck with Mr. Buckley's comments upon Loy v. Duckett, a case which I have not had occasion to look at for a long time, and I thought that case went perhaps a little further than it did; but I think that case can be explained, especially with the light thrown upon it by Peacock v. Saggers. I think that the view taken by Lord Cottenham in Loy v. Duckett was this -he distrusted the legal personal representative; he thought that if the legal personal representative got the money, no one else would see a farthing of it; and therefore Lord Cottenham took the course—which was no doubt right, but which was a strong course—of saying, "We will not pay it to you at all." Now here there is no danger of misappropriation of money in that sense. But there is danger, certainly, that if Mr. Buckley's client gets this money, the other creditors will go without payment. That would be the legal consequence of her getting it. I do not know, if there were nothing else in the case, that it would be right even to follow Loy v. Duckett; but we have a very peculiar combination of circumstances, and it appears to me that what we are asked to do is that which we ought not to do, having regard to the terms of the order of August, 1893—that is to say, we ought not to assist the legal personal representative of George Hartwell to defeat the whole of that inquiry which was directed in the presence of her or her predecessors, as his representative. I do not think it would be right. I do lay some importance upon the fact that the whole object of this is to get into the position to exercise a right of retainer, and I do not see that there is any principle which compels the court to assist a person to get into that position. I agree with what James, L.J., said: "It is no business of ours either to defeat or to assist the right of retainer"; but when we are asked to do that which is inconsistent with what was done in August, 1893, for the very purpose of enabling one creditor to defeat all the others, I say "No."

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There is no suit for the administration of the estate of George Hartwell. In this suit of Trevor v. Hutchins, which was instituted for the administration of the trusts of a creditor's deed, George Hartwell was found to be a creditor under that deed, and a certain sum was directed to be carried to his separate account in that suit. It was carried to the separate account. That fund cannot be touched except under an order of the Court of Chancery—the Chancery Division of the High Court—and accordingly this application is made in Chancery by the administratrix de bonis non of George Hartwell. She comes here and says practically: "I also represent a person who was a creditor of George Hartwell; I admit that the debt is barred by the statute long ago; but I say that, in my character as legal personal representative of George Hartwell, I am entitled to have this fund handed out to me. No matter what I am going to do with it, I am entitled to have it handed out to me. When I get the fund, I mean, of course, to exercise the right of retainer which will then arise for the first time, and I will pay myself in full—the fund is not more than enough to do that—and whoever else is entitled, I do not care." I should have the greatest possible hesitation in acceding to that, if the case stood there alone (this fund having been a long time in court), having regard to the rule in Loy v. Duckett which, primâ facie, I take to apply—viz., that the court will not pay out a fund under those circumstances to a person who happens to have obtained administration, but will find out who is entitled, and try if possible to get the fund into the hands of the people entitled. But the case does not stand there, because we have here another circumstance, which to my mind is very important and conclusive as to what the court ought now to do; and that is this: A former representative of George Hartwell, who is now dead, was before the court when the petition of Major Ricketts, who claimed an interest in this fund and asked to have it, or part of it, paid to him, was heard. In the presence of the legal personal representative of George Hartwell an inquiry was then directed to find out who were beneficially entitled to the fund. That was practically following the decision in Loy v. Duckett. The court would not hand it over to the then legal personal representative of George Hartwell. It was said the legal personal representative did not require it to be handed over. However, the court did not, in fact, hand it over; but in the presence of that legal personal representative they directed an inquiry as to who were beneficially interested in the fund.

Now, by the admission of the present appellant, the answer to that inquiry will certainly leave her out altogether, because she admits that the debt of the person of whom she is the legal personal representative is long barred. That certificate will therefore be in this form: "This fund belongs to A., B., C., and D., creditors of George Hartwell at such a sum, and must be divided among them." But among A., B., C., and D. the present appellant will not appear at all.

Although that inquiry was directed in the presence of the then legal personal representative of George Hartwell, and although that inquiry has not been answered, yet the now legal personal representative of George Hartwell comes and says: "Hand over the whole fund to me in respect of a debt which I admit is barred—in respect of a debt which will certainly be excluded from the time when the certificate is made upon the inquiry, and stop the inquiry at once." I cannot see that the court would ever agree to that. I do not mean to say one word to encourage the legal personal representative of George Hartwell to suppose that a court of equity would under any circumstances permit her to have the fund in order that she may exercise a right of retainer and oust the other creditors.

Would it ever do it, after such an inquiry as that is directed? I think not. I think that is a complete answer to this appeal.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I have nothing to add except this. It seems to me that in August, 1893, this right to receive the money was waived. It cannot now be set up.

Appeal dismissed.

In re BENNETT.
JONES v. BENNETT. (a.)

Will—Tenant for life and remainderman—Money lent by testator to a trading firm for a fixed period—Expense of audit of firm's books under provisions of agreement for loan.

The testator advanced money to two persons engaged in business, and it was stipulated that the testator should have no power to call the money in for a fixed term except in certain events, such as the business of the borrowers being carried on at a loss. It was also stipulated that the testator should have the right to inspect and examine the books and stock-in-trade of the firm at any time. The testator died having by his will given his property to certain persons for life with remainders over.

Held, first, that the duty of the trustee of the will was, in the absence of any special circumstances, to have an audit and stocktaking of the firm's business once a year; and, secondly, that the expenses of every such audit and stocktaking ought to be borne by the capital of the estate.

In this case two questions were raised—(1) As to how often the trustee of the testator's will ought to have an investigation as to the condition of the business of certain persons who owed money to the estate; and (2) by whom, as between tenant for life and remainderman, the expense of such investigation ought to be borne.

The testator had for some time prior to the 10th of April, 1894, carried on business in partnership with Messrs. Walton & Marshall, and, the partnership term having expired, it was arranged between the parties that the testator should retire from the business, and that Messrs. Walton & Marshall should continue to carry it on together, and by an agreement dated the 10th of April, 1894, made between the testator of the one part and Walton & Marshall of the other part, it was (inter alia) agreed as follows: (1) That the testator should retire from the said business in favour of Walton & Marshall as from the 16th of February, 1894. (2) That the capital of the testator in the said firm on the said 18th of February, 1894, was to be taken as settled and ascertained at the sum of £15,772 4s. 10d., and such capital sum was to be considered as money lent by the testator to Walton & Marshall on the 18th of February, 1894, at interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from that day, such interest to be payable as therein mentioned, and the said capital sum to be repaid by Walton & Marshall to the testator on the 16th of August, 1904. By clause 3 Walton & Marshall were empowered to pay off the capital sum at any time. By clause 11 Walton & Marshall agreed to produce and show to the testator the balance-sheet of the business to be carried on by them, and all books and documents in relation thereto, and that the testator should have at all times free access and full liberty to inspect and examine the stock-in-trade, &c. By clause 12 it was declared that that agreement was upon the express condition that if and whenever (inter alia) the said business should be carried on at a loss, or if and whenever the balance-sheets and other books in connection with the said business should not be clearly and honestly kept, or if and whenever Walton or Marshall should at any time draw out more than his profit of the said business, or if and whenever the stock-in-trade of the said business should be overvalued, &c., the testator, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns might (inter alia) recover immediate payment of the said sum of £15,772 4s. 10d., or so much thereof as should then remain owing. In pursuance of such agreement Walton & Marshall had duly carried on the said business.

The testator died on the 27th of September, 1894, having by his will, dated the 14th of February, 1890, given all his residuary estate to his executors and trustees upon the usual trusts for sale and conversion and investment of the proceeds, and thereby in effect gave his property to certain persons for life, with remainders over. The said will also contained a power for the trustees to carry on his business, and the testator thereby authorized his trustees to postpone the sale and conversion of his estate for so long as they should think fit, and directed that the income of unconverted property (including the profits of his business while carried on by his trustees) should from the time of his death go in the same manner as the income of the proceeds thereof would have been applicable if the same had been converted. The will was duly proved by one only of the executors therein named, the other having renounced probate and disclaimed the trusts of the will. The trustee, not being able to ascertain whether the principal moneys owing under the said agreement had become payable under clause 12 thereof without an independent audit of the books and stocktaking of the said business being had at least once every year by duly qualified accountants and valuers, had directed one such audit and stocktaking to be taken, which was done in or about December, 1894, at an expense of about £213.

The trustee applied by an originating petition to the Court of Chancery of the County of Lancaster to have it (inter alia) determined (b) whether he should continue to have such audit and stocktaking taken once every year or at any other and what intervals, and (c) how the expense of the audit and stocktaking which had already taken place and of any future audit and stocktaking ought to be borne and paid, and whether out of income or capital.

The Vice-Chancellor held as to (b) that the trustee should have such audit and stocktaking once and once only in each year, and as to (c) that the expense of the audit and stocktaking which had taken place should be borne and paid for out of capital, as being part of the testamentary expenses, but that the expenses of all subsequent audits and stocktakings should be borne and paid out of income.

(a.) Reported by W. SCOTT THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The tenants for life appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and J. Rutherford, for the appellants, argued that as the object for which these expenses were incurred was the protection of the corpus they ought to be borne by the capital, and so the beneficiaries would bear them in proportion to their interests. The costs in question were all really in the nature of debts and testamentary expenses.

F. Thompson and A. & B. Terrell, for the remainderman, argued that the order appealed from was right. If tenants for life take the income of property in specie, they must take it subject to all proper deductions such as the costs here.

They referred to section 18 of the Trustee Act, 1893.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and A. Rutherford, for the trustee.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The testator, on retiring from his business, lent his share of the capital to the continuing partners, and stipulated that they should repay it with interest at 5 per cent. within ten years, and might pay it off sooner if they wished, but the testator could not call it in sooner. All this was without security. Then he stipulated that as he was going to lend without security they must produce balance-sheets, and he was to be at liberty to see the books and ascertain how their business was being carried on, and whether or not his money was really safe, so that if he found it was at risk he might be at liberty to call it in. That is the substance of the bargain. He afterwards died, having by his will settled his property upon one for life, remainder over. The trustee requires the continuing partners to show him their books and have them examined by an accountant.

The Vice-Chancellor said that they might do this once a year, but not oftener. I think that direction is too strict. It will be better to direct that in the absence of any special circumstances this audit should be made once a year, but that will leave with the trustee a discretion to have it more than once in a year or not, as he thinks expedient.

Now comes the question how the expense is to be borne. The trustee says that he must employ an accountant, and asks who is to pay for that. In the first place, as between the testator's estate and the continuing partners, the expense cannot be thrown upon them; it must therefore be borne by the testator's estate. If so, why should it not be paid out of the capital of the estate? It is not exactly a debt or testamentary expense, but is much more akin to that than anything else. I think that Mr. Cozens-Hardy's suggestion was the true one—namely, that this is part of the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by the executor in performance of his duties. Why should it be thrown on the tenant for life. For whose benefit is the expense to be incurred. It is for the benefit of the whole estate, and should be borne by the whole estate.

The practical effect will be that the tenant for life will lose the income of the sum expended.

It has been suggested that these are annual outgoings. I do not think that they are anything of the sort. By outgoings are generally meant some payments which must be made to secure the income of the property. In my opinion the Vice-Chancellor ought to have declared that the expenses of the audit and stocktaking ought to be paid out of corpus, and he ought not to have drawn any distinction between the first and the subsequent payments.

KAY, L.J., referred to the facts, reading the provisions of clause 12 of the agreement of the 10th of April, 1894, and observing that they were material in reference to the present question, and continued: The trustee wants to know how often he ought to have a formal examination made, and who, as between the tenant for life and the remainderman, is to pay for it. Now, it is obvious that without an examination of the books it would be impossible for the trustee to find out whether any of the events specified in clause 12 have happened or not. How can the trustee without such an examination ascertain whether the balance-sheets are accurate? Therefore an examination of the books at some time or other is necessary. The provision is that the testator was to have an examination of the books whenever he liked; and I do not see that it was competent for the Vice-Chancellor to lay down the hard and fast rule that there should be an examination once a year, and once a year only. Why should the trustee be so fettered? It might be necessary to examine the books more frequently. He might in one year have examined the books, and then he might have a suspicion that some one of the events provided for had happened in that year since that examination, and he might want to examine the books again, and it might be necessary, in order to insure the security of the capital sum, that there should be a further examination of the books in that year. On the other hand, the business might be so well carried on that the trustee might say that he had no suspicion of anything, and did not require an examination at any particular time. Again, the principal sum owing might have been so far reduced, and there might be so little to pay, that an annual examination might not be at all necessary. Therefore I think that the trustee ought not to be told that he is to make an examination in every year whatever happens, and only to make it once in each year. His discretion should not be so fettered. I agree with the addition to the declaration of the words which Lindley, L.J., has suggested.

Then comes the question, How are the expenses of this to be paid? Is it to be paid out of capital or out of income? For what purpose are these expenses to be incurred? It is to insure the repayment of the capital. If the trustee found that one of the events provided for by clause 12 had happened, then it would be his duty to call in the money at once, and he cannot tell that without an examination of the books, which would be a costly proceeding. Surely that is a provision which the testator introduced into this agreement for the purpose of making himself safe; that is, for the purpose of securing the repayment of the money which is not charged upon the business. That is an expense which those who are entitled to the capital ought to share. Why should it be thrown upon the tenant for life? The debt is outstanding until 1904, and if the tenant for life is then living he would have paid all this expense, and the remainderman would have to pay nothing of this which was incurred to insure the safety of the capital sum. Mr. Thompson ingeniously likened it to the case of insurance, but the analogy is not a good one—for one reason because the premium bears a very small proportion to the capital amount insured; it is nothing like £213 a year on £15,000. If the trustee had no power to insure at all, of course he could not pay it out of income except under the provisions of the Act recently passed. I think Mr. Cozens-Hardy's reply touches the very point. These are strictly costs, charges, and expenses properly payable by the trustee in the administration of the estate, so that, primâ facie, they are a capital charge. If they are paid out of capital, the estate will to that extent be reduced, and the tenant for life will lose the income upon such reduction. That, as between tenant for life and remainderman, is a fair way of dealing with it.

With great respect to the Vice-Chancellor, I differ from him, and think that these expenses ought to come out of capital, and not out of income.

SMITH, L.J.—The real question is whether the expense of the audit to see whether the testator's money is or is not safe ought to come out of income or capital. Is this an outgoing as was suggested; or is it more like to costs, charges, and expenses, as Mr. Cozens-Hardy said. In my opinion it comes within the latter class. It was said that it was like the case of an insurance where the tenant for life pays the premium, but the difference between that case and this is that a premium on an insurance is a voluntary payment by a tenant for life out of his income. But this is a payment made by the trustee for the benefit of the whole estate; not merely for the benefit of the tenant for life, but also for the remainderman. I am clear that their costs ought to come out of capital.

Appeal allowed.

HARBIN v. MASTERMAN. (a.)

Will—Annuity charged on income of residue—Provision for annuity—Payment of residue to residuary legatees—Refusal of annuitant to consent—Costs improperly incurred—Liability of solicitor—Ord. 65, r. 11.

Where an annuity is charged upon a residuary estate with a direction that upon the death of the annuitant the residue is to be divided, the court has jurisdiction, in spite of the opposition of the annuitant, to order the residue to be paid to the residuary legatees upon provision being made for the payment of the annuity.

The court, being of opinion that the appeal had been brought, not in the interest of the appellant, but really by the appellant's solicitor for his own purposes, made an order, under ord. 65, r. 11, that the appellant's costs should be disallowed as between the appellant and her solicitor, and that the solicitor should pay the costs which the appellant had been ordered to pay to the respondents.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

J. F. Duncan, who died on the 1st of January, 1865, by his will, dated the 15th of February, 1860, gave the residue of his personal estate upon trust out of the annual income to pay a legacy and certain annuities to the persons named; but when and so often as the annual income should not be sufficient for the payment of the whole amount of the annuities there was to be an abatement among the annuitants. The trustees were to invest the surplus income (if any), and after the death of the survivor of the annuitants to pay and divide the residue between five public charities according to the amount set after their respective names.

Upon this will, in July, 1871, Wickens, V.C. (19 W.R. 1053, L.R. 12 Eq. 559), decided that the charities were entitled to the whole of the residuary personal estate and the accumulations during twenty-one years from the testator's death; and in 1893, upon a petition presented by the next of kin, Stirling, J., held that the charities, and not the next of kin, were entitled to the surplus income accumulated after the expiration of the twenty-one years. Both these decisions were affirmed by the Court of Appeal (1894, 2 Ch. 184) and the House of Lords (43 W. R. 449, [1895] A. C. 186).

One of the annuities was an annuity of £150 in favour of Mrs. M. E. Venables, who was fifty-two years of age. Various sums of Consols had been set aside to answer the annuities, a sum of £6,000 having been appropriated to Mrs. Venables' annuity.

The five charities petitioned for the payment to them of the residue, except the sums set apart for the annuities. This was not opposed by any of the annuitants except Mrs. Venables, who claimed that the whole residue should remain in court during her life.

Stirling, J., ordered the residue, except what was set apart for the annuities, to be paid to the charities, but ordered that a sum of £2,000 should remain in court as an additional security for Mrs. Venables, not to be paid out without notice to her.

From this order Mrs. Venables appealed.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Johnston Edwards, for the appellant.—The testator has said that the residue shall not be divided until the death of the last surviving annuitant, and, though it may have been the common practice, there is no jurisdiction to order the residue to be paid out. The principle of Saunders v. Vautier, Cr. & Ph. 240, has never been applied to capital. There is no reported case in which such an order has been made in the face of opposition. Stirling, J., relied on In re Parry, 38 W. R. 226, 42 Ch. D. 570, but that case never decided that the capital might be taken away by the legatees. In Slanning v. Style, 3 P. W. 334, the order was made subject to the annuitant's consent, and in Weatherall v. Thornburgh, 26 W. R. 593, 8 Ch. D. 261, the point was not raised. [RIGBY, L.J., referred to King v. Malcott, 9 Hare 692.]

Fischer, Q.C., and S. Dickinson, for the London Orphan Asylum, one of the charities.—Though there seems to be no authority in point, the practice has always been to order payment out on provision being made for the annuities, and it is absurd to suppose that if a testator leaves an estate of £100,000 and charges on the income an annuity of £100, the whole estate must be kept in hand. If the income prove deficient the annuitant can resort to the corpus in the hands of the charities: May v. Bennett, 1 Russ. 370; Booth v. Coulton, 18 W. R. 877, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 684. [RIGBY, L.J., referred to Williams on Executors, 9th ed., vol. 2, p. 1260, and to Boyd v. Buckle, 10 Sim. 595, and Prendergast v. Lushington, 5 Hare 171, 3 H. L. C. 195.] [LINDLEY, L.J.—It comes to this: there is no reported case where an order has been made in face of opposition. The question is whether Mr. Hastings is right in saying the thing cannot be done.] It is the practice of the court, and cannot be supposed to be wrong.

They referred also to Simmons v. Bolland, 3 Mer. 547.

Johnston Edwards, in reply.—By the decision of the House of Lords the annuities are chargeable only on the income of each year. The annuitants cannot, therefore, proceed against the charities for any deficiency.

H. Fellowes, Hadley, and Buckley, Q.C., and T. B. Napier, appeared for the other charities.

Cur. adv. vult.

Before delivering judgment the court, being doubtful whether the appeal had been presented in the interests of Mrs. Venables, directed the official solicitor to inquire into the matter, and intimated to the appellant's solicitor that they would hear him on the question whether he should not be ordered, under rule 11 of order 65, to indemnify his client against the costs of the appeal.

Dec. 16.—LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case there is an appeal, nominally in the name of Mrs. Venables, against an order made by Stirling, J., directing certain funds to be paid over to some charities which are residuary legatees, although there are annuities, or rather there is one annuity, charged upon the residuary estate and still payable to Mrs. Venables. Under orders, which I need not refer to, a sum of £8,000 in Consols has been set apart to answer Mrs. Venables' annuity. The amount of that annuity is £150 a year. In the judgment of Stirling, J., that was an ample sum to set apart to provide for the annuity, and the appellant's counsel did not really contend the contrary. It is obvious, upon consideration, having regard to the age of the lady and the amount of the annuity, that £8,000 is quite ample. But Mr. Graham Hastings, for the appellant, argued that Stirling, J., had no jurisdiction to order the residuary estate to be divided, inasmuch as Mrs. Venables' annuity was charged upon the whole residuary estate, and the part of the will which gave her the annuity and gave the charities the residuary estate is worded in this way, that after payment of the annuity the residue is to be divided. Mr. Graham Hastings' point was that the annuity had not been paid, and will not be paid until Mrs. Venables' death, and that upon the terms of the will there is no jurisdiction in the court to order the residuary estate to be distributed until her death. Now, according to the strict language of the will that is so, no doubt; but what is the meaning of a will which charges a residuary estate with an annuity or several annuities, and directs that upon the death of the annuitants the residue is to be divided? As between the annuitants on the one hand and the residuary legatees upon the other, it is a gift of the residue subject to the payment of the annuities, and it has been the invariable practice of the court to let the residuary legatees have what is theirs, subject to an ample provision for the payment of the annuities. I confess it took me by surprise to be told that there was no jurisdiction to make any such order, and that the court had never done it in the face of opposition. That the court has been in the habit of doing it ever since Lord Talbot's time is obvious from the cases, and, speaking from my own recollection (and my brother Rigby confirms me), it has been done scores of times, but we are not prepared to say that we recollect a case where it was done in spite of opposition. Now, the opposition is the opposition of a dog-in-the-manger kind, there being ample to provide for the annuity. The opposition is not only injurious, but selfish in the extreme.

Mr. Fischer referred us to a great many authorities which confirmed the practice of the court, and in addition to those decisions there are one or two more. There is one, Fryer v. Buttar, 8 Sim. 442, more particularly, which might have been referred to, and which I will name without going through it. But there was considerable opposition there, although not actually to the distribution of the final residue. The view taken by Stirling, J., is the common-sense view, and that is to let the residuary legatees have what is theirs subject to the payment of the annuities. Of course, if in some unforeseen event it should become necessary for the annuitant to have recourse to the capital so set apart, she would be entitled to do it; but to suppose it is conceivable in any case except the insolvency of the country, which is a contingency the court never contemplates, that she will not be paid her annuity in full is perfectly idle. So far there is no difficulty, and it was not because any of us felt a difficulty that we omitted to give judgment when the argument was concluded. But there was a question which occurred to us about the costs of this appeal which required care. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs, but there will be only one set of costs to be paid by the appellant.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I entirely agree.

RIGBY, L.J.—I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Their lordships then heard the appellant's solicitor on the question of costs, and afterwards delivered the following judgments:—

LINDLEY, L.J.—We have now to consider whether this is a case in which an order ought to be made against the appellant's solicitor in person, to indemnify his client against the costs of this appeal. We know now, from Mr. Hood Barrs' own statement, the whole history of this appeal, and it is perfectly obvious now that the suspicion which we had when counsel first addressed us on the merits is well founded, that this appeal cannot be fairly or properly regarded as an appeal brought in the interests of Mrs. Venables. The object of the appeal is to compel the charities to come to some terms with Mr. Hood Barrs, especially with respect to certain costs, as to some of which he has given his own personal guarantee. That explains the following passage in a letter from him to Mrs. Venables: "With regard to the appeal about which I wrote you, as I have said, you will incur no liability whatever. Whatever liability there is will be with me. I hope ultimately to get a settlement of the appeal which will be beneficial to me," that is, I will take the burden of the appeal on myself and at the same time any benefit. That expresses in a few words the real truth, and it is perfectly obvious that Mrs. Venables, although she has so far authorised and approved of this appeal as to render her responsible for the costs, yet, when we come to look at the matter as between her and her solicitor, it is quite obvious that she is a mere puppet in his hands, and this appeal is brought by him for his own purposes, and not in the interest of Mrs. Venables at all. Now, Mr. Hood Barrs has thought proper to cast aspersions on the conduct of the official solicitor. All I can say is that we are responsible for sending him to Mrs. Venables. We were convinced, or at all events strongly of opinion, that this appeal was not an appeal brought by her in her interest; in other words, we did not believe that the real object of this appeal was its apparent object—namely, to get for her a better security for her annuity. It was quite obvious that it was our duty, having that opinion, to take care that a suitor of the court was not let in for considerable costs for a purpose with which she had really nothing whatever to do. I think we were not only justified, but we should have failed in our duty if, having that view, we did not investigate the matter by sending the official solicitor to inform us more about it. The official solicitor goes as the officer of the court. He is not a solicitor for the client, nothing of the sort. He has performed his duty in a way that at least has given us perfect satisfaction, and we should be failing in our duty if we did not apply to this case ord. 65, r. 11: "If in any case it shall appear to the court or a judge that costs have been improperly or without any reasonable cause incurred, or that by reason of any undue delay in proceeding under any judgment or order, or of any misconduct or default of the solicitor, any costs properly incurred have nevertheless proved fruitless to the person incurring the same, the court or judge may call on the solicitor of the p rson by whom such costs have been so incurred to show cause why such costs should not be disallowed as between the solicitor and his client, and also (if the circumstances of the case shall require) why the solicitor should not repay to his client any costs which the client may have been ordered to pay to any other person." If there ever was a case in which that order ought to be applied, this is one.

The charge against Mr. Hood Barrs is this, which he has proved up to the hilt by his own statement—that this appeal is not brought for the benefit of his client, but is brought for the ulterior purpose of benefiting himself in this sense—to compel these charities, if he can, to come to some arrangement with him, which they are not in the least bound to do, and which he has no right to impose. It is very nearly, if not quite, justifiable to say that it is a blackmailing appeal.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The question which the court has to determine now is whether it appears to the court that costs have been improperly, or without any reasonable cause, incurred; because, if the court comes to that opinion, power is given to the court, under ord. 65, r. 11, to call upon the solicitor of the client to show cause why the costs should not be disallowed, or why he should not pay the costs which have been incurred by the client.

I wish shortly to state how the matter appears to me. The testator made a will, and controversy arose as to the construction of that will. My brother Stirling put a construction upon it. This court afterwards put the same construction upon it, and the House of Lords has held that the construction put upon it by my brother Stirling and this court was right. I do not for a moment say that that litigation, which, as I understand, was undertaken on behalf of the next of kin, who were the appellants all through, in this court and in the House of Lords, was not a proper litigation for Mr. Hood Barrs to undertake. I do not say that in any shape or way up to the judgment in the House of Lords, which was given in March, 1895, any complaint can be made of Mr. Hood Barrs in the matter—none whatever. What we have to determine is as to what took place after March, 1895, when the judgment of the House of Lords was given. Now, what happened? The judgment in the House of Lords affirmed that certain charities, five in number, were entitled to the corpus of the property—I am putting it shortly—subject to certain annuities, and the House of Lords gave judgment for the respondents with costs against the appellants, who were Mr. Hood Barrs' clients. Mr. Hood Barrs, after that judgment had been given against his clients, did all he could to get these charities to forego their costs. That seems to me to be all right. But he could not get them to agree to that, and they were within their rights in saying, "We will not forego the costs." Then what happened? The charities want to get the property to which the House of Lords has said they were entitled. That property was invested at that time in Consols in court in the administration of the testator's estate. What the charities did was this: They took out a summons before my brother Stirling to get an order that the corpus should be paid out to them in the shares to which they had been adjudged entitled under the judgment of the House of Lords, but, of course, subject to such part of the corpus being set aside as would fully secure the annuitants having a charge on the corpus. What did my brother Stirling do? He took into consideration the circumstances as regards Mrs. Venables (and no doubt as regards the other annuitants, none of whom appeal against Stirling, J.'s, order) and he said: "If I set apart £8,000 and keep that in court for the purpose of satisfying your annuity, I am perfectly certain you will have your annuity of £150 a year as long as you live." I am perfectly certain that my brother Stirling was right in that, and nobody can hear what I am saying without being satisfied that the order of my brother Stirling was a just order to make as between the annuitant on the one part and the charities on the other, who were entitled to the residue of the corpus.

But now comes the difficulty with regard to Mr. Hood Barrs. Mr. Hood Barrs could not get the charities to agree to forego the costs, so he goes to Mrs. Venables, who is a lady certainly not in affluent circumstances, and he gets her name for the purpose of appealing against that order of Stirling, J.; and it certainly did appear to me, when Mr. Graham Hastings was arguing this case for the appellant, that it was a senseless appeal, and one which nobody could have brought unless he or she had been ill-advised, or was perverse or obstinate; and I certainly did come to the conclusion, when I heard Mr. Graham Hastings upon the point, that this was not in substance Mrs. Venables' appeal. Now, what was the court to do? It struck me, and I use a word which I have used before to-day, as no other word will properly describe it—as cruel in such an appeal as this, as we had to dismiss the appeal, that we should make this unfortunate appellant pay the costs. She has only a small annuity of £150 a year, and the costs in this court could not be otherwise than heavy, when the appeal was dismissed. What did we do? We have an officer of this court (I wish to say something about him) who is called the official solicitor. In my judgment the official solicitor is appointed official solicitor to the court in order that a judge, when he sees before him certain matters which he wants investigated, and as regards the absolute accuracy of which counsel is not instructed and has no knowledge whatever, may communicate with him with a view to obtaining information as to where the real truth of the case lies. In this case, and I say it emphatically, although Mr. Hood Barrs chooses to apply the term "dirty work" to Mr. Winterbotham, that term ought not to be applied, because Mr. Winterbotham has faithfully carried out our orders, which orders, considering the position in which we were placed, we were bound to give. Then we find out it is not Mrs. Venables' appeal. It is all very well to say that she had given instructions to Mr. Hood Barrs; but what interest had Mrs. Venables in appealing to this court? She had her £8,000 capital set apart for her for the rest of her life; which sum was more than sufficient to pay, whatever might happen, the annuity of £150 a year. Now, Mr. Hood Barrs comes and tells us—and I have no doubt accurately—the attempts he had made to settle after he had been defeated in the House of Lords. He could not get a settlement, and, as has been pointed out by my brother Lindley, this appeal is not brought in the interest of Mrs. Venables at all. It was perfectly immaterial to her, except as regards costs, which way it went; but it was brought for the purpose of coercing, if he could, these charities to come to his terms, and in the letter of the 9th of November, 1895, he says, "I hope ultimately to get a settlement of the appeal, which will be a benefit to me." If there ever was a case in which this order should be worked, it appears to me to be this, and I think the order which my brother Lindley sketched out ought to be made.

RIGBY, L.J.—I will assume for the purpose of my judgment in this case that the conduct of Mr. Hood Barrs down to the time when the order was made for setting aside a sum to provide for this lady's annuity was not only justifiable, but, from the point of view of his client, altogether beneficial, and that in every respect down to that period he was free from blame. The order was made that £8,000 Two-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities should be appropriated to meet an annuity of £150 a year payable to a widow during the term of her life. It was not mentioned in the order that in the improbable—one might almost say the impossible—case of the annuity even being larger than the income produced by that £8,000, she could go upon the £8,000; but at any rate it was shown us in argument that the charities offered to have that made clear upon the face of the order, and that offer, for reasons which we now perfectly comprehend, was declined. I say this because, from Mr. Hood Barrs' own statement, it becomes abundantly clear that he did not think that the £8,000 was an insufficient security. He told us himself, apparently unconscious of the conclusions that would be drawn from what he said, that he was willing after the order was made to come to terms which would release £2,000 out of the £8,000, leaving £6,000, only stipulating that he should be allowed, or rather his client should be allowed, to resort to the capital of the remaining £6,000—terms less advantageous to his client, Mrs. Venables, than those which, I believe, were effectuated by the order, but which at any rate (which for this purpose is more important) were offered by the other side at that time and declined, so that I think it would be absurd to suppose that Mr. Hood Barrs imagined that Mrs. Venables' interests were in any way concerned in this appeal. But we have now made clear, what I must say appeared to me not improbable, at any rate, that Mr. Hood Barrs had a direct personal interest in the matter, or, at any rate, had grounds for believing that if he could get this order, which his client's interest in no way required him to get, reversed on this appeal, his own pocket would be the better for it, because he could impose terms upon the charities which would relieve him, at any rate, from the personal undertaking he had entered into to pay certain costs, which I need not specifically refer to.

That being the position of things, and that being, as we have from Mr. Hood Barrs' own lips, his own appreciation of the case—namely, that Mrs. Venables was sufficiently secured, and that she had no interest, he approaches her and suggests—and a more improper suggestion I venture to say was never made—that she should lend her name to him, coming here to the court as if she were the bonâ fide appellant, on the terms that he should indemnify her against costs, and that he personally should take the benefit of the appeal. It startles one to find that a solicitor, an officer of this court, can come into court and openly avow a transaction of that kind and yet apparently remain unconscious of the absolute impropriety of it. It appears to me that that unconsciousness, if it were not assumed, is a very grave feature of the case.

Mr. Hood Barrs permitted himself to make observations from a high standpoint, as that of a respectable solicitor who had a right to throw aspersions on others who were doing their duty. I wish it to be known—in my judgment, at any rate—it is not the part of a respectable solicitor to induce clients to lend their names for appeals in which they have no interest at all in order that the solicitor himself may gain his own private ends. I look upon such an agreement as an abuse of the practice of the court. Mr. Hood Barrs thought it right to complain of the fact that he was not approached for information. I have formed my own judgment as to the sort of information we should have got from him if he had been allowed to be the go-between between the court and Mrs. Venables. I feel satisfied that we should not have arrived at the true state of things, and I feel certain we should have been altogether disregarding our duty if, in a case of this kind, we had not instructed our officer to find out the facts, which otherwise I feel convinced we should never have known.

I will only say that I think the official solicitor, in doing what he did, in no way exceeded the instructions that were given to him by us, and that he did what was perfectly right and proper; and I protest against the notion that the court is to be bound by any idea of etiquette, or by any theories as to what is respectable between solicitors—to shut its eyes, or rather to shut the door, to information which may be obtained, and which has been obtained, as in this case, and which would never have been obtained if we had not taken the course we did. I consider that if ever there was a case of costs being occasioned improperly this is the case. I concur in the judgment which Lindley, L.J., has delivered—that this is a case in which Mr. Hood Barrs can recover nothing from his client, and that he must repay to her any costs which she is liable to pay under the order of the court already made. The fact that he indemnified her is one of the charges against him. It is no merit that he did it. It was absolutely wrong to do it. After this I hope no solicitor will ever come and say: "I intended what was right; I used the process of the court to bring about what I thought right; and I did it by deceiving the court, in the first instance, into a belief it was not I, acting in my own interest, but an innocent client, who was bringing an appeal which the court has decided to be not only wrong, but altogether without precedent."

In re WHITE AND SMITH'S CONTRACT AND THE VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACT, 1874. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Leaseholds—Sale by auction—Onerous covenants—Non-disclosure by vendor—Constructive notice.

A., at a sale by auction in the City of London, bought from B. certain leasehold property. The lease contained onerous covenants of which no mention was made in the particulars and conditions, nor did the particulars or conditions state that the lease was open for inspection. A. had no actual knowledge of the contents of the lease. B. alleged that A. had had a fair opportunity of obtaining such knowledge, the lease being in fact open to inspection before the sale at the offices of B.'s solicitors in accordance with the usual custom, and being also brought by B.'s solicitor to the sale for inspection. A., however, was ignorant alike of these facts and of the custom.

On a summons by A. under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874,

Held, that A. was entitled to have the contract rescinded.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR MORTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, taken out by the purchaser, asking that the contract of purchase might be rescinded on the ground of the existence of certain onerous covenants and defects of title.

On the 29th of April, 1895, certain leaseholds in Tower-street, St. Martin's-lane, were, along with other property, put up for sale by auction at the Mart, in the City of London, and formed lot 3 at the sale.

The applicant, Mr. John Thomas Smith, attended the sale and became the purchaser of lot 3, and signed a contract in the usual form indorsed on the printed particulars and conditions of sale. These particulars and conditions contained no statement as to the nature of the covenants in the lease nor any notice on the part of the vendors that the lease might be inspected at their solicitors' or elsewhere. Upon the delivery of the abstract it was found (as was not disputed) that the lease contained onerous covenants. By his requisitions on the title the purchaser claimed to have the contract rescinded on the ground of the existence of these covenants, and he also raised other objections to the title. The vendors declined to rescind and failed to remove these other objections, and this summons was taken out in consequence.

Stewart Smith, for the summons.—There is nothing in the advertisements to show that the covenants are onerous. Consequently the purchaser cannot be forced to complete the contract. He had no notice either actual or constructive. An order similar to In re Hargreaves and Thompson's Contract, 34 W. R. 708, 32 Ch. D. 454, should be made.

Hastings, Q.C., and Ashton Cross, for the vendors.—The law is stated in Reeve v. Berridge, 36 W. R. 517, 20 Q. B. D. 523. The purchaser could have seen the lease if he had wished to do so, the same being in fact open for inspection (in accordance with the usual custom) previous to the sale at the offices of the solicitors of the vendors. The purchaser is a person who attends many sales and must have known of the custom.

Stewart Smith, in reply.—The purchaser did not know of the custom, and he had no opportunity of inspecting the lease.

STIRLING, J., stated the facts as above set out, and continued:—At the hearing it was admitted by the vendors that the law applicable to the case is as laid down by the Court of Appeal in Reeve v. Berridge, 20 Q. B. D. 523, pp. 527-8. In my opinion the last paragraph of the judgment establishes that it is primâ facie the duty of the vendor to disclose all that is necessary to protect himself, and not the duty of the purchaser to make inquiry before entering into a contract, and that this is so whether the sale be by public auction or private contract. It seems to me that the Court of Appeal meant to lay down a general rule applicable to all sales, though, no doubt, the practice with reference to sales by private contract was put forward as one of the grounds for the establishment of the rule. It is not pretended that the applicant had any actual knowledge of the contents of the lease, but it is said that he had a fair opportunity of ascertaining its provisions. This is sought to be established from the statements in paragraphs 13-16 of the affidavit of vendors, and paragraph 7 of the affidavit of applicant in reply. Paragraphs 13-16 of the affidavit of the vendors allege that the purchaser has had previous dealings with property in the neighbourhood of the property in question, and was aware that the lease probably contained covenants and conditions of an unusual nature; that the lease was at all reasonable times between the advertisement of the particulars and the date of the sale open for inspection "in accordance with the usual custom" by intending purchasers at the offices of the solicitor of the vendors, whose name and address appeared in the advertisement aforesaid; that the vendors' solicitor was present at the sale and had with him the lease of the property, which was then open for inspection "in accordance with the usual custom"; and that the purchaser was a frequent attendant at sales of property of this description, and was well acquainted with and experienced in all the details of such customs and opportunities for examination.

Paragraph 7 of the affidavit of the applicant in reply says that the applicant did not inspect the lease prior to the sale, was never informed, nor was he aware that the lease was open for his inspection, and that he did not know that the vendors' solicitor was in attendance at the sale. It must be taken to be admitted by the applicant for the purposes of this application that the acts of the respondents spoken of in these paragraphs of their affidavit were "in accordance with the usual custom," and that the applicant knew this. The vendors, however, fail to say what means of knowledge they have on the subject of this alleged custom, or what the nature of the custom is, or how far it extends. It is well known to be a common practice for vendors to deposit the lease with their solicitors or elsewhere prior to the sale, and to announce the fact in the particulars of sale, and I am quite prepared to believe that in the majority of sales in the City of London this course is adopted. For aught that appears this may be all that is referred to in the respondents' affidavit. At all events the respondents do not venture to pledge themselves that a vendor in the City of London is to be taken to have conformed to this practice unless he gives notice to the contrary, while the applicant expressly says that he was not aware that the lease was open for his inspection, by which I understand him to mean that he was not aware that he was entitled as of right to see the lease, or that he would not be met with a refusal if he applied to see it before the sale.

The question then arises whether a purchaser under such circumstances ought to be fixed with constructive notice of the contents of the lease. The circumstances under which a purchaser without actual knowledge of a state of facts ought to be held to have constructive notice of it have been recently considered by the Court of Appeal in Baily v. Barnes, 42 W. R. 66, [1894] 1 Ch. 25, and one test there laid down appears to be whether inquiry ought to have been made as a matter of prudence, having regard to what is usually done by men of business under similar circumstances. In the application of this test all the circumstances of the case must be taken into consideration. I can well imagine cases in which the court might hold that a purchaser had failed to take reasonable precautions if he did not avail himself of an opportunity or even a possible opportunity of examining a lease; as, for example, where knowledge was brought home to him of the existence of similar covenants in leases of adjoining portions of the same estate. If, however, it be (as I think it is) the duty of the vendor to disclose the state of his title, and not the duty of the purchaser to inquire into it, and if the purchaser's attention is not called to the possible existence of onerous covenants, either by the vendor himself or by information otherwise acquired, I think that a business man of ordinary caution might abstain from examining a lease in the absence of any intimation on the part of the vendor that he will not be met with a refusal if he applies to examine the lease before the sale. Now, the applicant, in his affidavit, says that he has never had any experience of sales or other dealings with property in the neighbourhood of St. Martin's-lane, that he did not know that leases of property in that neighbourhood contained or were likely to contain onerous or special covenants and conditions, that he had no opportunity of examining the lease, that it was not a condition of sale that he should acquaint himself with the contents of the lease, and consequently he did not do so. In these circumstances I think that it is not made out that the applicant had a fair opportunity of inspecting the lease within the meaning of the rule laid down in Reeve v. Berridge, and consequently that he is entitled to the relief for which he asks.

In re HANCOCK.
MALCOLM v. BURFORD-HANCOCK. (a.)

Power—Appointment—Execution—Irrevocable appointment "subject" to a prior appointment—Failure of prior appointment.

A settlement contained a power enabling the tenant for life to appoint the trust funds in favour of his children, subject to a proviso enabling him to appoint, on the determination of his life interest, one-fourth of the income of the trust funds to "his wife" for her life. The tenant for life, in exercise of his powers, irrevocably appointed "one-fourth of the income of the trust funds," upon the determination of his life interest, to his wife for life, if she should then be living, and appointed the trust funds to his children, subject to his own life interest, and "subject and without prejudice to the appointment" in favour of his wife "if the same should take effect." His wife subsequently died, and on his remarriage he purported to appoint one-fourth of the income of the trust funds in favour of his second wife for her life. His second wife survived him.

Held, that the power to appoint to his wife was a power to appoint to any wife of his, not necessarily a first or a then existing wife; but that the appointment in favour of the children being expressed to be subject to the appointor's life interest, and subject and without prejudice to the appointment in favour of his first wife, was subject only to those two prior interests, and precluded him from making any appointment in favour of the second wife.

By a deed dated the 13th of March, 1872, a moiety of a sum of £28,000 consolidated stock and of certain shares of residuary, real, and personal estate was appointed to trustees on trust to pay the income to Sir Henry J. B. Burford-Hancock for life, with remainder to his child or children in such shares and in such manner as he should "by any deed or deeds with or without power of revocation and new appointment appoint," with a proviso to the effect that it should be lawful for him by deed, or by will or codicil, to appoint, after the determination of his life interest, one-fourth part of the income of the trust funds to "his wife" for her life "upon such conditions and with such restrictions" as he should "think fit."

At the date of the execution of this deed Sir Henry was married to his first wife, to whom, by a deed poll dated the 26th of January, 1885, he, in exercise of the above power, irrevocably appointed one-fourth part of the income of the trust funds for her life, upon the determination of his life interest, "if she should then be living," and by the same deed he appointed one-third of the trust funds to each of his three children, subject to his life interest in the income, and "subject and without prejudice to the appointment" in favour of his wife "if the same shall take effect"; the deed contained, however, a power of revocation and new appointment with reference to the one-third share appointed to his youngest child.

By a deed poll dated the 25th of December, 1892, and supplemental to the deed of 1885, Sir Henry revoked the appointment made to his youngest child, and irrevocably reappointed the same share to the same child.

Sir Henry's first wife died in 1893.

By a deed poll made upon his marriage with his second wife, and dated the 23rd of March, 1895, Sir Henry appointed one-fourth part of the income of the trust funds to his second wife for her life upon the determination of his life interest, if she should be then living.

Sir Henry died on the 23rd of October, 1895.

This summons, taken out by the trustees, raised the question whether or no the appointment in favour of Sir Henry J. B. Burford-Hancock's second wife was a valid exercise of the power of appointment in favour of "his wife," given to him by the deed of the 13th of March, 1872.

C. E. E. Jenkins, for the trustees.

Austen Cartmell, for Lady Hancock.—"Wife" means any wife of Sir Henry Hancock; further the power to jointure overrules the power to portion (Sugden on Powers, 8th edition, pp. 484-490), and the children's interest is still subject to that power of jointure. Moreover, this is merely a division between the children stating what proportions they are to take.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the children.—A devise or bequest to the wife of A. is confined to that particular wife: Jarman on Wills, 5th ed., p. 303; Re Parrott, Walter v. Parrott, 34 W. R. 553, 33 Ch. D. 274. That is in the case of a will. This case is stronger because it is a settlement. Here the power of appointing is gone because the donee has done something inconsistent with power: Farwell on Powers, 2nd edition, p. 15; Smith v. Death, 5 Madd. 371. The two points are (1) "wife" here means the first, i.e., the existing, wife; (2) if that is not so, then Sir Henry, by appointing in favour of his children, precluded himself from appointing in favour of his second wife.

Austen Cartmell, in reply.—Re Parrott was a pure question of construction. The meaning of "wife" is not cut down to first or then existing wife: Isaac v. Hughes, L. R. 9 Eq. 191, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 124.

KEKEWICH, J., after dealing with a preliminary point and holding that the power was well created, continued:—There is a power in the settlement given to Sir Henry Hancock to appoint, after his death, that one-fourth share of the income of the fund shall be paid to his wife for her life, under such restrictions as he shall think fit.

Now, the first point is, How is that to be construed? This power is inserted by way of proviso, according to what I apprehend to be the common form—that is to say, Sir Henry Hancock's share is given to two trustees. They are to hold it in trust, to invest and to pay him the interest during his life and determinable on alienation, and then, after his death, it is to go to the children according to appointment, or in default of appointment among the children equally in the usual way at twenty-one or marriage, and with a proviso for hotchpot and powers, all working out in the ordinary settlement of personal estate as in a marriage settlement, except that here there is no provision for the wife; and then superadded to that there comes a proviso that he shall have power to appoint in favour of his wife to the extent of one-fourth. It is in as common form as one can well conceive.

Quite apart from the authorities which Mr. Cartmell cited from Sugden on Powers, where the law is well laid down respecting the powers of jointuring and apportioning, it seems to me that this power must be construed to apply to any wife of Sir Henry Hancock, whether then existing or after taken. I think it is safer to put it in that way than to invoke the law relating to jointuring and powers, which relate to real property settlements, and which certainly have this distinction, that they operate to create new estates, as to which different considerations may apply. At any rate I put them aside, and treat it upon the construction of a deed of this character.

It so happens that Sir Henry Hancock was then married; he had a wife, and if there had been a recital of that fact, a difficulty it seems to me would possibly have followed, which would have depended upon the language of the recital introducing different intentions. But in the absence of any recital it seems to me this ought to be construed as a power given to him to provide for a wife, not necessarily a wife then living, and not necessarily the first wife he should then marry. That seems to me to be the result. The only case cited against that is Walter v. Parrott, before the Court of Appeal. That seems to be the case of the construction of a particular will, and the words of that will strongly pointed to the particular husband as the person referred to, not to a husband generally. Upon that point, therefore, I am in favour of Lady Hancock.

The other point is a much more difficult one; it arises upon the deed of the 26th of January, 1885. Then Sir Henry Hancock was still married to the first Lady Hancock, and he had three children. By this deed he exercised both powers. First, he appointed one-fourth to the then Lady Hancock, subject to his life interest, and then he proceeded to appoint the fund among his children. As regards the appointment to one child he reserved the power of revocation, but that power of revocation was afterwards itself revoked, and so I may treat it as having become really an irrevocable appointment as regards all the children. It was done in a peculiar way; he first exercises his power in favour of Lady Hancock; then it is subject to and without prejudice to the trusts in his own favour; and then, "subject to and without prejudice" to the trusts in favour of the said Lady Hancock thereinbefore declared, he appointed in thirds among the children.

The argument in favour of the present Lady Hancock, who took under the exercise (by the deed of 1895) of the power, is that you must read this into the settlement, and that the power of appointment in favour of the wife still overrides the power exercised in favour of the children, who must be taken to have had their interests given to them subject only to the exercise of that power. There, again, comes in the consideration of the law of real property, and settlements and powers of jointuring and apportioning; and they are, as Mr. Cartmell has said, somewhat akin.

But there seems to be also another principle which I ought to apply. Nothing could have been easier than for the settlor, the appointor here, to have saved the power which, in my view, he still had of making an appointment in favour of an after-taken wife. No doubt the possibility was not then contemplated; and nothing of the kind is said; and he does appoint in favour of the then Lady Hancock, and in favour of his children subject to that appointment to Lady Hancock. He does not say subject only to that, but it is subject to that express appointment.

Then something was said in argument about a release or an implied release. I do not think that is the right way of putting it on behalf of the respondents, the children. What is said is that I ought to apply the principle that no one is allowed to derogate from his own grant. That principle is equally applicable to appointments as to actual grants, and it has been over and over again applied, and Mr. Renshaw has cited some illustrations upon the point.

It seems to me that if I were to hold that the appointment to the present Lady Hancock is good, I should be in effect saying that Sir Henry Hancock has introduced a limitation in priority to the children; whereas he has expressly said here that there is no such limitation, it is not actually introduced at all.

Mr. Cartmell argued that it is only a division of the fund among the children, but it is an irrevocable division for their benefit, and there is nothing to prevent the children raising money, making settlements on their marriage, or otherwise dealing with their shares. That they have not done so seems to me to be immaterial. There is this provision made for them, and it seems to me I should be going against the principle to which I have referred if I allowed Sir Henry Hancock, through the present Lady Hancock, to say: "Although I have made that provision in order that you (the children) may go out into the world having that provision made for you at a certain time, yet I now say that to a certain extent your interest shall be postponed."

On that principle I think the claim of Lady Hancock fails.

VESTRY OF ST. LEONARD'S, SHOREDITCH, v. PHELAN. (a.)

Metropolis — Drain — Sewer — Combined drain — Pipe draining two houses — Disconnection of one of the houses — Nuisance — Liability of Vestry — Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 68, 69, 250.

A pipe, prior to 1895, drained two houses. It was not proved when the combined drain was constructed, or that it was made under the order of the Vestry. In 1895, in compliance with a notice of the Vestry complaining of a nuisance, the owner of one of the houses cut off his drainage from the pipe in question, which thereupon only drained one instead of two houses. Shortly afterwards the respondent, who was the owner of the other house, received a notice from the Vestry under section 4 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, stating that a nuisance existed, and requiring him to abate it. Upon the respondent refusing to comply with this notice, the Vestry took out a summons against him.

Held, that the pipe in question was, prior to 1895, a sewer, not a drain; that when once a pipe becomes a sewer it always remains a sewer; that such sewer remained vested in the Vestry, there being no statutory provision divesting them of it; and consequently, that the Vestry, not the respondent, was bound to abate the nuisance.

Case stated by J. Bros, Esq., one of the metropolitan police magistrates.

This was an appeal by the Vestry of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, against an order of the said magistrate dismissing a summons taken out by them against the respondent complaining of a nuisance that existed on his premises, and asking for an order for its abatement.

On the hearing of the summons the following facts appeared in evidence:—

In the rear of No. 42, Westmoreland-place (the respondent's premises) is situate a house known as 36, Nile-street, this latter house being contiguous to the back wall of the yard belonging to 42, Westmoreland-place. Prior to April, 1895, the watercloset and sink of No. 36, Nile-street, adjoined, but did not communicate, with the said yard of No. 42, Westmoreland-place and a watercloset situate therein belonging to 42, Westmoreland-place. The said premises were not within the same curtilage. The alleged drain referred to in the summons was a pipe which, after taking the sewage from the watercloset of No. 42, Westmoreland-place, passed under part of the premises of No. 36, Nile-street, took the sewage from the watercloset and waste water and sink of No. 36, Nile-street, and, after again passing the respondent's premises, emptied into the main sewer under the roadway of Westmoreland-place. The said pipe did not carry the drainage of any other house except No. 36, Nile-street, and 42, Westmoreland-place. It was not proved at what date the houses or waterclosets or the combined drainage were constructed or made, but they were proved to be ancient. It was not proved that the combined drainage was made under the order of the appellant Vestry, or pursuant to the order or direction, or with the sanction or approval, of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers.

In April, 1895, the owner of No. 36, Nile-street, removed the watercloset and sink of that house, and constructed another in the yard in the rear of No. 40, Westmoreland-place (also his property), to the drainage of which house he connected it. Thus, as soon as this work was completed, which was before the 19th of April, 1895, the pipe draining the watercloset of 42, Westmoreland-place, was a pipe only draining that one house, instead of two as formerly. It was proved that the owner of 36, Nile-street, had made this alteration at the instance of the sanitary inspector of the appellants, and pursuant to an intimation in writing in that behalf addressed to him by the appellants, and signed and served upon him by their said inspector, and purporting to be under section 3 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, but without being compelled to do so by legal proceedings. The said intimation was served upon the owner of No. 36, Nile-street, after an intimation on a similar form had been served on the respondent with reference to the part of the pipe upon his premises, in answer to which the respondent had alleged the pipe to be a sewer.

On the 10th of May, 1895, a statutory notice, under section 4 of the said Public Health (London) Act, 1891, was served on the respondent as owner of No. 42, Westmoreland-place, by the appellants, stating that a nuisance existed at the said premises by reason of a defective drain, and requiring him to alter or amend the drain as might be found necessary, and fit the same with proper pipes, traps, and bends, and junctions to secure safe working; and the notice stated that if default were made in complying with the requisitions thereof, a summons would be issued for the purpose of enforcing the abatement of the nuisance complained of.

This notice was not complied with by the respondent, and on the 22nd of May the said summons was issued.

The appellants contended, first, that the said drain, prior to April, 1895, was a drain made for draining a group or block of houses by combined operation under the order of a vestry, because, although no evidence was given that such order had actually been made, yet, as the drain was constructed many years ago, at this distance of time it must be presumed that everything connected with the laying had been lawfully done, and therefore that such an order had been made by the Vestry, otherwise the making of the drain was a wrongful act under section 76 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, which prohibits any drains being laid without the sanction of the vestry. They also contended that the respondent should not be allowed to set up the assumption that such wrongful act had been committed, as that would enable a wrongdoer to profit by his wrong. Secondly, the appellants contended alternatively that if it was held that the alleged drain was a sewer before April, 1895, yet it was not a sewer at the date of the aforesaid notice, because it was then only draining the closet of No. 42, Westmoreland-place, the drain from the closet and sink of No. 36, Nile-street, having been previously disconnected; and they contended that the words used in the interpretation clause (section 250) of the said Act indicated that the condition of things at the time of the proceedings must be looked at, and it was immaterial that the said drain might at one time have drained more than one building; and that as it was then used for the drainage of one building only, it came within the definition of "drain" in the interpretation clause, and was therefore repairable by the owner, and not by the local authority.

The respondent contended that she was not liable to alter or amend the said alleged drain, but that the same was a sewer vested in and repairable by the appellants under sections 68, 69, and 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, inasmuch as it had not been proved to be a drain for draining any group or block of houses by a combined operation under the order of the appellant Vestry, or pursuant to the order or direction, or with the sanction or approval, of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers; that it could not cease to be a sewer and become a drain within the meaning of the above sections by reason of the disconnection of the watercloset and sink of No. 36, Nile-street, under the circumstances hereinbefore set out.

The learned magistrate decided that, having regard to the provisions of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), and of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), as to the construction and maintenance of drains and sewers, the alleged drain was a sewer, and he held that it was therefore vested in and repairable by the appellants, and not by the respondent, and he refused to make an order requiring the respondent to alter and amend the alleged drain.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, upon the facts proved, the magistrate ought, as a matter of law, to have found the pipe to be a drain within the meaning of section 250 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (C. E. Allan with him), for the appellants.—At the time the summons was taken out this pipe only drained one house, and therefore it was then a drain. The magistrate, when determining such a question as here raised, must look at the actual state of facts existing at the time when the summons is taken out. The pipe exists exclusively for the benefit of this house. The contention that if a pipe once becomes a sewer it is always a sewer is untenable. A great responsibility would be thrown upon the magistrate if he were obliged to ascertain former circumstances and facts. If the pipe ceases to be used for the drainage of more than one house, it ceases to be a sewer. There is no need for a statutory provision for divesting the vestry of a sewer when it becomes a drain: see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 69; Kershaw v. Taylor, ante, p. 28, [1895] 2 Q. B. 208, 471.

G. Rowlatt, for the respondent.—The case of Kershaw v. Taylor is not in point. In that case the owner obtained permission to make two combined drains for the four houses; but, instead of that being done, the builder he employed made only one combined drain for all the houses. When once a pipe becomes a sewer it always remains a sewer. The vestry then obtains the right of entering on the premises in order to repair the sewer. It cannot become a drain again, for there is no statutory power enabling the vestry to divest themselves of it, and without such power the vestry cannot get rid of their liability to maintain and repair it.

Counsel also referred to Travis v. Uttley, 42 W. R. 461, [1894] 1 Q. B. 233, and Bateman v. Poplar Board of Works, 36 W. R. 501, 37 Ch. D. 272.

DAY, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. I think the magistrate was quite right in the decision he arrived at. It clearly appears from the facts as stated in the case that at one time this pipe carried away the drainage of two houses—36, Nile-street as well as 42, Westmoreland-place; and such a pipe is deemed to be a sewer. The pipe, therefore, being a sewer, vested in the parish authorities, who are bound to keep it in repair. We find, however, that the Vestry allowed it to get so out of repair that a nuisance arose. They thereupon decided to get an order to abate such nuisance, and instructed their sanitary inspector to serve an intimation in writing on the owner of 36, Nile-street, in consequence of which intimation the owner removed his closet and sink and connected them with the drainage of another house, and cut off his drainage from 42, Westmoreland-place. This being done, the Vestry served a statutory notice under section 4 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, on the owner of 42, Westmoreland-place stating that a nuisance existed, and requiring him to abate it. They said the pipe had become a drain, and that the owner was liable, and they asked the magistrate to inflict penalties upon the owner for omitting to keep the alleged drain in repair. This the magistrate absolutely refused to do, and rightly so. This pipe still remained a sewer, though it no longer carried away the drainage from any other house than 42, Westmoreland-place. In my opinion, once a drain becomes a sewer it remains a sewer; I will not say it always remains a sewer, but it remains a sewer so long as it is used for drainage purposes. On becoming a sewer it vested in the local authorities, and, in my judgment, has never ceased to vest in them. There is no enactment divesting them of it on its ceasing to answer the statutory definition of a sewer. This appeal must therefore fail.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question we really have to decide is whether the pipe was a drain so as to make the owner of No. 42, Westmoreland-place, liable. Section 68 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, is the governing factor in determining this question. That section provides that all sewers, except main sewers, made and to be made within any parish or district specified in the schedule, shall be vested in the vestry of such parish or in the board of works for such district. So long as the sewer remains vested in the vestry, the various steps provided in the Act to make the owner of the property liable cannot be taken. I think you want express words to change the ownership, and divest the local authorities of the sewer on its ceasing to drain more than one house. There is no such provision in the Act, and in my opinion the sewer remains vested in the Vestry. As an instance, take the case where four or five houses are constructed with one combined drain for all of them, and suppose that after a time only one of these houses is left connected with this drain, all the others being cut off. Would it not be unreasonable to say that such drain ceased to be a sewer, and so saddle the owner of the remaining one house with the repair and maintenance of a system of drainage suitable for four or five houses? In my opinion, this drain once having been vested in the Vestry as a sewer remains so vested.

As to another point raised by the appellant, I think that there can be no presumption that the consent of the local authorities was given to the construction of a combined drain, if evidence be forthcoming that the drain was constructed before the law required that such consent should be given. It is therefore impossible for us to say that the authorities gave their sanction to the construction of the sewer in question.

Revenue—Excise—Dog tax—Shepherds' dogs—Certificate of exemption—Jurisdiction of magistrates—Offence of trifling nature—30 & 31 Vict. c. 5, s. 8—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 Vict. c. 15), s. 22—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 16.

Justices have no jurisdiction to review the decision of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue refusing to grant a certificate of exemption from the dog tax under section 22 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878. They cannot refuse to convict the owner of a dog who has neither a licence nor a certificate of exemption on the ground that he is in their opinion entitled to such a certificate, and that his offence is therefore of a trifling nature within the meaning of section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

Case stated by justices of the county of Cardigan.

An information was preferred against the respondent by the appellant, an officer of Inland Revenue, for the recovery of a penalty imposed by section 8 of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 5, as altered and amended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, in respect of keeping a dog without the excise licence required for the keeping thereof.

It was proved that the respondent kept a dog and had neither an excise licence nor a certificate of exemption under section 22 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878; and that he had applied for such a certificate, and delivered the declaration required by that section, and that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue had refused to grant the certificate on the ground that in their judgment he was not entitled to receive it.

The justices then, overruling the objection of counsel for the appellant, admitted evidence tendered with the object of showing that the respondent was a person to whom a certificate of exemption ought to have been granted.

They found "that the respondent was a person who under the provisions of section 22 was entitled to receive a certificate of exemption, and though the charge might, in the absence of such certificate of exemption have been considered as proved, were of opinion, under the circumstances stated, that the alleged offence was of so trifling a nature that it was inexpedient to inflict any punishment"; they therefore dismissed the information.

The questions for the opinion of the court were:—

(1) Whether, upon the facts found by them, the decision of the justices was correct in point of law.

(2) Whether, as the respondent had neither a licence to keep a dog nor a certificate of exemption, they were bound to convict him of the offence charged in the information.

The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, enacts:—

"In the case of dogs kept and used solely for the purpose of tending sheep or cattle on a farm or in the exercise of the calling or occupation of a shepherd exemption from duty may be obtained by the owners of such dogs in the following manner:

(1) The Commissioners of Inland Revenue shall cause such forms of declaration to be prepared as may be required for carrying out the purposes of this section.

(2) The owner, whether a farmer or shepherd, may fill up and sign a declaration in the prescribed form . . . and, upon delivering the declaration so filled up and signed by him to the person named therein as the person to whom the same is to be delivered, he shall be entitled to receive a certificate of exemption from duty in respect of the dog or dogs, not exceeding two in number, kept by him solely for use in tending sheep or cattle or in the exercise of the calling or occupation of a shepherd."

Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, enacts:—

"If upon the hearing of a charge for an offence punishable on summary conviction under this Act, or under any other Act, whether past or future, the court of summary jurisdiction think that though the charge is proved the offence was in the particular case of so trifling a nature that it is inexpedient to inflict any punishment or any other than a nominal punishment—

(1) The court without proceeding to conviction may dismiss the information. . . ."

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the appellant.—The justices had no jurisdiction to review the refusal of the commissioners to grant a certificate of exemption: Graham v. Haig, 58 J. P. 835; James v. Nicholas, 50 J. P. 292. Upon proof that the respondent kept a dog and had neither a licence nor a certificate of exemption they were bound to convict. The only ground upon which the justices held that the offence was of a trifling nature was that the commissioners ought to have granted a certificate of exemption. This is merely another mode of reviewing the decision of the commissioners, and it was not competent for them to hold the offence to be trifling upon such grounds. The discretion which justices are empowered to exercise under section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, is a judicial discretion, and cannot be exercised in such a way as practically to nullify the provisions of an Act of Parliament: Banton v. Davies, 56 J. P. 294, 40 W. R. Dig. 134.

The respondent did not appear.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Section 22 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, is not very happily worded; it says that in certain circumstances a person "shall be entitled" to receive a certificate of exemption. But I think the meaning is clear that an owner of a dog who can produce neither a licence nor a certificate of exemption must pay the penalty if proceedings are taken against him.

The point arising upon the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, is far more difficult. [His lordship read section 16 (1), and continued:—] Now, the justices first found that the respondent kept a dog and had no licence and no certificate of exemption; they also found that he was a person who was entitled to receive a certificate of exemption; they dismissed the information because they were of opinion that no offence had been committed, and that if there was an offence it was of so trifling a nature that it was inexpedient to inflict any punishment. If they had said that if the respondent then paid for a licence they would not convict, I do not think that we could interfere. But what they have held is that it is a trifling matter for a man to say that he will not pay a tax which has been imposed by the Legislature. We therefore hold that it was not in law a trifling matter, and that the justices had no jurisdiction to say that a man need not pay a lawful tax. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear to my mind that the justices had no jurisdiction to review the decision of the commissioners refusing to grant a certificate of exemption. They found that the respondent was entitled to a certificate; in so finding they completely exceeded their jurisdiction; they are not made the judges of this, nor had they before them the evidence upon which the commissioners decided to refuse the certificate.

The rest of their finding I understand to be that under the circumstances, although the respondent had no certificate and was therefore, primâ facie, liable to pay the tax, it was a trifling matter. The "circumstances" are that the respondent was in their opinion entitled to a certificate. Although the respondent refused to pay the tax, the justices held that his offence is a trifling matter. I cannot think that any sensible person can say that it is trifling. I think that the justices were wrong in law in so holding. The case did not fall within section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, and the justices were bound to convict.

Appeal allowed.

HEWITT v. TAYLOR. (a.)

Adulteration—Milk—Evidence — Analyst's certificate—Evidence of the defendant—Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 21.

In proceedings under the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, the certificate of the analyst is not conclusive evidence of the facts therein stated, even when the defendant has not required the analyst to be called as a witness.

Case stated by the justices of Mossley.

Taylor was summoned under section 6 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for selling on the 26th of April, 1895, as new milk a substance which had had six parts of water added to every hundred parts of the poorest new milk.

A pint of milk was purchased from Taylor for analysis. The analysts' certificate was as follows:—"We, the undersigned public analysts for the county of Lancaster do hereby certify that we received on the 26th of April, 1895, from P.C. Bridge a sample of new milk for analysis (which was then marked No. 834), and have analysed the same, and declare the result of our analysis to be as follows:—We are of opinion that the said sample contained the parts as under: 2·94 per cent. fat, 7·98 per cent. other solids=10·92 per cent. total solids, and that upwards of six parts of water have been added to every hundred parts of the poorest milk. Observations: No change had taken place in the constitution of the sample that would interfere with the analysis."

Taylor pleaded "not guilty," but did not require the analysts, or either of them, to be called as witnesses. He tendered himself as a witness, and stated that on the day of the purchase by the appellant the milk of two cows was put into the can from which the purchase was made, and there was no water in the can when he began to milk the cows; that he milked the cows himself, and that he added no water afterwards, and no person but himself had control of the can from the time the milk was put there till the time of the sale to the appellant. He stated, further, that one of the cows referred to had calved on the 9th of April, and for some time subsequent to that and prior to the 26th of April he had noticed that her milk was of poor quality.

The magistrates, having considered the whole of the facts, and having regard to the respondent's denial and to the difficulty of determining an exact standard when adulteration by means of added water begins, and to the fact that one of their number formerly owned the cow which the respondent stated gave poor milk and knew that that was so, dismissed the summons.

Section 21 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, is as follows: "At the hearing of the information in such proceeding the production of the certificate of the analyst shall be sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated, unless the defendant shall require that the analyst shall be called as a witness; and the parts of the article retained by the person who purchased the article shall be produced, and the defendant may, if he think fit, tender himself and his wife to be examined on his behalf, and he or she shall, if he so desire, be examined accordingly.

Clay, for the appellant.—As the respondent did not require either of the analysts to be called as a witness, the certificate must be taken to be sufficient evidence of the facts stated therein in accordance with the provisions of section 21: Harrison v. Richards, 45 J. P. 552.

F. Newbolt, for the respondent, was not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This question turns upon the true construction of section 21. The analysts, in their certificate, stated that there was 6 per cent. of added water. That was what the analysts chose to say.

The respondent gives evidence upon which the magistrates were satisfied that no water was in fact added. But the appellant says that the magistrates were bound to accept the evidence of the certificate as conclusive. That depends on section 21. But the section only says that the certificate shall be sufficient evidence of the facts stated therein. It does not say it shall be conclusive. The section means that the respondent may be examined to show that there has been some mistake. The magistrates were entitled to act on that evidence, and to weigh it against the evidence of the certificate.

KAY, L.J.—There was evidence given on both sides, and the magistrate decided that no water was added. It was a simple question of fact. Section 21 does not mean that the certificate is to be conclusive evidence; it only says that it is to be sufficient evidence.

The defendant or his wife were entitled to give evidence showing that the certificate was inaccurate. They did so, and it thereupon became the magistrates' duty to weigh the evidence, and come to a conclusion of fact.

FORTUNE (Appellant) v. HANSON (Respondent). (a.)

Adulteration — Milk — Added water — Certificate of analyst—Bare statement of result of analysis—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 6, 18, 21—Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30), s. 3.

In a prosecution under the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for the adulteration of milk, the analyst certified that the sample "contained 5 per cent. of added water."

Held, that such certificate was insufficient evidence of adulteration, because, water being one of the natural constituents of milk, the certificate should have stated what standard of percentage of water in milk was adopted by the analyst in arriving at the excess of 5 per cent. which he stated was added.

Special case stated by a stipendiary metropolitan magistrate.

An information was preferred by the appellant, an inspector of nuisances for St. Mary, Islington, against the respondent at Clerkenwell Police Court. The offence charged was that Hanson did sell and proceed to deliver on the 24th of April, 1895, to Elias Jones a churn of milk in pursuance of a contract to sell, the same not being of the nature, substance, and quality of the milk demanded by the purchaser, in that it contained 5 per cent. of added water contrary to section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and of section 3 of the amending Act of 1879.

The churn of milk, to which was attached a warranty in writing, was sold to Jones by Hanson on the 24th of April. The inspector of nuisances procured a sample of the milk and had it analysed by the public analyst, who gave his certificate in the form set out in the schedule of the Act filled in (so far as is here material) as follows: "I . . . do hereby certify that I received on the 25th day of April, 1895, from Mr. Fortune a sample of milk marked as above for analysis (which then weighed 20oz.) and have analysed the same, and declare the results of my analysis to be as follows: I am of opinion that the said sample contained percentages of foreign ingredients as under—5 per cent. of added water to the prejudice of the purchaser."

This certificate was objected to as being bad evidence, on the ground that it did not set out as the results of the analysis what the analyst considered to be the normal proportion of water in pure milk.

The magistrate rejected the certificate as bad and dismissed the information, but granted this case at the request of the appellant.

Macmorran, for the appellant.—The certificate is sufficiently explicit. It states that a foreign substance has been introduced into the milk—namely, 5 per cent of added water. If the respondent desires further particulars of the analysis, he has power to call the analyst and cross-examine him.

Morton Smith, for the respondent.—The certificate is bad, for the charge here is not one of abstraction, but of addition, and therefore the constituent parts of the article analysed must appear in the certificate: Bakewell v. Davis, [1894] 1 Q. B. 296, and Newby v. Sims, [1894] 1 Q. B. 478, 38 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 202. Water, to a greater or less extent, exists in pure milk, and the presence of water in milk does not per se show that a foreign substance has necessarily been introduced. What proportion of water should be deemed to exist in a given quantity of pure milk has not yet been agreed upon. The certificate must contain such information that if unchallenged would enable the magistrate to decide the case without further evidence being given.

Macmorran, in reply.—The case of Newby v. Sims is no authority when the article adulterated with water is milk, for milk is placed on a different footing to other articles by the Amending Act of 1879. The certificate is only intended to be primâ facie evidence, and is in the form required by the Act: Harrison v. Richards, 45 J. P. 552. The magistrate ought, therefore, to have accepted it as evidence.

HAWKINS, J.—It seems to me that the certificate is not sufficient for the purpose the Act of Parliament requires it to be given. It was admitted that in all milk in its normal state there is a certain proportion of water, and it has not been shown to my satisfaction that there is any known method by which the water that has been added to the milk can be distinguished from the water which naturally exists in the milk itself. It was argued that if any substance was found by the analyst to have been added, a bare statement to that effect was sufficient. That may or may not be the case where the added ingredient is such a "foreign" substance that it could not possibly exist in the article in a natural state—for instance, if pepper were found to be present in the sample of milk analysed; but that is not the question we have to decide here. It is the duty of the magistrate in cases of this kind to determine whether or not the charge has been made out, and he cannot do so on the evidence of the analyst, unless his certificate sets out the standard made use of as the basis of his calculations. If it were not so, the magistrate might have one standard of percentages in his mind, while the analyst might have in fact used another. The bare statement that so much percentage of added water was found in the sample of milk is a mere statement of opinion. With regard to the form of the certificate, it is the analyst's duty merely to analyse and report the result of the analysis. So far as he states in due form that result, and does not report extraneous facts not connected with the analysis, his certificate is good evidence for the magistrate to act upon. Indeed, in many cases the certificate is practically conclusive evidence, unless it is challenged by the defendant, who may require the analyst to be called. It is the magistrate's duty, therefore, to decide whether the certificate is good evidence or not, and in the present case the magistrate was right in refusing to convict on the evidence of this certificate.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. Great power is given by the Act as to the use to be made of the certificate of the analyst. Speaking for myself, and in no way expressing an opinion whether or not water added to milk is a foreign substance within the meaning of those words in the Act of 1875, I think that a certificate to be evidence must not merely state the bare result arrived at by the analyst, but must also furnish all the data required by the magistrate to decide the question, without it being necessary for him on that point to call further evidence. While I decline to say what may and what may not be a foreign substance, I should like to say that in my opinion it makes all the difference in deciding that point whether the presence of a certain amount of the substance alleged to have been added is necessarily present in the article or not; and the same consideration applies in deciding the sufficiency of the certificate.

The court has no jurisdiction under sub-section (3) of section 8 to order any person to attend and be publicly examined unless the official receiver has, in addition to the preliminary report mentioned in sub-section (1), made a "further report or further reports" in the terms of sub-section (2) stating matters showing that in his opinion a fraud has been committed by the person sought to be examined.

Ex parte Barnard, In re Great Kruger Gold Mining Co., 40 W. R. 625, 641, [1892] 3 Ch. 307, explained.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and Kay, L.JJ.) dated the 29th of May, 1895, affirming an order of Vaughan Williams, J., which refused an ex parte application of the appellant, who is the official receiver under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, for an order directing the attendance for examination pursuant to section 8, sub-section (3) of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, of the persons named in the schedule to the official receiver's report.

The winding-up order was made on the 7th of November, 1894, and on the 11th of March, 1895, the official receiver made his preliminary report under sub-section (1) of section 8 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, in which he stated his opinion that further inquiry was desirable as to the conduct of the business, and in particular as to the character of the investments of capital and the insufficient record of large payments made. But the official receiver had made no "further report" under sub-section (2) of section 8.

Vaughan Williams, J., made no order upon the application, considering that a "further report" under sub-section (2) of section 8 was necessary; and this was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

The official receiver appealed.

The case turned upon the construction of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, s. 8, which pro vides so far as is material as follows:—

Sub-section (1): "Where the court has made an order for winding up a company, the official receiver shall, as soon as practicable after receipt of the statement of the company's affairs, submit a preliminary report to the court:

(a) As to the amount of capital issued, subscribed, and paid up, and the estimated amount of assets and liabilities; and

(b) If the company has failed, as to the causes of the failure; and

(c) Whether in his opinion further inquiry is desirable as to any matter relating to the promotion, formation, or failure of the company, or the conduct of the business thereof.

Sub-section (2): "The official receiver may also, if he thinks fit, make a further report, or further reports, stating the manner in which the company was formed, and whether in his opinion any fraud has been committed by any person in the promotion or formation of the company, or by any director or other officer of the company in relation to the company since the formation thereof, and any other matters which in his opinion it is desirable to bring to the notice of the court.

Sub-section (3): "The court may, after consideration of any such report, direct that any person who has taken any part in the promotion or formation of the company, or has been a director or officer of the company, shall attend before the court on a day appointed by the court for that purpose, and be publicly examined as to the promotion or formation of the company, or as to the conduct of the business of the company, or as to his conduct and dealings as a director or officer of the company.

Sub-section (7): "The person examined shall be examined on oath, and it shall be his duty to answer all such questions as the court may put, or allow to be put, to him. The person examined shall at his own cost, prior to such examination, be furnished with a copy of the official receiver's report, and shall also at his own cost be entitled to employ at such examination a solicitor with or without counsel, who shall be at liberty to put such questions to the person examined as the court may deem just for the purpose of enabling that person to explain or qualify any answers given by him. Provided always, that if such person is, in the opinion of the court, exculpated from any charges made or suggested against him, the court may allow him such costs as the court in its discretion may think fit."

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Ingle Joyce (W. B. Lindley with them), for the appellant.—This is practically an appeal from Ex parte Barnard, In re The Great Kruger Gold Mining Co. (1), 40 W. R. 625, 641, [1892] 3 Ch. 307. In the Bertram Luipuard's Vlei Gold Mining Co. (3), 40 W. R. 689, 691, [1892] 3 Ch. 332, Lindley, L.J., corrected the language which he had used in Ex parte Barnard.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—I have endeavoured, as well as I could, to keep my mind free from the prejudice which may have existed in it from my memory of what took place at the time of the passing of the Act which we have to construe in this case. I have endeavoured to steel myself against any impression derived from what then took place, and simply to look at the language of the statute as if I had never heard of it before.

I cannot help thinking, with the utmost deference to the judicial opinions that have been given, that the provisions are reasonably plain. The Legislature for very obvious reasons—obvious I mean when one looks at what the course of legislation has been with reference to the formation of companies and the conduct and management of them—thought that there might be cases in which it would be very desirable to have persons, who might be supposed to have some personal interest in the conduct and management of companies, brought to the test of a public examination, and accordingly the Legislature—the court in the first instance having made an order for winding up a company—imposed upon the official receiver a duty as soon as practicable after the receipt of a statement of the company's affairs to submit a preliminary report to the court. That preliminary report was to contain "the amount of capital issued, subscribed, and paid up, and the estimated amount of assets and liabilities." That was an actual duty cast upon the official receiver. If the company had failed, he was to report "as to causes of the failure," and whether in the opinion of the official receiver "further inquiry is desirable as to any matter relating to the promotion, formation, or failure of the company or the conduct of the business thereof." So far there seems to be no difficulty, and no necessity for further exposition of the object and meaning of the legislation that was then arrived at.

But then there came what seems to me to be an absolutely independent and separate set of provisions, and that was that if the official receiver thought fit he was to make a further report. It is left to him to do it if he thinks fit — it is not made necessary for him to do it in every case, but only in such cases as in his judgment demand such a course to be pursued. "If he thinks fit," he is to "make a further report or further reports, stating the manner in which the company was formed, and whether in his opinion any fraud has been committed by any person in the promotion or formation of the company, or by any director or other officer of the company in relation to the company since the formation thereof, and any other matters which in his opinion it is desirable to bring to the notice of the court" (sub-section (2)).

The next sub-section (sub-section (3)), upon which the whole question turns, begins with these words: "The court may, after the consideration of any such report." Now the first question which arises is as to a point on which Mr. Ingle Joyce relies; he says he relies on the literal meaning of the words. I confess, to my mind, reading those words as I have read them, it seems to me reasonably plain that the word "such" there, refers to the last preceding provision, and that what the draftsman was doing was this: After having provided for the general preliminary report which has reference to the status and conduct of the company and its affairs, the draftsman goes on to provide that where a specific report has been made with reference to some person who has committed a fraud (I will say a word presently as to what I mean by "some person") the court is then invested with a new jurisdiction. "The court may, after consideration of any such report, direct that any person who has taken any part in the promotion or formation of the company, or has been a director or officer of the company, shall attend before the court on a day appointed by the court for that purpose, and be publicly examined as to the promotion or formation of the company, or as to the conduct of the business of the company, or as to his conduct and dealings as a director or officer of the company" (sub-section (3)).

Now, in the first place, it is difficult to imagine what can be the sense or meaning of those provisions, unless they have reference to the report which calls attention to the fact that some person has committed a fraud in the promotion or formation of the company, or since the promotion or formation of the company. Those two provisions seem to be correlative. What is the sense or meaning of them unless they are correlative? And if they are, certain consequences are to follow. What are the consequences? At first sight one would say that, if the object is a public examination, and if the public examination is to be upon the subject which has been, by the hypothesis, called to the attention of the court by any such report, the person against whom the allegation is made is naturally the person who is to be brought before the court and examined in respect of it. I mean the broadest possible view of any such legislation would at once suggest that the person who has been reported as guilty of fraud is to be examined, and he must answer—he is to be summoned to answer—upon the subject. Certain consequences follow upon that. If he is summoned, and if he is exculpated, he is to get his costs; if not, he is to be brought there at his own expense. There are provisions whereby, before he is examined, "the person examined shall, at his own cost, prior to such examination, be furnished with a copy of the official receiver's report, and shall, also at his own cost, be entitled to employ at such examination a solicitor with or without counsel, who shall be at liberty to put such questions," and so on. If all these provisions have reference to a person who is incriminated by the report, and who is brought there in the position of a person against whom a suggestion is made that he has been guilty of fraud, the whole system, the whole code thereby created, is intelligible and rational, and one can understand what the meaning of each part of it is; each part of it reflects light upon the rest. But if, because A. has been found guilty—I mean found guilty in a preliminary sense, that is to say, that a preliminary case has been made against him as being guilty of fraud—if because A. has been in that sense incriminated by the official receiver, B. can be summoned, and B. can be made subject to all these consequences, although no preliminary charge of fraud has been made against him at all, the whole thing becomes irrational and unintelligible.

I confess I entertain not the smallest doubt that the meaning of this legislation is that, in order to give the court jurisdiction to make such an order, there must be a finding of fraud and a finding of a fraud against an individual who is by that made subject to being summoned before the court, and is compelled to answer, whether the answer incriminates him or not; but, being exculpated, receives his costs. I confess I am unable, looking at the whole of the legislation on the subject, to entertain the least doubt that that was what the Legislature intended; and I am a little surprised, I confess, that there should have been any doubt that fraud must be found; by which I do not mean that the particular word "fraud" must be used, but that such facts must be found by the official receiver as suggest fraud against the person incriminated, and that there must be an individual person incriminated. It is not that there is a general finding that fraud must have existed somewhere, which would mean nothing; but there must be an individual person pointed to, and in respect of whom all these different provisions, for his protection as well as for his being made an example of, become perfectly reasonable. In the event of there being no fraud found, or in the event of there being no individual pointed out as being suggested to be guilty of fraud, I entertain no doubt that the court has no jurisdiction to make any such order for a public examination.

All the observations that have been addressed to us with reference to the necessity of an inquiry and so forth are disposed of by the mere existence unrepealed of the 115th section in the Act of 1862. There are there ample means of inquiry; no injustice or want of investigation into the affairs of the company can possibly occur if that provision is put into force. This later provision is by itself a kind of penal section against a fraudulent director, officer, or promoter; and, inasmuch as it is directed to that person and to that person alone, it seems to me that it follows as essential to the jurisdiction of the court that there should be a preliminary finding, which is the foundation of that jurisdiction—namely, that fraud has been committed by the individual person who is pointed out by the report; and in the absence of that finding I am of opinion that the court would have no jurisdiction.

Under those circumstances I move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed.

Lord WATSON.—I am of opinion that the court has no statutory jurisdiction to direct a public examination under sub-section 3 except upon consideration of a further report made by the official receiver in terms of sub-section 2. I am also of opinion that the power committed to the court by that sub-section has no application to any one of the persons therein mentioned who is not inculpated in in this sense, and that a primâ facie case of fraud on his part is disclosed by the further report.

I therefore concur in the judgment that has been moved.

Lord HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the natural construction of the words "any such report" in sub-section 3 is to refer them to the report or reports which are mentioned in sub-section 2. But, in addition to that, it seems to me that the other provisions contained in the section make it clear that such must have been the meaning. Sub-section 7 applies to every case in which an order for examination is made; and I think sub-section 7 is only reasonably applicable in the case of a person inculpated in a report of the official receiver. Of course I do not mean for a moment to suggest that the official receiver must use any particular language in the report which he makes under sub-section 2; it must appear from that report that in his opinion a fraud has been committed by A. or B. or C., as the case may be, in order to justify an order for the examination of A. or B. or C. Of course no form of words would be necessary, and although the matter is left to the discretion of the official receiver, I think none the less it would be his duty to exercise that discretion in the particular way of making a report, if in his opinion there were a case of fraud established by the facts against any particular person or persons.

Now these provisions, I think, must be read in the light of the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, which were left existing when this later legislation was passed. The court had the fullest power to summon before it anyone it pleased within the limits specified in section 115 of that Act, which I think would have included any person who could give information that would lead to proceedings for the recovery of money for the benefit of the company. And I think that an object, if not the only object, of the 1st sub-section of this section 8 was to impose on the official receiver at an early period, the duty of bringing before the court information upon certain matters connected with the company which would be very important in guiding the judgment of the court as to the persons who ought to be summoned under section 115. I think there is a purpose amply sufficient to be served by the report under sub-section 1, without supposing that it was intended upon that report to found the proceedings referred to in sub-section 3 and the following sub-sections.

Now, in section 115 of the Act of 1862, although all the persons there referred to might be summoned, they could only be summoned on a tender to them of their reasonable expenses of coming to be examined. When we deal with the provisions of the present Act, which it must be remembered are intended to operate side by side with section 115, we find that the expense in the first instance is cast absolutely upon the person to be examined. He must bear even the expense of knowing what he is to be examined about. The official receiver's report is only to be had upon those terms; and the later provisions (as to which I will say something in a moment), about allowing him costs if he exculpates himself from the charges, show that intention clearly. Now, that is perfectly intelligible if you suppose that the person referred to in sub-section 3 and the subsequent sub-sections is an inculpated person; otherwise it is unintelligible. If he is not a person who is primâ facie to blame, why should he be put to the expense of ascertaining what the charge against him is? why should all the costs be thrown upon him? and why should he not have any expenses tendered to him? It is quite unintelligible why he should be put in that position if he is a person in no way appearing to be inculpated.

When one comes to look at sub-section 7, it is quite clear that the court can only allow expenses to a person ordered to attend for examination if in the opinion of the court he is exculpated from any of the charges made or suggested against him. Both the Attorney-General and Mr. Ingle Joyce conceded that those words were only applicable when the person was inculpated in the report of the official receiver. If their construction is right, you have this preposterous result. You have A., we will say, inculpated in the report of a charge of fraud. It is suggested that B. and C. were co-directors with him, or co-officials of some kind or other, and you have an order made, and as the appellant's counsel say properly made, for the examination of A. and B. and C., and then on the examination it turns out that none of these persons were to blame. Then A. applies for his costs. "Yes," say the court, "you are exculpated, and we will give you your costs." But when B. and C. come the answer is, "No, you have not been exculpated, because you were never charged, and therefore you must bear the expenses yourselves." Such legislation would be absolutely preposterous. The only construction of the legislation that can make it reasonable is that the only persons who can be ordered to be examined and attend at their own expense are those who are primâ facie inculpated. It is quite reasonable that they should be required to attend at their own expense. They are saved from injustice by the provision that if they are exculpated the court can and doubtless will give them their costs. If, on the other hand, persons could be examined at their own expense who could not be allowed their costs however clear it might be that they had done nothing whatever that could be the subject of blame, the provision would certainly be very harsh, very unjust, and very unreasonable.

Therefore, when all the provisions are regarded together, and also the enactment existing in section 115 of the Act of 1862, it seems to me that the intention of the Legislature is reasonably clear, nor is there any mischief that I can see likely to arise from such a construction. If it were the case that the report of the official receiver on such a point must be made once for all, so that, if there appears a primâ facie case against A. for a public examination, he never afterwards could make a report which would lead to the public examination of B. or C., it might be said that mischief might arise. But it is clear that if there is not at the outset a case of fraud shown against anybody but A., then B. and C., who are officials of the company, and are supposed to know something, or may perhaps be suspected of being concerned in something, which was improper, can still be summoned for examination under section 115. It may well be that something which transpires in the public examination of A. will show the necessity of summoning B. or C. under section 115. If, when they are examined under section 115, it turns out that there is no cause for believing them to have been guilty of fraud, the matter will of course end there. They will have been examined, they will have given all the information they can, and no further steps will be necessary. But if that leads to a primâ facie case of fraud against them, they are not to be exempted in any way from a public examination; it is still open to the official receiver to make a futher report about their conduct, upon which their public examination will ensue.

It seems to me, therefore, that while the construction which your lordships' House is putting upon this sectiou will in many cases prevent injustice, it will in no case prevent justice being done, and the fullest inquiry being made in all legitimate cases.

Lord MACNAGHTEN and Lord MORRIS concurred.

Lord SHAND.—I also concur; and I only venture to add to what has been said by Lord Herschell that it occurs to me that there might be an examination of directors other than those named originally, without having recourse to section 115. I venture to suggest that if it appeared upon the examination of a person A., who had been inculpated, that B. and C. are in a somewhat similar position, then the official receiver might in that case make a second or further report, without having recourse to the power under section 115. In all other respects I quite agree with what my noble and learned friends have said.

Lord HERSCHELL.—In consequence of what Lord Shand has just said, I wish to explain that I did not intend to imply that procedure under section 115 would be a condition precedent to any further report justifying any further order, but merely that what came out might render an examination under section 115 desirable, and that it might be taken, notwithstanding the previous report.

Lord DAVEY.—I concur.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.) — March 6.

DUBOWSKI v. GOLDSTEIN. (a.)

Restraint of trade—Covenant—Validity—Reasonableness—Partial enforcement.

The defendant, on entering the service of the plaintiff, a milkman, agreed that he would not during the continuance of such service, or at any time thereafter, serve, solicit, or interfere with, for his own benefit or for the benefit of any person other than the plaintiff, "any of the customers which shall at any time be served by or then belonging to the employer" in his business; the plaintiff's business was then carried on exclusively in the locality of St. George's-in-the-East.

Held, that the agreement referred only to the business as then carried on by the plaintiff in that locality, and would not apply to a new business started by the plaintiff in any other locality, and that the restraint was reasonable as to space; that the covenant was severable, and an injunction could be granted restraining the defendant from serving persons who were customers of the plaintiff during the time when the defendant was in the plaintiff's service.

Appeal of the defendant from a decision of a Divisional Court (Vaughan Williams and Wright, JJ.) varying the judgment of his honour Judge Bacon at the Whitechapel County Court.

The plaintiff was a dairyman, carrying on his business at several shops in different parts of St. George's-in-the-East. By an agreement, dated the 2nd of May, 1892, the defendant agreed to serve the plaintiff in his business as a milk carrier and general servant. The agreement contained the following covenant on the part of the defendant: "The employee shall not nor will during the continuance of such service, or at any time thereafter, serve or cause to be served for his own benefit, or for the benefit of any other person or persons or any company, either directly or indirectly, or solicit or in any way interfere with or cause to be solicited or interfered with any of the customers which shall at any time be served by or then belonging to the employer, his successors or assigns, in the said business."

The defendant left the plaintiff's service in 1895, and the plaintiff alleged that since that time the defendant had committed a breach of the covenant.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff, granting an injunction in the terms of the covenant and damages.

The Divisional Court varied the judgment by limiting the injunction so as to restrain the defendant from serving only such persons as were customers of the plaintiff during the time when the defendant was in his service.

The defendant appealed.

Jessel, for the defendant.—The covenant by the defendant is much wider than is reasonably necessary for the plaintiff's protection, and therefore cannot be enforced. The covenant is unlimited as to the place in which the plaintiff's business may be carried on, and it also prevents the defendant from serving any person who may at any future time become a customer of the plaintiff. The Divisional Court held, on the authority of Baines v. Geary, 35 Ch. D. 154, 35 W. R. Dig. 64, that the covenant was severable. A covenant such as this is not severable, and Baines v. Geary was wrongly decided: see comments of Chitty, J., in Baker v. Hedgecock, 36 W. R. 840, 39 Ch. D. 520.

He cited Nicholls v. Stretton, 7 Beav. 42; Price v. Green, 16 M. & W. 346; Rannie v. Irvine, 7 M. & G. 969.

E. Shortt (with him Gwynne James), for the plaintiff.—The covenant is reasonable, but, if not, that part which relates to persons who become the plaintiff's customers after the defendant left him may be disregarded and an injunction granted as to the remainder.

Jessel replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case there is an agreement with regard to a particular business by which the defendant, who was formerly in the plaintiff's employ, undertook not to carry on business in a certain manner.

The Divisional Court have granted an injunction in respect of the agreement, and the question for this court is whether the injunction, as granted by the Divisional Court, can be supported. We must first construe the agreement according to the ordinary canons of construction. The agreement relates to the business of a milkman carried on in St. George's-in-the-East. The plaintiff had several shops, but they were all in that locality; and it is there, and nowhere else, that the business is carried on. General words are used in the agreement which might apply to any business, but they are, in fact, applied only to this particular business to which the agreement relates. If the plaintiff were to transfer his business to some other locality so remote that the business could not be carried on from St. George's-in-the-East, then it would not be the same business, but it would be an altogether different business. I think, therefore, that the locality to which the agreement applies is fixed. The covenant entered into by the defendant was as follows. [His lordship read the covenant.] The agreement refers to something which the defendant might do after leaving the plaintiff's employment.

Now, the plaintiff's customers are obviously divisible into two sets. First, there are those who were customers at the time the defendant was in the plaintiff's employment. They would therefore be known to the defendant, and, according to what is, in my opinion, the true construction of the agreement, the defendant undertakes not to interfere with them after he has left the plaintiff's service.

But then there is another set of customers—viz., those who became customers after the defendant left the plaintiff. The plaintiff desires to protect himself against interference with the latter set, and obtained in the county court an injunction in the terms of the agreement, but the Divisional Court limited the injunction by restraining interference with only those persons who were customers of the plaintiff when the defendant was in his service.

The Divisional Court appears to have been troubled with the case of Baines v. Geary, which is a decision of North, J., and to have thought that that case covered this one. I am not going to express any opinion about that case. North, J., did not assume to decide any new principles of law. If he applied the law wrongly to the facts in the case before him, then the law as stated by him is binding on a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, but not the application of the law to those facts.

The law applicable to this case is, that the restraint must be such as is reasonable. I am inclined to think that the injunction as originally granted was right; but I will assume that it was too wide. It is quite clear that the two classes of customers can be separated, and I can see no objection to an injunction relating to the first class of customers only. The appeal will therefore be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an agreement in restraint of trade. From all the cases this principle is deducible. The court must determine whether, having regard to all the circumstances, the restraint is greater than is reasonably necessary for the protection of the plaintiff. This agreement is said to be too wide, both as to space and and as to time. With regard to the question of space, I think that when the agreement is carefully looked at it will be seen that there is nothing in the defendant's contention, for the agreement must be construed with reference to the nature of the business carried on by the employer at the time the agreement was entered into. A difficulty arises, I think, with regard to the period of time during which the restraint is imposed. If the two parts of the covenant could not be severed, I am disposed to think that the agreement could not be upheld. The agreement has reference to two distinct classes of persons—first, those who were customers of the plaintiff's during the period when the defendant was in his employ; secondly, those who may become his customers at any time and in any place; but, after carefully considering the language of the agreement, I have come to the conclusion that it is possible to separate the two classes of customers. If that is done, then the injunction as granted is perfectly right, for so far as the covenant relates to persons who were customers of the plaintiff whilst the defendant was in his employ I have not the slightest doubt that the restraint is reasonable. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to an injunction in the form granted by the Divisional Court, and this appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal cannot succeed. I am much influenced in coming to that conclusion by the consideration that in the view which I take of the agreement, even if there had been no suggestion as to the two parts of the covenant being severable, the injunction ought to be granted. The decisions have gone far beyond the law as stated by Tindal, C.J., and other judges in the past, for the views of judges of our age on questions of public policy necessarily differ considerably from the opinions held by judges of an earlier period. The only test which we have now to apply in construing an agreement which is said to be void as being in restraint of trade, is whether or not the restraint is reasonably necessary for the protection of the party. If the restraint is reasonable, then the agreement cannot be held to be against public policy. Now, in this case the covenant is not a general covenant not to carry on business in any part of England. A milkman's business is necessarily local. We do not know exactly the locality of this business, but we do know that it is local, and even if it extended to the whole City of London it would still be local. I should have no hesitation in saying that this agreement only refers to the business carried on during the existence of the agreement, wherever it may have extended to. A new business at a new place would not be within the contemplation of the parties. If, for instance, the plaintiff extended his business to the West End of London, it would in this case be a new business. Therefore we have a strict limitation as to locality, capable of being ascertained quite easily, involved in the very nature of the agreement.

The agreement refers to two classes of customers, covered by one sentence in the agreement. I conceive that that excludes persons who once were, but who no longer are, customers; for it only includes actual customers. It is suggested that the defendant would have much difficulty in ascertaining who are the customers, but he can avoid that difficulty by going out of the district. If the defendant places himself in a difficult position by setting up a business in the same locality, he has only himself to blame. As to the suggestion that a man cannot legally agree not to serve customers whom he does not know, even if that was at one time the law, it is not so now. In the first place it would exclude all large companies, because an employee of a large trading company never can know all the customers.

I come to the conclusion that it was reasonably necessary for the complete protection of the plaintiff that the defendant should not interfere with any persons who were customers of the plaintiff at any given time, and in my view the agreement is valid without any severance. Still, it is not absolutely necessary to decide that, for the plaintiff is willing to accept an injunction in the limited form granted by the Divisional Court.

Appeal dismissed.

Ex parte LEONARD. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Petition — Receiving order—No assets— "Sufficient cause"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 7, sub-section 3.

The mere fact that a debtor has apparently no assets is not a sufficient cause why a receiving order in bankruptcy should not be made against him.

Appeal of the debtor from the decision of the registrar in bankruptcy making a receiving order against him.

The debtor alleged that he had no assets.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and C. L. Attenborough, for the debtor.—If it is probable that, owing to the debtor having no assets, the bankruptcy proceedings will produce no beneficial result, the court, in the exercise of its discretion, will refuse to make a receiving order: In re Otway, Ex parte Otway, [1895] 1 Q. B. 812, 43 W. R. Dig. 17. To make a receiving order under the circumstances of this case would, in the words of Jessel, M.R., in Ex parte Robinson, In re Robinson, 31 W. R. 553, 22 Ch. D. 816, be "a vain thing."

Ringwood, for the petitioning creditor.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I can see no possible ground for interfering with the decision of the registrar in this case. The suggestion is that if the debtor is made a bankrupt nothing can be got, and therefore there ought to be no receiving order, because, using a phrase which has been caught up from the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in Ex parte Robinson, In re Robinson, it is said a receiving order will be "a vain thing." It has also been contended that In re Otway, Ex parte Otway, is an authority for the proposition that if it is probable that the bankruptcy will show no assets, a receiving order ought not to be made. In my opinion there is no case which decides that proposition, but there is a case, In re Hecquard, Ex parte Hecquard, 38 W. R. 148, 24 Q. B. D. 71, which clearly shows that the proposition is one which cannot be supported. In In re Hecquard both Lindley, L.J., and Lopes, L.J., point out that at the time when the petition is presented and a receiving order made the petitioning creditor cannot tell whether there will be any result from the bankruptcy. He has no means of knowing the truth as to the position of the debtor's affairs. All he can say is that he has a debt which has not been paid, and therefore he desires to make his debtor a bankrupt. The court may eventually come to the conclusion that adjudication will be "a vain thing," not at the date of the receiving order, but after the debtor has been publicly examined as to his position. That having been laid down in In re Hecquard, there is the case of Ex parte Robinson, where the only question was whether the court had jurisdiction to make the alleged debtor a bankrupt in England. It was admitted that there were no assets in England, though there were assets in Scotland, and the court decided that there was jurisdiction to make the debtor a bankrupt in England, but as there were sequestration proceedings then pending in Scotland the court, in the exercise of its discretion, declined to make the debtor bankrupt in England. Then as to In re Otway it is no authority for the proposition that the mere fact of no assets, either probable or possible, is sufficient to prevent a receiving order. It was a fact in that case that the effect of a receiving order would be to deprive the debtor of the only asset available for the payment of a composition to his creditors; but there was a further fact that the petitioning creditor had endeavoured to obtain from the debtor £25 as a condition for agreeing to an adjournment of the petition, and it was obvious that the petitioning creditor was using the bankruptcy proceedings for the purpose of endeavouring to extort money from the debtor. The court did not decide that there was no jurisdiction to make the debtor a bankrupt, but they held that under all the circumstances of the case there was sufficient reason for refusing, in the exercise of their discretion, to do so.

I say most emphatically that In re Otway is no authority for the proposition in support of which it has been cited in this case. I am of opinion that this receiving order was rightly made, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Reed has tried to bring the case within the words of section 7, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provides: "If the court is not satisfied with the proof of the petitioning creditor's debt, or of the act of bankruptcy, or of the service of the petition, or is satisfied by the debtor that he is able to pay his debts, or that for other sufficient cause no order ought to be made, the court may dismiss the petition." It was argued that the fact that nothing could be got by the bankruptcy was in itself "sufficient cause" for dismissing the petition. I do not think the case comes within the sub-section, nor do I think that In re Otway is an authority for that proposition. When In re Otway is examined it is seen that the facts there were very different from the present case, because in that case there was malâ fides on the part of the petitioning creditor, and also the court thought that it was undesirable that there should be bankruptcy proceedings because bankruptcy would have deprived the debtor of his only asset. On these two grounds, and these two only, did the court act in that case.

Then, again, in In re Hecquard it was contended that because there was only one creditor and no assets in England a receiving order ought not to be made; but the court said that it was premature to say that the bankruptcy proceedings would be useless, because at that stage no one could say with certainty what assets there might be.

In my opinion none of the cases which have been cited support Mr. Reed's proposition.

RIGBY, L.J.—I entirely agree with the reasons that have already been given.

Appeal dismissed.

Ex parte THE CAUCASIAN TRADING CORPORATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Arbitration—Award on submission—Order of court to enforce award—Seizure of goods under fi. fa.—"Process in a civil proceeding" in High Court—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 12—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 1.

Upon an application by originating summons under order 54, an order under section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, was obtained to enforce an award in the same manner as a judgment or order to the same effect; and the goods of the debtor were seized and sold by the sheriff under a writ of fieri facias.

Held, that the summons was a "civil proceeding" in the High Court, and that the issue of the writ of fi. fa. was a "process in a civil proceeding," and that as the debtor's goods had been seized and sold thereunder by the sheriff, the debtor had committed an act of bankruptcy under section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890.

This was an appeal by the creditors in a bankruptcy petition from an order of the registrar, Mr. Hope, who refused to make a receiving order, and dismissed the petition.

The question raised before the registrar was whether a seizure and sale under a writ of fi. fa. of a debtor's goods under an order to enforce an award on a submission to arbitration in the same manner as a judgment or order to the same effect, constituted an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c 71).

The appellants, the Caucasian Trading Corporation (Limited), bought certain property from the debtor Birch and two other persons, who guaranteed the value of the property.

A dispute arose between the parties as to whether the property really was of the value guaranteed, and thereupon, under a clause contained in the contract, they went to arbitration under the provisions of the Arbitration Act of 1889.

On the 22nd of July, 1895, the umpire made an award for £12,917 in favour of the appellants.

On the 7th of August the appellants took out an originating summons in the High Court under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 54, for leave to enforce the award in the same manner as a judgment or order to the same effect, under section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. This summons was intituled "In the matter of an arbitration between the Caucasian Trading Corporation (Limited) and John Grant Birch, R. Everitt, and J. S. Horner, formerly trading as John Birch & Co., and in the matter of the Arbitration Act, 1889."

A further summons, dated the 9th of August, 1895, was taken out for leave to enforce the award against the individual partners, and the court ordered that the appellants should be at liberty to levy execution against the defendants individually.

A writ of fieri facias was issued against the respondent Birch, and goods belonging to him were seized.

On the 27th of September the respondent applied under section 145 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, that the sheriff should be at liberty to sell the goods by private contract, and the goods were so sold on the 28th of September; but they did not realize a sufficient sum to satisfy the debt.

On the 28th of November application for a receiving order was made by the appellants, the act of bankruptcy alleged in the petition being that there had been a seizure and sale by the sheriff of the respondent's goods under process in a civil proceeding in the High Court.

The registrar dismissed the petition, on the ground that he was bound by the decision in Shaw v. Ronaldson, [1892] 1 Q. B. 91, 40 W. R. Dig. 183, that a submission to arbitration in the first instance is not a civil proceeding in the High Court, and that section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, does not make the submission an order of the court.

The petitioning creditors appealed.

By section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), it is provided that: "An award on a submission may, by leave of the court or a judge, be enforced in the same manner as a judgment or order to the same effect."

By section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), it is provided that: "A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy if execution against him has been levied by seizure of his goods under process in an action in any court, or in any civil proceeding in the High Court, and the goods have been either sold or held by the sheriff for twenty-one days."

Herbert Reed, Q.C. (Æneas Mackintosh with him), for the appellants.—There has been an execution levied here under process in a civil proceeding in the High Court. In order to enforce an award as a judgment the leave of the court must be obtained, and this is done by means of an originating summons under ord. 54, r. 4, f. 3. This is a "step in a 'civil proceeding,'" and every subsequent summons is a "matter" in court. The writ of fi. fa. and the seizure of the goods is a "process" in that proceeding. Section 100 of the Judicature Act, 1873, provides that "action" shall mean a civil proceeding commenced by writ, or in such other manner as may be prescribed by rules of court, and shall not include a criminal proceeding by the Crown; and that "matter" shall include every proceeding in the court, not in a cause. Here a civil proceeding was commenced when the originating summons was taken out. There has been a seizure and sale of the debtor's goods in that proceeding, and therefore there has been an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890.

C. Herbert Smith (Bigham, Q.C., with him), for the respondent.—Section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, must be construed in the sense most favourable to the debtor: Re North, Ex parte Hasluck, [1895] 2 Q. B. 264, 43 W. R. Dig. 10. An arbitration is not an action in the High Court, although the submission be ordered to be enforced in the same manner as a judgment or order; and the submission is not a proceeding in the court: Re An Arbitration between Shaw & Ronaldson. Section 12 does not make the award equivalent to a judgment. The effect of the section is not to alter the old practice: Newton v. Boodle, 6 C. B. 529, 18 L. J. C. P. 73; Farmer v. Mottram, 1 Dow. & L. 781. The application made was an application in an arbitration. The issuing of a writ of fi. fa. is not a process in a civil proceeding. A civil proceeding is in the nature of an action. A summons taken out under order 54 is not a civil proceeding: Re Binstead, 41 W. R. 452, [1893] 1 Q. B. 199.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The whole case turns on the construction of section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. In this case the goods of the debtor were seized in execution and sold under a writ of fieri facias, which is a process in the High Court. In respect of what was the writ issued? There was an arbitration and an award, and a summons was taken out to enforce that award in the same manner as a judgment or order to the same effect. That summons was a civil proceeding in the High Court, and the summons to issue a writ of fi. fa. was a civil proceeding in the High Court, and the writ itself was a process in that civil proceeding. It is said that we are to construe the words "any civil proceeding in the High Court" as meaning a proceeding in the nature of an action, but section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, speaks of them as distinct and separate. It says "in an action in any court, or in any civil proceeding in the High Court." We must construe the section according to the ordinary meaning of the words we find therein, that is, we must construe each of the enactments separately according to the ordinary meaning of the words respectively contained in them. I am of opinion that the originating summons was a civil proceeding, and that the issuing of the writ of fi. fa. was a process in that civil proceeding. Therefore in this case there has been a seizure and sale of the debtor's goods under a process in a civil proceeding in the High Court, and it follows that there has been an act of bankruptcy within section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. Therefore I am of opinion that the decision of the registrar was wrong, and this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case an originating summons was taken out to obtain the leave of the court to enforce an award in an arbitration in the same way as a judgment or order to the same effect, as provided for by section 12 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and the court made an order that the award should so be enforced. A writ of fi. fa. was then issued, and the debtor's goods were duly seized and sold. It has been argued by counsel that this was not a "civil proceeding" in the High Court within the meaning of section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. In my opinion we must construe that section as meaning that an act of bankruptcy is committed if the debtor's goods have been seized under process in an action in any court, either High Court or county court, or in any step which may be called a civil proceeding in the High Court. It is clear that the award could not be enforced without application to the High Court, and I am of opinion that such application is a civil proceeding. The appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. The summons taken out here was not a continuation of the arbitration. It was quite outside the arbitration. It was a civil proceeding in the High Court, and was the same as the old action to enforce an award. It was a matter brought into existence upon the taking out of the summons under order 54. The appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

LANCASTER v. LANCASTER. (a.)

Practice—Divorce—Judicial separation—Agreement for settlement of action—Costs of preparation and execution of separation deed.

In an action for judicial separation the parties mutually agreed to a separation by deed and to the settlement of the action, the respondent paying the petitioner's costs of suit, and the terms of the agreement being made a rule of court.

Held, that the costs of settling the deed were not costs of suit, but might have been provided for in the agreement; as they were, however, not provided for, the court had no jurisdiction over them.

Appeal from a decision of the President of the Probate Division (reported [1896], P. 75).

On the hearing of a petition presented by the wife praying for a judicial separation from her husband, the petition was settled on the terms of an agreement (signed by both parties and their respective counsel), containing the following provisions:—

"A deed of separation to be entered into with all usual clauses to be settled by Mr. Bayford.

"Mr. Lancaster will pay to Mrs. Lancaster £500 on the execution of the deed, and will consent to pay Mrs. Lancaster £1,500 per annum. . . . This payment to continue during the joint lives of Mr. and Mrs. Lancaster, and to be in discharge of all claims for and in respect of Mrs. Lancaster and her children. . . .

"Mr. Lancaster is to pay Mrs. Lancaster's costs of suit, to be taxed by Mr. Registrar Hannen in case of difference. . . .

"These terms may be made a rule of court."

On taxation the taxing master refused to allow the wife's costs of the preparation and execution of the deed, which were stated to be £140.

The President affirmed the taxing master's decision, stating as his reason that the agreement was a substantive agreement which (apart from its being made a rule of court) could be enforced by an action for specific performance; and as it could be made a rule of court, it could also be enforced by any division of the High Court of which it might be made a rule, and therefore was not strictly in the suit for judicial separation, nor were the carrying out of it and the enforcement of it, steps in the same suit.

The petitioner appealed.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and Bargrave Deane, for the appellant.—These costs may be made a rule of court. They are costs of suit, though no authority can be found for that proposition. It was an essential step in the suit, and the husband was to pay the wife's costs of suit, whatever they were. If either party had refused to enter into this compromise, then the suit would not have been disposed of, and the court would have made an order. The President made the compromise a rule of court, and the petition remained on the file until the deed had been executed by all parties; therefore the deed was essentially part of the terms in that suit.

Ingle Joyce and Barnard, for the respondent, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—There is no doubt that the costs of suit is a technical expression. Every person at all conversant with the law knows the meaning of the expression. I think the true ground is expressed by the President where he says that "the agreement is not strictly in this suit, nor are the carrying out of it and the enforcement of it steps in this suit. It follows that the costs of settling the deed are costs which the parties might have provided for by agreement but have not, and I have no jurisdiction over them." It would be a bad precedent to vary the order. The appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J., concurred, and said that the parties ought to have added words in the agreement so as to include the costs of the deed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The deed says Mr. Lancaster will pay to Mrs. Lancaster £500 on the execution of the deed. The costs of suit do not include the costs of the preparation and execution of the deed. There were disputes before the taxing master, and it may be that these costs were not intended to be included.

Appeal dismissed.

In re BOWES.
SIRATHMORE v. VANE. (a.)

Will—Legacy to trustees to plant trees—Benefit of owner of the estate—Payment.

A sum of money was bequeathed by testator, who was tenant for life only of a real estate, on trust to lay out the money in the planting of trees thereon, regard being had, as to the manner and place of planting such trees, to the wishes of the person for the time being entitled to such estate.

Held, that the trust was primarily for the benefit of the owners of the estate, and as the evidence showed that the planting of the trees would not be a benefit or improvement to the estate, that the persons who together constituted the absolute owners of the estate were entitled to the bequest for their own use.

Petition.

William Bowes, by his will dated the 1st of September, 1878, bequeathed to his trustees "the sum of £5,000 sterling upon trust to expend the same in planting trees for shelter on the Wemmergill Estate, being part of my settled estates. If I shall have designated in my lifetime the places where I desire my trustees or trustee, to plant the same, in the places which I shall have designated; but if I shall not have designated the places, then I desire my trustees or trustee in the place and manner of planting such trees to have regard to the wishes of the person for the time being entitled to the possession of the Wemmergill Estates. I have long had the intention of planting trees on the Wemmergill Estate for the improvement thereof, and I consider that the Scotch fir is the best to be used."

The testator, who was only tenant for life of the Wemmergill Estate, died on the 9th of October, 1885, and had not designated the places where the trees were to be planted. The testator's estate was being administered in this action, and the £5,000 was standing in court to the credit of an account entitled "The legacy to the trustees of the testator's will upon trust to plant trees on the Wemmergill Estate."

This was a petition by the Earl of Strathmore, the present tenant for life of the Wemmergill Estate, for payment out of the said sum. Lord Glamis, one of the respondents to the petition, was the tenant in tail in remainder; the other respondents were the executors and trustees, and the Royal Bank of Scotland.

The evidence showed that it was impossible to plant trees on the high-lying land of the estate as they would not grow there, and that as to the rest of the property it was too valuable to make tree planting profitable, and that no profit could be made from the timber owing to the absence of roads and railways.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and S. Dickinson, for the petitioner.—This legacy is for the benefit of the person entitled to the estate, and should be paid over to him. When such is the case the money need not be expended as indicated, but can be paid over on Lord Glamis executing a disentailing assurance: Palmer v. Flower, 20 W. R. 174, L. R. 13 Eq. 250; Re Skinner's Trusts, 8 W. R. 605, 1 J. & H. 102; Lockhart v. Hardy, 9 Beav. 379; Earl of Lonsdale v. Berchtoldt, 3 K. & J. 185, 5 W. R. Dig. 131; Theobald on Wills, 4th ed., p. 405.

Heath, for the executors and trustees.—In all the cases cited the legatee was named, and it was for his interest distinctly; here the intention was to embellish the estate. What is not used for planting trees ought to fall into the residue: Cowper v. Mantell, 4 W. R. 500, 22 Beav. 231; In re Ward's Trusts, 20 W. R. 1024, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 727. There is no more intention shown to benefit the owner of the estate than would a trust to plant trees in Hyde Park.

G. A. Watson, for Lord Glamis.

Foster Corke, for the Royal Bank of Scotland.

NORTH, J.—The case is shortly this. Mr. Bowes, being tenant for life but nothing more, speaks of this estate as part of his settled estates. His interest ceased at his death, and then the estate went to the Earl of Strathmore for life, with remainder to his issue in tail, and that limitation is still subsisting, though under a new settlement. That being so, Bowes' will contains this gift: "I bequeath to my trustees the sum of £5,000 upon trust to expend the same in planting trees for shelter on the Wemmergill Estate." Pausing there I think that is a clear trust. It does not give the trustees any choice about the matter; it says that that sum is to be laid out by them and to be spent in planting trees upon the estate. I have no doubt about the testator's intention. It is agreed that the estate would hold far more trees than could be put upon it for that sum; but it is said that it would be a very disadvantageous way of spending that sum to apply it in planting trees upon any part at all of the estate, because for some reasons applicable to one part, some to another, it is not for the interest of anyone that the trees should be planted; nevertheless, there is the trust directing it to be done. The testator seems to have thought that, though the estate was not his after his death, he would still have power over it as to giving directions where trees should be planted. Of course it was not his own estate, and nothing could be done at all without consulting the person who was in possession. Mr. Bowes' estate is now being administered by the court, and the defendants, the trustees, have paid or carried over to separate accounts the principal of all the legacies. The £5,059 Consols in court represents this legacy, and the question is to whom does it belong. Lord Strathmore, being the tenant for life, and his eldest son, Lord Glamis, who has attained twenty-one, being tenant in tail, are now capable, on Lord Glamis executing a disentailing deed, of dealing with the estate exactly as they like. I have not forgotten the prior charges, but all persons having them consent or will consent.

Then the sole question is where is this money to go to. Of course it is a perfectly good legacy, there is nothing illegal about it, and it might be carried out; but it is not necessarily capable of being performed, because the owner of the estate may say that he will not have any trees planted on it. If that were the position he took up and if he did not contend for anything more than that, of course the legacy would fail. But he says that he does not refuse to have trees planted upon it, he is quite content that trees should be planted on some part. The legacy, therefore, has not failed. If it were necessary, trees could be planted on the whole of it until the fund was exhausted. Therefore there is nothing illegal in the gift itself. But the owners of the estate say: "It is a very disadvantageous way of spending the money; the money is to be spent for our benefit and that of no one else; it was not intended for anything except our benefit and that of the estate; there is no reason why it should be thrown away by doing what is not for our benefit, instead of being given to us who want the enjoyment of it." I think that contention is right. I think the fund is intended for improving the estate, and improving the estate for the persons who are absolutely entitled to it. If it had been for the benefit of or improving the estate by making it a public park, or something of that sort, the case might possibly have been different. I do not think a gift to plant Hyde Park is really a case in point. Here it is to be planted, not as part of a public trust, but for the benefit of the owners of the estate, the owner in possession being the person whose wishes are to be considered, not merely whether he will give leave for the planting, but in considering where the trees shall be planted. I consider it is for the benefit of the estate and the persons for the time being who are entitled to the estate, that that direction is given.

Then is it a mere power to the trustees to lay out that sum, or is it a trust to lay it out? I think it is a clear trust to lay out money for the benefit of the persons entitled to the estate. If that is so, the case comes within the class of cases where there is not a mere power to lay out the money, in which case the money may go or not, according to whether the power is exercised or not. In the present case there is a trust to lay it out, and in my opinion the persons entitled to the money are entitled to it whether it is actually laid out or not. The case seems to me to come exactly within Lonsdale v. Berchtoldt and In re Skinner's Trust. I think the remarks of Lord Langdale in Lockhart v. Hardy also in point, and the remarks in In re Ward are strongly the same way. Therefore, upon proof that all the proper consents have been given, and that the disentailing deed has been executed by Lord Glamis, I make the declaration that the owners are entitled to have the money paid out to them.

Q. B. Div.
(Lindley and Kay, L.JJ.) Feb. 14, 15.

LOWE (Appellant) v. VOLP (Respondent). (a.)

Tramway—Bye-law—Validity of—Passenger refusing to show his ticket—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 46.

A bye-law of a tramway company, made in pursuance of the powers conferred by section 46 of the Tramways Act, 1870, provided that: "Each passenger shall show his ticket (if any) when required so to do, to the conductor or any duly authorized servant of the company"; and a penalty was attached to a breach of the bye-law.

Held, that the bye-law was a reasonable bye-law "for regulating the travelling in or upon" a tramcar, and was valid, and that a passenger who had duly paid his fare and received a ticket, but who refused to show the same to an inspector of the company, ought to have been convicted under the bye-law for refusing to show his ticket.

Special case stated by Mr. Cluer, metroplitan police magistrate, sitting at the South-Western Police Court.

The respondent was summoned to appear to answer a complaint preferred against him by the appellant, an inspector of the South London Tramways Co., for refusing to show his ticket while travelling in a tramcar of the South London Tramways Co.

This summons was dismissed by the magistrate on the 9th of October, 1895.

A printed copy of the bye-laws and regulations made by the company was produced at the hearing, and formed part of this case.

Upon the hearing of the summons the following facts were proved or admitted.

An inspector of the company entered the car in which the respondent was travelling, and asked the respondent to show to his ticket. The respondent refused to show the ticket, but gave to the inspector a number which was the number of the ticket which he had received from the conductor. The respondent had duly paid his fare, and in refusing to show his ticket had no intention to defraud and did not in fact defraud the company.

No alternative demand was made by the company's officials for the fare on non-production of the ticket by the respondent.

The appellant contended that the respondent was liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings under bye-law 22, for refusing to show his ticket in conformity with bye-law 10.

The magistrate dismissed the summons, as he was of opinion that, assuming the bye-law (10) to be valid in law, the reasonable construction of it required it to be read as giving to the respondent the alternative of either showing his ticket or paying the fare, and this alternative was not offered to him by the company's officials; if this construction was wrong, and the strict grammatical sense of the bye-law was to be adopted, he held the bye-law to be unreasonable as offering no alternative, and therefore bad. He was also of opinion that the bye-law was invalid, and not authorized by the power to make bye-laws conferred by the Tramways Act, 1870, section 46, in that no power is given by that statute to the company by means of bye-laws to impose penalties upon their passengers for an act which, at the most, would be a breach of contract, and not fraudulent; and he relied on the authority of Saunders v. The South-Eastern Railway Co., 29 W. R. 56, 5 Q. B. D. 456 (especially p. 461), and on the fact that the Tramways Act, 1870, sections 49 to 54, expressly provides for criminal offences.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the decision of the magistrate on the facts was right in law, or whether he ought on such facts to have convicted the respondent.

The bye-laws and regulations purported to be made by the South London Tramways Co. under the powers conferred on the company by the Tramways Act, 1870. No. 10 of these bye-laws—the bye-law in question—provided that "each passenger shall show his ticket (if any) when required so to do, to the conductor or to any duly authorized servant of the company, and shall also, when required so to do, either deliver up his ticket or pay the fare legally demandable for the distance travelled over by such passenger."

No. 22 provided that: "Any person offending against or committing a breach of any of these bye-laws or regulations, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings."

Then at the end of these printed bye-laws and regulations there was a certificate from the assistant secretary of the Board of Trade certifying that a true copy of the foregoing bye-laws and regulations had, in accordance with the provisions of section 46 of the Tramways Act, 1870, been laid before the Board of Trade not less than two months before such bye-laws and regulations came into operation, and that such bye-laws and regulations had not been disallowed by the Board of Trade within the said two months.

Spokes (Hume-Williams, with him), for the appellant.—The validity of this very bye-law has been before the courts on two occasions—namely, in the cases of Heap v. Day, 34 W. R. 627, 51 J. P. 213, and Hanks v. Bridgman, ante, p. 285, which was before this court a short time ago. In each of those cases the bye-law in question was considered and was held to be reasonable and valid, and the decisions in those cases are really conclusive in the present case.

F. Watt (May, with him), for the respondent.—The magistrate was right in holding the bye-law unreasonable and bad. Under the first part of the bye-law the passenger is to show his ticket (if any), and he has no option or alternative given to him; whereas in the second part of the bye-law (under which these cases were decided) he is to deliver up his ticket when requested to do so or pay the fare. There is, therefore, a larger penalty attaching to a breach of the first part, than there is to the second part, of this bye-law, because under the second part he has the alternative of paying his fare, whereas under the first part he has no such alternative, but must pay the penalty. Section 108 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20) gave powers to railways to make regulations "for regulating the travelling upon . . . the railway," and section 46 of the Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), gave powers to tramway companies to make regulations "for regulating the travelling in or upon any carriage belonging to them." Thus the powers conferred on railway companies and on tramway companies to make regulations of this kind are precisely similar. The cases therefore decided as to railway companies and their powers to make such bye-laws are precisely in point here, and all the cases show that such a bye-law as this, where a penalty is imposed in the absence of an intention to defraud, is ultra vires, unreasonable, and void.

He referred to Saunders v. The South-Eastern Railway Co., 29 W. R. 56, 5 Q. B. D. 456; Huffam v. The North Staffordshire Railway Co., 43 W. R. 28, [1894] 2 Q. B. 821; Dyson v. The London and North-Western Railway Co., 29 W. R. 565, 7 Q. B. D. 32; Bentham v. Hoyle, 26 W. R. 314, 3 Q. B. D. 289; and to section 5 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 57).

LINDLEY, L.J.—I consider this matter really covered by authority. The learned magistrate has refused to convict the respondent under a bye-law which has come before the court more than once. It is a bye-law made by a tramway company under the powers in section 46 of the Tramways Act, 1870. The section first of all authorizes the local authority to make certain bye-laws and regulations, and then it authorizes the promoters of any tramway to make regulations "for regulating the travelling in or upon any carriage belonging to them"; and, by a later section (s. 47), to enforce a reasonable penalty. Under that power this bye-law has been passed. [His lordship then read the bye-law.] I agree with the contention for the respondent that that may be regarded as two bye-laws in one clause. The first is that "each passenger shall show his ticket, if any, when required"; and the next is, "and shall also, when required so to do, either deliver up his ticket, or pay the fare legally demandable for the distance travelled over by such passenger." Those are two totally different things. The second part of that bye-law has been brought before the court on more than one occasion, especially in the case of Heap v. Day, and in the case of Hanks v. Bridgman, in which we followed Heap v. Day. The argument was to this effect: It was contended for the respondent that the company cannot enforce duties upon passengers to enable the company to check its own servants. I think there is something in that argument, but that is precisely the argument which was addressed to the court in Heap v. Day, and was distinctly overruled. We cannot, of course, overrule Heap v. Day, and that argument being gone, what seems to me to be the best point of the whole case is gone too.

The learned magistrate has refused to convict for these reasons. He finds, in the first place, that the respondent did refuse to show his ticket when requested. He finds that as a fact, then he gives three reasons for his opinion. He says: "I dismissed the summons as I was of opinion that, assuming the bye-law to be valid in law, the reasonable construction of it required it to be read as giving to the respondent the alternative of either showing his ticket or paying the fare, and this alternative was not offered him by the company's official." With great deference to the learned magistrate, I cannot read the 10th bye-law in any such way; I cannot tack on the alternative "pay the fare legally demandable" to the first clause of it. The words of the first clause are: "Each passenger shall show his ticket, if any." The expression "if any" is very important. There is no alternative of that. The alternative about paying the fare legally demandable, is confined to the next clause: "And shall also when required so to do either deliver up his ticket or pay the fare."

Now we have not got the words "ticket, if any," there, and the reason, I apprehend, is this, that when we come to the alternative, if the passenger has lost the ticket or has not got it, he must pay the fare over again. That is not in the first clause at all. On the construction of the 10th bye-law it seems to me the learned magistrate has gone too far and has misconstrued it.

Then we come to the second reason which he gives: "If this construction was wrong, and the strict grammatical sense of the bye-law was to be adopted, I held the bye-law to be unreasonable as offering no alternative, and therefore bad." There, again, I do not see that there is anything at all unreasonable in saying that if a man has got his ticket and refuses to produce it, he shall be liable to a small penalty. The only conceivable ground for holding that to be unreasonable, is that to which I have already alluded, and which is negatived by the case of Heap v. Day; and if we look at the judgment of Lush, J., in Saunders v. The South-Eastern Railway Co., there is a very distinct opinion expressed by that very eminent judge that such a bye-law would be perfectly reasonable; and I think it is. The second ground therefore seems to me to be untenable and bad.

I now come to the third reason: "I was also of opinion that the bye-law was invalid, and not authorized by the power to make bye-laws conferred by the Tramways Act, 1870, in that no power is given by the statute to the company by means of bye-laws to impose penalties upon their passengers for an act which at most would be a breach of contract, and not fraudulent." Then the magistrate referred to the case of Saunders v. The South-Eastern Railway Co. That ground has been supported in argument by a reference to Saunders v. The South-Eastern Railway Co., Dyson v. The London and North-Western Railway Co., and Bentham v. Hoyle. That ground, however, seems to me to be bad also, for in every one of those cases the Act of Parliament there applicable dealt with precisely the same bye-law in each of those cases, and the bye-law was one which left out very material words which were essential to the reasonable protection of the public. When we come to the penalty section in this Act (section 47) we do not find this particular language alluded to at all; and we have already the authority of Heap v. Day for saying that this is a bye-law—the second part of it at all events—which is reasonable for regulating the traffic in or upon the tramway.

I think on all these grounds the learned magistrate has made a mistake, and that the appeal must be allowed with costs, and that the case must go back to him.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the construction of the bye-law, I differ from the construction put on it by the learned magistrate. It seems to me plain that the alternative of paying the fare legally demandable applies only to the second clause of the bye-law. To "either deliver up his ticket or pay the fare" shows clearly that the alternative does not apply to the first part of the bye-law, where we have not got "shall either show his ticket or pay the fare." The alternative is confined to the last clause.

The chief argument has been that it is an unreasonable bye-law, and that it is bad. Heap v. Day has held it to be a perfectly good bye-law as to the second part. I agree that the attention of the court was not specially directed to the first part, and therefore it is possible to say that Heap v. Day did not decide that a bye-law severable as to the first and second part of it, was good as to the first part; and therefore the point may be open to argument by the respondent.

How does the matter arise? In the Tramways Act, 1870, section 51 imposes a penalty on any person who avoids or attempts to avoid payment of his fare; section 46 authorises to tramway company to make bye-laws for regulating the travelling in or upon any tramcar; and by section 47 any such bye-law may impose reasonable penalties for offences against the same. I agree that if this bye-law were a bye-law to the effect that if a passenger did not pay his fare he should be liable to a penalty, and omitted the words I have read in section 51—the words showing that the penalty by statute was only imposed where he wilfully refused to pay his fare, as in the case of Saunders v. The South-Eastern Railway Co.—the bye-law would then be creating an offence, and imposing a penalty for the non-payment of the fare under circumstances in which the statute did not impose the penalty, and in which the statute plainly showed it was not intended that the penalty should be imposed. But I do not think that is a good argument in the present case.

Is not this strictly a bye-law for the purpose of regulating "the travelling in or upon any carriage belonging to the company"? I confine myself for the present to this part of the bye-law. A passenger when he pays his fare receives a ticket from the conductor. The company say that the conductor shall deliver a ticket, and he does deliver a ticket, to the passenger. Then the inspector, or the conductor, or any officer of the company, according to this bye-law, may call upon the passenger to show his ticket, if any. It is notorious that the check which the company have upon their servants is by an inspector continually going upon one or other of their tramcars and asking the passengers to show their tickets; the object of that is to see whether the conductor has performed his duty in giving the passengers a ticket. It is thus seen at once if the passenger has paid his fare, and the conductor is liable for the fare that he has so received. This is, or may be, intended to enable the company to have a check on the conductor. Then, again, the conductor may ask to see the ticket. The conductor may have received the fare and given a ticket and may have forgotten it, and he asks the passenger to show his ticket, as he may not be sure whether the man has paid his fare or not. This bye-law does not say that in every possible event a passenger shall show his ticket or pay a penalty, but that he shall show his ticket, "if any;" that means if he has a ticket to show. If the man says "I had a ticket, but unfortunately I have lost it and cannot show it," possibly he might on that ground escape altogether, because the words of the bye-law are "if any." But why is this bye-law unreasonable? It does not, as it seems to me, come within the class of cases to which we have been referred. It does not in the least interfere with, or carry further, the right of the company to obtain a penalty from a man because he has not paid his fare. But it is said that in this case everything must be inferred in favour of a man who is accused of a criminal offence, and that it must be inferred here that he had lost his ticket and could not show it. I cannot go into that. That is not the conclusion to be drawn from the language of this case. If he had lost his ticket, he would have said so; but the case does not find that he said that, but on the contrary that he refused to show his ticket. He gave the number of the ticket, and that shows that he had received a ticket, but he refused to show it. I think he was wrong in so doing, and I think he certainly infringed the bye-law. The bye-law seems to me not unreasonable. It comes within the class of cases to which reference has been made. It does not contravene the statute, or extend the statute as to payment of fares beyond section 51; and therefore I think the learned magistrate was not right either on the construction of the bye-law or in the way he dealt with the traveller who had committed the breach of the bye-law. I think a breach of the bye-law was committed. I think the bye-law was good, and I think the magistrate ought to have convicted.

COLLMAN (Appellant) v. ROBERTS (Respondent). (a.)

Master and servant — Shop — Employment of young person in — Employment partly in shop and partly outside — Employment "in or about shop" — Shop Hours Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 62), s. 3.

When a young person is employed in a shop, and when his employment is partly inside the shop and partly outside the shop, the time occupied in the outdoor employment is time occupied "in or about the shop" within the meaning of section 3 of the Shop Hours Act, 1892; and the time so occupied in the outdoor employment when added to the time of employment in the shop itself cannot, in any one week, exceed the limit of seventy-four hours laid down in that section.

Case stated by Mr. Bushby, metropolitan police magistrate.

A complaint was made by the appellant on behalf of the London County Council against the respondent, that the respondent did, during the week commencing the 16th of June, 1895, at his premises (being a shop within the meaning of the Shop Hours Act, 1892), unlawfully employ in and about the said shop one Charles Medcraft (being a young person within the meaning of the Act) for a longer period than seventy-four hours, including meal-times.

The respondent was a newsagent, and occupied the premises in question for the purpose of receiving and retailing newspapers, and these premises were a shop within the meaning of the Shop Hours Act, 1892.

The respondent employed Medcraft (who was a young person within the meaning of the Act) in connection with the receiving and retailing of newspapers, and in the course of such employment Medcraft fetched newspapers from Fleet-street, and delivered them to customers at their addresses sold newspapers for the respondent both inside and outside the shop; and inside the shop he folded up newspapers, did up country parcels, swept out the shop, and cleaned the windows.

The period of time calculated from the time Medcraft arrived at the shop to the hour at which he ceased working for the respondent during the week in question amounted to 84½ hours, and during the whole of such period of 84½ hours Medcraft was occupied in performing some portion of the above-described duties in the course of his employment, or taking his meals in the times allowed him for that purpose.

If the period to be calculated for the purposes of the Act is limited to the times during which Medcraft was at work in or about the premises occupied by the shop, then he was not employed in or about the shop for a longer period than seventy-four hours, including meal-times, in that week; but if the period to be calculated for the purposes of the Act is not so limited, but should include the times occupied in fetching newspapers from Fleet-street, and delivering them to customers at their addresses not in or about the premises, then Medcraft had been employed for a period of 84½ hours, including meal-times, in that week.

The magistrate adopted the first of these constructions of the Act, and dismissed the summons.

Section 3 of the Shop Hours Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 62), provides: "No young person shall be in or about a shop for a longer period than seventy-four hours, including meal times, in any one week." Section 9: "A 'young person' means a person under the age of eighteen years; and 'shop' means retail and wholesale shops, markets, stalls, and warehouses in which assistants are employed for hire, and includes licensed public-house and refreshment houses of any kind."

Avory, for the appellant—The whole question is, What is the meaning of the words "in or about" a shop? The magistrate decided that these words meant actually on the premises of the shop. That is too narrow a construction of the section, and it would not prevent the mischief aimed at by the Act, which was to prevent too long hours of employment of young persons engaged in shops and warehouses. The words "in or about" a shop mean in or about the business of the shop, and the words cannot be limited to the actual employment in the shop itself. If the view of the magistrate were adopted, then a boy could be kept in a refreshment house all day running in and out of the house, and he might be employed for much longer than the specified time, provided he was not employed more than the seventy-four hours in the house itself. That could not have been the intention of the Act.

The respondent did not appear.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an important case, and one by no means easy to decide, as it is impossible to read this Act without seeing that the word "shop" throughout the Act is used with reference to a structure or place—a place of business as distinguished from the business carried on there. We have in this case a shop and a boy employed in the business which is carried on at that place; his work is partly indoors, and partly outdoors; and his outdoor work takes him some distance away from the place where this shop is situated. The question is whether, whilst he is employed in doing the outdoor work, he can be said to be employed "in or about the shop" within the meaning of this Act. To answer that question we have to see what the object of this Act was, and what was the mischief it was intended to prevent. It was passed for the purpose of protecting the health of young persons employed in shops and warehouses. The Act does not aim at protecting the health of young persons by the improvement of the sanitary condition of the places in which they are employed. Its object is to protect their health by preventing their employment for an undue length of time, and if we were to adopt the very narrow construction of the section—which, I must say, the words of it warrant—we should be reducing the Act to a dead letter in all cases in which the duties of young persons employed in shops are partly indoors and partly outdoors. I think it would not be right to put upon the language of this Act a construction so limited as to make it futile in many cases which would certainly come within the mischief of the Act. I think the true construction is this, that where you have a shop, and a shop boy or shop girl under the age of eighteen employed in that shop, that boy or girl is not to be employed for the purposes of the business carried on at that shop by the shopkeeper for more than seventy-four hours in the week, including meal-times. That is the substance of the matter, and, although the learned magistrate has adopted a construction of the Act which is warranted by the words of it, I do not hesitate to say that his construction is calculated to defeat the object of the Act to such an extent that I do not think it can be the true construction.

KAY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The question is a very important one, and it is one on which the efficiency of the Act greatly depends. The Act was passed for the purpose of preventing shopkeepers from employing young persons for an undue length of time, and if in this case we are to deduct the time occupied by the boy in his outdoor duties, he might be kept all day and all night so employed without infringing the Act. If that were the construction, then there might be many similar cases which the Act would fail to reach. I cannot think that it would be a true construction of the Act, looking to the purpose and object of it, to limit it in that way. If it were so limited, shopkeepers might easily evade its provisions and employ young persons in their business for more than seventy-four hours in one week. The mischief aimed at was the employment of young persons for an undue length of time, and employment beyond the time specified in the section is an infringement of the Act, unless the employer can show that the case is clearly not within the words of the Act. I think the learned magistrate has placed too narrow a construction upon this very useful and important provision.

Appeal allowed.

KYFFIN (Appellant) v. THE EAST LONDON WATERWORKS CO. (LIMITED) (Respondents). (a.)

Water—Metropolis—Constant supply of water—Failure of water company to give—Right of private individual, being aggrieved, to sue for penalties—Metropolis Water Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 113), ss. 7, 16, 44, 45—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), s. 43.

When a water company which comes within the operation of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871, fails to give a constant supply of water within section 7 of the Act, a private individual, who may be aggrieved in consequence of such non-supply, cannot sue for the penalties imposed by section 16 of the Act. For such penalties for failure to give a constant supply to districts, the metropolitan authority alone can sue, and if a private individual be aggrieved his remedy is not under the Act of 1871, but under section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, under which section it is a condition precedent of his right to sue that he shall have paid or tendered the water rate in advance.

Special case stated by Mr. Bushby, metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at Worship-street Police Court.

A complaint was preferred by the appellant (Kyffin) against the respondent company for that the company on the 16th and 17th days of July, 1895, at 463 and 465, Hackney-road, in the county of London, did unlawfully fail to supply a sufficient quantity of water for domestic purposes.

The magistrate heard this summons on the 20th of July, 1895, and dismissed the complaint.

At the hearing of the complaint the appellant, who was the only witness called, stated that he was the occupier of certain premises in Hackney-road, which included the premises named in the summons, and that on the 16th and 17th days of July, 1895, the water supplied by the respondent company to these premises was not sufficient for domestic purposes.

Upon the above evidence it was contended for the appellant that the respondents had contravened the provisions of section 7 of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871, and that the respondents had incurred the penalty prescribed by section 16 of that Act. By 35 & 36 Vict. c. 79, s. 35, the Local Government Board is substituted for the Board of Trade.

On behalf of the respondent company it was contended upon the above evidence, as preliminary points of law: (1) That a private individual could not take proceedings under those sections; (2) that it must be proved that the respondent company had been required or had proposed to furnish a constant supply to the district, and that the other conditions in sections 8 to 12 had been fulfilled, and also that the notice mentioned in section 16 had been given; (3) that the penalty was for not giving a constant supply to the district, and not to an individual, and that the appellant had not proved any offence within the section; (4) that no individual could take proceedings against a water company for failure to supply his premises unless he had paid the water rate in advance (it was admitted by the appellant that he had paid no rates since the period up to Christmas, 1894); see section 43 of the Act of 1847, which was incorporated in the respondent company's Act.

The magistrate was of opinion that, in the absence of the notice required by section 16 of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871 (as amended by 35 & 36 Vict. c. 79, s. 35), the fourth objection must prevail, and he therefore dismissed the summons.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the magistrate was right in so doing, or whether upon the evidence a primâ facie case had been made out against the respondent company in respect of the offence charged, and in the latter event the matter was to be remitted for further hearing.

The Metropolis Water Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 113), provides:—

Section 7. — "Subject to the provisions of this Act, every company . . . . shall, when required so to do, in the manner directed by this Act, provide and keep throughout their water limits, or throughout such parts of such limits as they may be required in manner aforesaid, a constant supply of pure and wholesome water sufficient for the domestic purposes of the inhabitants within such water limits constantly laid on at such pressure as will make such water reach the top story of the highest houses within such water limits . . . and every such company shall, subject to the provisions of the special Act as the same are amended by this Act, give and continue to give to such inhabitants a constant supply for domestic purposes in manner prescribed."

Section 16. — "Any company which violates, refuses, or neglects to comply with any of the preceding provisions of this Act shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding two hundred pounds, and to a further penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds for every month during which such violation or refusal or neglect to comply with the said provisions continues, after they shall have received notice in writing from the Board of Trade" (now the Local Government Board by section 35 of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 79) "to discontinue such violation, refusal, or neglect as aforesaid."

Section 44.—"Every penalty incurred by any company by reason of non-compliance with any of the provisions of this Act shall go and belong to the metropolitan authority within the jurisdiction of which the same has been incurred, and may be sued for and recovered by such metropolitan authority in any court of competent jurisdiction for the recovery of any ordinary simple contract debt of the like amount, and shall be paid and applied as such metropolitan authority shall from time to time direct," &c.

Section 45.—"Except as is by the next preceding section expressly provided, all penalties under this Act may be sued for and recovered in the court of summary jurisdiction."

Section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), provides: "If, except when prevented as aforesaid, the undertakers neglect or refuse . . . to furnish to any owner or occupier entitled under this or the special Act to receive a supply of water during any part of the time for which the rates for such supply have been paid or tendered, they shall be liable to a penalty of ten pounds, and shall also forfeit to the town commissioners, and to every person having paid or tendered the rate, the sum of forty shillings for every day during which such refusal or neglect shall continue after notice in writing shall have been given to the undertakers of the want of supply."

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is a case stated by one of the metropolitan police magistrates who refused to fine the defendants, the East London Waterworks Co., at the instance of the plaintiff. There is a good deal of ambiguity about the information, and it is consistent with several interpretations. It does not say whom the company has failed to supply; it does not say whether the complaint was that the company failed to supply the district with a constant supply, or whether the omission complained of was a failure to supply this particular house with water.

The learned magistrate seems to have thought that the informant was not entitled to the penalty asked for, because some notice referred to in section 16 of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871, had not been given. But when you come to look at that section the notice there referred to has no reference to the complaint of the appellant—whichever way it may be read, whether for omitting to supply this particular house or omitting to supply the district. The notice is a notice required to be given by the local government authority—formerly the Board of Trade, but now the Local Government Board—to continue a local supply. The particular ground on which the magistrate decided appears to me to proceed on a misconstruction of section 16, and in fact that has been admitted on behalf of the company during the argument.

The real question of controversy here is an extremely important one—that is, whether an inhabitant who considers that he is aggrieved is entitled to proceed for the penalties which are imposed by section 16 of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871. That section is as follows. [His lordship read the section, and proceeded:—] The notice referred to in that section is the notice to which I have been referring, and the appellant's contention is that, notwithstanding sections 44 and 45, he is entitled to enforce this heavy penalty. Section 44 shows the way in which the penalty is imposed, and also shows, to my mind, who is to sue for it. [His lordship then read sections 44 and 45.] Now, the penalties to be incurred by the company evidently do not go to common informers, and they do not go to the Exchequer. They go to the metropolitan authority, and may be sued for and recovered by that metropolitan authority by what is commonly called an action. The appellant contends that, notwithstanding that, he is, as a person aggrieved, entitled to sue for this penalty; not for his own benefit—he did not say that—but in order to put the money at the disposition and control of the metropolitan authority. At first sight there seemed to be some difficulty about that both ways; but we have been referred by counsel for the Waterworks Co. to the Waterworks Clauses Act of 1847, and when we come to look at the two Acts of Parliament I think the argument for the company ought to prevail. I think it is quite obvious that under section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, any inhabitant who is aggrieved by not receiving the water which he is entitled to under the Act is entitled to proceed under that section for the penalty there referred to, which is comparatively a small one. The penalty is £10, and 40s. a day; "and shall also forfeit to the town commissioners, and to every person having paid or tendered the rate, the sum of forty shillings for every day during which such refusal or neglect shall continue after notice in writing shall have been given to the undertakers of the want of supply." Unfortunately for the appellant he cannot enforce section 43 of the Act of 1847, because he has not paid his rate in advance, which is a condition precedent. Therefore the remedy which he has under that section for any injury inflicted upon or sustained by himself he is not in a position to pursue.

That being the case, the appellant says, "Apart from that, I can sue you for this penalty imposed by section 16 of the Act of 1871, because," he says, "you have failed to comply with section 7 of the Act of 1871." Now section 7 of the Act of 1871 is not addressed to the supply of each particular inhabitant, but to something which was new in 1871, namely, a constant supply of water to districts. [His lordship then read section 7.] Now the appellant says, "I am aggrieved because I did not receive the constant supply for domestic purposes, and therefore I shall sue for the penalty under that section." That means the £200 penalty, and it certainly would be curious if a person who cannot sue under section 43 of the previous Act of 1847, in respect of injury done to himself personally, can sue in respect of that very same injury done to him personally, under section 7 of the Act of 1871, and sue for a penalty of £200. It does not seem consistent.

It appears to me that there are two distinct principles underlying the structure of these Acts; and that as regards constant supply districts the company are responsible to the metropolitan authority, and that it is for them to enforce the duties imposed by the Act of 1871 upon the company for failure to supply a district; and for that, the metropolitan authority is the proper person to sue, and the only proper authority to sue, for penalties. That does not in the least deprive any person of his right to complain of any deficient supply to him personally, his remedy being under section 43 of the Act of 1847. That appears to me to make the whole legislation consistent, and also to be in accordance with what appears to me, on looking carefully through the Act of 1871, to be the obvious scheme of the Legislature.

There is a great deal of good sense in this, because we know perfectly well that this constant supply is an extremely onerous burden, and there are sections which prevent the company from being under any liability for not giving it if, from any drought or accident, they are prevented from so doing; all of which matters can be much better considered by the metropolitan authority than by any inhabitant who may happen to be aggrieved by not receiving what he thinks is a sufficient supply. I am quite satisfied that the scheme of the Act is that for which the company have contended, and that the appeal must be refused.

The appellant has an adequate remedy. His remedy is under section 43 of the Act of 1847, and not at at all under the Act of 1871. Upon the true construction of the Act, it appears to me therefore to be unnecessary to criticise the cases which have been referred to. Therefore I come to the conclusion that if the appellant is suing for a non-constant supply of water to the district, he is not the proper person to sue; if he is suing for injury to himself personally, he is out of court, because he cannot comply with section 43 of the Act of 1847.

KAY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Looking at the Act of 1871 alone there is a difficulty, and a very ingenious argument has been raised upon the statute, which would be difficult to get over if that statute stood alone. But when we look at the whole scheme of the legislation it is easy to see what is meant. By the Act of 1847 an individual who does not get a proper supply of water has a remedy given to him to recover a penalty, which is to go into his pocket—as to 40s. a day at any rate—and that remedy can be enforced, we are told, by summary proceedings. But that is subject to a condition precedent—which is a very reasonable one—that he should have paid his rate, as we may see by reading the section. In 1871 comes a statute which says that, upon the requisition of the metropolitan authority, the undertakers shall be obliged to supply water constantly to a particular district—that is, to give a constant supply; and if they fail to do that, they are liable to a very large penalty—namely, £200, and £100 a month for every month during which they refuse to comply with the requisition. Then there is a special provision in section 44 that these penalties payable by the company may be recovered by the metropolitan authority by action in any court which would give them a remedy to recover a simple contract debt for the same amount. That shows the means by which penalties payable by the company under that Act are recovered. Then section 45 says: "Except as mentioned in section 44, all penalties under the Act may be sued for and recovered in a court of summary jurisdiction." First of all it struck me that one might reconcile these two sections in this way: Section 44 enables the metropolitan authority to recover the amount by an action as though it were a debt, and section 45 enables it to be recovered in a court of summary jurisdiction—that may be, as primâ facie it always is, by anybody—but in any case it has, under section 44, to go to the metropolitan authority. The question was whether the remedy by action, looking to section 45, was intended to be the only remedy for the recovery of that penalty, or whether it might be recovered either by the metropolitan authority or any other person in a court of summary jurisdiction under section 45. That is a difficulty which, if the Act stood alone, it might not be very easy to get over. When we look at this Act, and the preceding Act of 1847, the difficulty vanishes. It would be the most ludicrous thing in the world if an inhabitant who had not a sufficient supply of water could not take any proceedings under the Act of 1847 until he had paid his rate, even to get the 40s. a day or any other penalty coming to him under that Act, and yet might under the Act of 1871 take proceedings to recover £200, and £100 a month. It would be ludicrous to suppose that the Legislature meant that.

To my mind the plain meaning of all the legislation is this. The inhabitant who does not get a sufficient supply of water may take proceedings under the general Act of 1847. Under that Act, if he has paid the rate—subject, of course, to that condition precedent—he may get a small penalty. The not giving a supply of water to a district is a matter between the metropolitan authority and the company, and the metropolitan authority are the people to make that requisition. If the requisition is not complied with, a heavy penalty is imposed; and the person to recover that penalty is the metropolitan authority who have made the requisition, and not the inhabitant who, by reason of the supply not being constant, says he does not get all the water he wants for domestic purposes. That construction makes the two Acts perfectly consistent and makes the legislation intelligible, and it avoids that which I cannot help saying would be a gross absurdity—that an inhabitant aggrieved should not be enabled to get a small penalty under the Act of 1847 without first paying his rate, and yet for the very same grievance—namely, that he does not get a sufficient supply for domestic purposes—may go, under the Act of 1871, and get a penalty of £200.

I therefore think—although I do not agree with the special reason given by the learned magistrate, which has been disavowed in argument on the part of the company—that this is a case in which the appellant, not having paid his rate, has no right whatever to proceed for penalties under that Act.

The appeal will therefore be dismissed with costs.

ants, his wife, during her life, to "have the unrestricted right of administration and of usufruct of the whole of his estate, and without giving security."

A German advocate deposed to the validity of the will, and that it was sufficient in law if the will was formally opened and read to the family in the presence of the "Theilungsbehoerde" (a body consisting of members of the Parish Council) by a notary on their behalf, and acknowledged by the heirs, and the inheritance accepted by them, and a memorandum of that fact, as in the present case, made by the notary, the original will would remain in, and not be allowed to leave, their custody; but a copy under the signature and seal of the notary (as supplied in this case) would be received as evidence in all German courts of justice. The widow had taken upon herself the administration of and was in possession of the German assets, but the estate also consisted of stocks and shares of companies registered in England.

Priestley, in support of the motion, referred to In the Goods of Lemme, [1892] P. 89, 40 W. R. Dig. 209.

JEUNE, P.—The only question here seems to be whether the grant should be made to the applicant as executrix according to the tenor, or as administratrix. It seems to me that there is no exact authority. In 1894 I decided, in In the Goods of Briesemann, [1894] P. 260, 43 W. R. Dig. 152, to grant administration. The rule appears to me to be that where in a foreign will persons are named in terms as executors, with the same powers as executors would have here, then probate should be granted; but where the persons so named have less powers than executors would have, then administration should be granted. This is neither of those cases, but this is a case where a person is not appointed an executor in terms, but where the court infers from the terms of the will that the testator intended to appoint the person as executor, or, as we say, executor according to the tenor. I would only add that in case of a foreign will it is, perhaps, necessary for the court to see more clearly the intention of the testator to constitute executors. Therefore I make the grant to the widow as executrix according to the tenor, and, following my practice in In the Goods of Lemme, probate will be granted of the copy of the will until such time as the original will is brought in.

REG. v. SODEN. (a.)

Election law — Parliament — Franchise — Registration — Adjudication upon claims and objections — Closing the lists — 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 41.

A revising barrister gave notice that his court would be held on two successive days, and that the lists would be closed at the conclusion of the sitting on the second day. On the evening of the second day, having satisfied himself that there were no more claimants or persons objected to present who were desirous of being heard, he declared the lists closed. On the following day the revising barrister sat in court to read the lists and to initial names inserted or expunged. Whilst this was being done a person applied to be heard in support of his claim to be on the list.

Held, that the lists having been declared closed, the applicant had no right to be heard in support of his claim.

Rule nisi calling upon the revising barrister for East Leeds to show cause why a mandamus should not issue to him to hear and determine an application by John Kelly to be placed on the list of Parliamentary electors and the burgess list for the city of Leeds or to state a case.

The revising barrister filed an affidavit in which he stated that he had given notice that he would hold his court at the Town Hall, Leeds, on the 16th and 17th of September, 1895, for the revision of the lists of Parliamentary electors and burgesses of the East Division of Leeds, and that the lists would be closed at the conclusion of the sitting on the 17th of September. The revising barrister held his court on these two days, and at 8 p.m. on the 17th of September, having been informed by the agents of the respective political parties, and having satisfied himself from inquiries made in open court, that there were not then present any more claimants or persons objected to, he declared in open court that the lists were closed. On the following day he sat in open court in order to read out and write his initials against the names expunged from or inserted in the list, in accordance with 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 41, and 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, s. 15.

The applicant, John Kelly, was not present either on the 16th or 17th of September, but was in court on the 18th, and when his name was read out he desired to be heard in support of his claim.

The revising barrister declined to hear him or to state a case.

W. Graham, for the revising barrister, showed cause against the rule.—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 41, provides that the barrister shall, upon the hearing in open court, finally determine upon the validity of claims and objections. In this case the hearing took place on the 16th and 17th of September. At the closing of the lists on the latter day all claims and objections had been finally determined. 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, s. 15, provides that the revising barrister, before signing the list, shall read out "the names expunged and inserted," which shows that the decision must have been given on the previous day. The sitting on the 18th, although required by statute to be in open court, was for the purpose of doing the clerical work only. In any case, it would be futile to grant a mandamus, because there are no means of altering the register which is now in force: see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 49. The register can only be altered after a special case; but the court will not grant a case here, for there is no point of law to raise. The question simply is whether a revising barrister has power to arrange how the business of his court shall be conducted.

He cited Brumfitt v. Bremner, 9 W. R. 144, 30 L. J. C. P. 30.

Mattinson, Q.C. (Sylvain Mayer with him), in support of the rule.—The revising barrister has refused to hear the evidence in support of Kelly's claim, and therefore the mandamus ought to go. The validity of Kelly's claim was not finally determined on the 17th of September within the meaning of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 41, for it was not until the 18th that his name was first called out. On that day the name was still on the list: it had not been struck out, and the revising barrister had not, in fact, delivered judgment upon the claim.

He cited Mayor of Rochester v. The Queen, 27 L. J. Q. B. 434; Reg. v. Mayor of Monmouth, L. R. 5 Q. B. 251, 18 W. R. Dig. 19.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The sole point is whether a revising barrister has the right to manage the business in his own court. It is contended on behalf of the applicant that at any time prior to the actual moment when a claimant's name is struck off the list he has a right to appear before the revising barrister and have the claim heard. On the other hand, it is said that the revising barrister has power to make arrangements for the transaction of the business of his court. In this case the barrister gave notice that he would hold his court on the 16th and 17th of September, and that the list would be closed on the 17th. That was done, and by eight o'clock on the 17th the claims and objections of all persons who had attended the sitting of the court had been determined by the barrister in accordance with 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 41, and the barrister then declared the list closed. On the following day the revising barrister sat in open court in order to initial the names which had been inserted or expunged, and the only question in this case is whether a person could then come, while the list was being initialled, and put forward a claim. In my opinion there is no such right as is contended for. In large towns, where the lists are very long, it would be impossible ever to get through the business if claims and objections were being put forward while the list was being read and initialled. The applicant in this case did not appear when the court was being held, and that being so he has no right, in my opinion, to appear in support of his claim after the list has been closed and when the purely clerical work is being done.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am clear that no case has been made out either for a mandamus or a special case, and I have very little to add to the reasons given by Lawrance, J. The practice which has been adopted by the barrister is one entirely in the interests of the public, for it would be most inconvenient if all persons with claims had to sit in court while lists of enormous length were being read, and to have their claims dealt with intermittently. Mr. Soden therefore very properly laid down the rule that he would on the first two days deal in open court with the claims and objections, and then when he had disposed of all the cases in court he would deal with the clerical work. When the revising barrister closed the list he had adjudicated on all the claims and had finally decided against the claims of all persons who had not attended the court and supported their claims. The next day this final decision was formally recorded in the manner provided by the statutes, but after the revising barrister had declared his decision by closing the list no one had a right to be heard, although the purely formal work still remained to be done.

Rule discharged.

The applicant appealed.

May 4.—Mattinson, Q.C., and Sylvain Mayer, for the appellant.

W. Graham, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that the revising barrister has in this case followed the ordinary course adopted by revising barristers generally. He had given due notice of the days on which he was going to sit for the purpose of revising the lists for the East Division of Leeds, and he had given notice that the lists for that division would close on the evening of the last day. Accordingly, at the close of the sitting on the evening of the last day the revising barrister asked the agents on both sides whether there were any more claimants or persons objected to present who desired to be heard, and he was told that there were none. He also made inquiries in open court, and no one came forward to be heard. Therefore the agent who acted for the appellant said in effect that the appellant was not present and did not desire to be heard. The revising barrister thereupon declared the lists closed. That was in effect a decision that the name of the appellant should be struck out. The next day the revising barrister had only to go through the manual labour of initialling the names inserted or struck off, and such like work. The appellant had no right to be heard then, and the mandamus was rightly refused.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The revising barrister gave due notice that he would hold his court on Monday and Tuesday, the 16th and 17th of September, to revise the lists, and that the lists would close on the evening of Tuesday. On Tuesday evening accordingly he asked the agents and made inquiries in open court whether anyone else desired to be heard in support of his claim, and no one applied to be heard. On the next day he initialled the names inserted or struck out. Thereupon the appellant applied to have his claim heard and adjudicated upon. The revising barrister refused to hear him, and in my opinion he was not entitled to be heard then. I can see no ground for this application for a mandamus.

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Stipulation for payment of additional rent of £3 per ton by way of penalty for every ton of hay or straw sold off the premises—Material difference between manurial value of hay and straw—Penalty—Liquidated damages—Stipulations of varying importance.

A lease of a farm contained a stipulation that the lessee should pay additional rent at the rate of £3 per ton by way of penalty for every ton of hay or straw which should be sold off the premises during the last twelve months of the tenancy. It was proved that there was a material difference between the manurial value of hay and the manurial value of straw.

Application for a new trial or judgment.

The plaintiffs were the executors of the lessor of a farm, and the defendants were the executors of a deceased lessee and the surviving lessee. The action was brought on the expiration of the lease to recover liquidated damages at the rate of £3 per ton for hay or straw sold off the farm during the last twelve months of the tenancy, or in the alternative for unliquidated damages for breach of covenant.

The lease was expressed to be for a term of twenty-one years at a certain rent payable by half-yearly payments, and contained the following clause: "And also yielding by like half-yearly payments the additional rent of £3 per ton by way of penalty for every ton of hay or straw which shall be sold off the premises during the last twelve months of the tenancy, provided also that for every ton of hay or straw so sold off the premises before the lastly hereinbefore mentioned twelve months the lessees shall bring an equivalent in manure on the land."

The lease also contained a covenant on the part of the lessees that they would not during the last twelve months of the tenancy sell or dispose of or carry away any hay, straw, grass, clover, turnips, or fodder, which should grow upon or be produced from the demised premises or any part thereof, but would spend and consume the same upon the said premises.

The action was tried before Collins, J., and a jury. It was admitted that the defendants had sold hay and straw off the premises, and the defendants had paid into court the sum of £62 10s. The learned judge, being of opinion that the sum of £3 per ton mentioned in the lease was a penalty and not liquidated damages, left to the jury the question what was the manurial value of the hay and straw sold off the premises. Evidence was given showing that the manurial value of hay was from 15s. to £1 per ton, and the manurial value of straw was 4s. or 5s. less. The jury, having found that the manurial value was £60, judgment was entered for the defendants.

The plaintiffs asked for a new trial or judgment on the ground that the learned judge had misdirected the jury on the question of damages. They contended that the sum of £3 per ton was liquidated damages, and that they were entitled to damages at that rate.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The question is whether the sum of money in dispute is a penalty or liquidated damages. It is clear that if it is liquidated damages, there was nothing to be done but for the jury to give a verdict for that sum; but if it is a penalty, then it would be the duty of the jury not to give a verdict for that sum, but to determine the true damages to which in their opinion the plaintiff was entitled. It is equally clear that the question whether it was a penalty or liquidated damages was for the judge, though any facts which it might be necessary for him to know in order to determine that question might be left by him to the jury. He had to determine the question on the construction of the lease, and a fact which it was necessary for him to know was whether there was any difference between the manurial value of hay to be consumed on the farm and the manurial value of straw to be consumed on the farm. It was shown that there was a difference—viz., a difference of 5s. a ton. The learned judge thought that it was a material difference, and, inasmuch as by the terms of the lease the sum of £3 a ton was to be paid whether there was a breach with regard to hay or a breach with regard to straw, he held that the sum was a penalty. The parties themselves say that the sum is to be paid as additional rent by way of penalty. It is argued that it ought to be considered as rent, and treated as such. The contention is that it is not expressed to be payable as a penalty, but merely by way of penalty. I cannot see the distinction which is sought to be drawn. That, however, is not decisive. If we were now laying down the law on the subject for the first time, I should be disposed to say that we ought to keep the parties to what they have said, and that as they have called the sum a penalty, it ought to be treated so. But it has been held that the use of the word "penalty" is not conclusive, and that the circumstances are to be looked at. No case, however, says that the words used are to be disregarded.

I think it is true that there is no absolute decision on the point now before us except the Irish case of Wright v. Tracey. But there is a series of dicta of great judges on the question. In Wallis v. Smith Jessel, M.R., went through them all and criticised them, and showed that he did not agree with them. His opinion was that the parties ought to be bound by the words which they had used. But since then the point has been before the House of Lords in the case of Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron and Coal Co. I think that they did not actually decide the point now before us, but it seems to me that they followed the previous dicta of which Jessel, M.R., had disapproved. Lord Watson said: "When a single lump sum is made payable by way of compensation on the occurrence of one or more or all of several events, some of which may occasion serious and others but trifling damage, the presumption is that the parties intended the sum to be penal and subject to modification." If, instead of "trifling damage," he had said "less substantial damage," then I think his statement would support the previous dicta. Lord Herschell said: "The agreement does not provide for the payment of a lump sum upon the non-performance of any one of many obligations differing in importance. It has reference to a single obligation, and the sum to be paid bears a strict proportion to the extent to which that obligation is left unfulfilled." In the present case there is a substantial difference between the two obligations for the breach of which compensation is to be paid; yet the same sum is payable in the event of the breach of either. Therefore I think that it is a penalty, and not liquidated damages. We are not bound by the Irish case; and, in my opinion, the appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The lease contains a covenant that if the tenant shall remove hay or straw during the last twelve months of the tenancy he shall pay additional rent at the rate of £3 per ton by way of penalty. The defendant says that this sum cannot be recovered as liquidated damages, but that the plaintiff must show the damage which he has actually suffered. I have no doubt that the covenant ought to be so construed. There are two separate stipulations, one as to hay, the other as to straw, and evidence was given showing these stipulations to be of varying importance; and I take it to be the law that where one sum is fixed for breach of stipulations of varying importance that sum is primâ facie to be treated as a penalty. I do not think that the use of the word "penalty" in the covenant is conclusive; but when, as seems to me to be the case here, the circumstances show that the sum is one which the courts treat as a penalty, the fact of that word being used by the parties seems to me to make the case stronger.

RIGBY, L.J.—I have not so clear an opinion on this question as the other members of the court. It is a question on which learned judges have taken different views. In my opinion the courts have gone wrong in departing from the principle of giving effect to the intention of the parties in construing written agreements. The result has been that it is now impossible to reconcile the various decisions in accordance with any principle. The conclusion to which I have come is that I do not feel able to dissent from the judgment of Collins, J., in this case, though I confess that I have a good deal of doubt on the matter.

KISSAM v. LINK. (a.)

Banker—Inspection of banker's book—Banker resident in Scotland—Jurisdiction—Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879 (42 Vict. c. 11), s. 7.

The English court has jurisdiction under section 7 of of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, upon an application made in an English action, to order inspection of a banker's books where the banker is resident in Scotland.

Appeal from an order made by Cave, J., at chambers.

This was an application by the plaintiff under section 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, for liberty to inspect and take copies of entries in the books of the Union Bank of Scotland (Limited), of Glasgow, containing the account of the defendant.

The application was granted by the master, but his order was reversed by Cave, J., on the ground that there was no jurisdiction to make such an order on a Scotch bank.

The plaintiff appealed.

A. T. Lawrence, for the plaintiff.—By the terms of section 7 the application can only be made by a party to a legal proceeding; and section 10 shows that the court to which the application is made must be the court in which the legal proceeding is held or taken. Therefore in this case the order can only be made by the English court. There is nothing in the Act which says that the order cannot be made by an English judge when the banker is resident in Scotland.

C. C. Scott, for the defendant.—There is no jurisdiction to make the order. The banker must be a banker over whom the court has jurisdiction. The Act does not provide any machinery by which an order could be enforced against a Scotch or Irish banker; and the court will not make an order which cannot be enforced.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question is whether an English judge may make an order under the Bankers' Books Evidence Act on a banker resident in Scotland. The interpretation clause says that the expression "a judge" in the Act means, with respect to England, a judge of the High Court of Justice. I think that the meaning of that is that where the cause is in England the order is to be made by a judge of the High Court. There is no limit in the Act as to where the banker may be resident. Therefore, where the cause is in England, the order may be made by a judge of the High Court, though the banker be resident in Scotland.

I therefore think that the appeal must be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an application under section 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, which says that "on the application of any party to a legal proceeding a court or judge may order that such party be at liberty to inspect and take copies of any entries in a banker's book for any of the purposes of such proceedings." Section 10 says that "the court" means the court, judge, arbitrator, persons, or person before whom a legal proceeding is held or taken; and "a judge" means with respect to England a judge of the High Court of Justice, and with respect to Scotland a lord ordinary of the Outer House of the Court of Session, and with respect to Ireland a judge of the High Court of Justice in Ireland. Further, the judge of a county court may, with respect to any action in such court, exercise the powers of a judge under the Act. The Act clearly applies to Scotland and Ireland; and in my opinion, where the action is proceeding in England, the order may be made by an English judge on a banker who may be resident in Scotland or Ireland.

It is said that there is no machinery provided by the Act by which an order if made against a Scotch or Irish banker can be enforced. I am not at all sure that that is correct. But however that may be, I think that there is power to make the order.

Practice — Pleading — Document — Contents — Effect — Sufficiency—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 21.

The statement of claim in an action for the recovery of land contained the following paragraph: "By the will of the said H. L., made on the 27th of February, 1785, and duly proved on the 18th of July of that year, the said M. L. became entitled to the said estates in fee in reversion on the determination of certain estates tail limited in the said will."

Held, that the paragraph was properly pleaded under ord. 19, r. 21, and that it was not necessary to set out the precise words of the will.

Appeal from an order of Lawrance, J., that a paragraph in a statement of claim should be struck out as embarrassing.

The statement of claim in an action for the recovery of land alleged that in 1728 Mary Taberner was seised in fee and in possession of certain lands and hereditaments, and that in 1765 Mary Taberner married Holt Leigh, and they jointly levied a fine of the said estates to certain uses limited therein.

The 4th paragraph was as follows: "By the will of the said Holt Leigh, made on the 27th of February, 1785, and duly proved on the 18th of July of that year, the said Mary Taberner or Leigh became entitled to the said estates in fee in reversion, on the determination of certain estates tail limited in the said will."

The statement of claim then alleged that the last of the said estates tail was determined by failure of the issue of the said Holt Leigh in or about the month of June, 1868, and that the plaintiffs were entitled in fee as heirs at law of the said Mary Taberner or Leigh. The plaintiffs claimed possession of the said estates.

The defendants took out a summons under ord. 19, r. 27, asking that the 4th paragraph of the statement of claim might be struck out as embarrassing, inasmuch as it did not sufficiently set out the words of the will.

Lawrance, J., having ordered that the paragraph should be struck out unless it was amended within a certain time, the plaintiffs appealed.

C. A. Russell, for the plaintiffs.

Ambrose, Q.C., and R. Eaton White, for the defendants.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the question is whether the plaintiff has pleaded improperly so as to make it right that the judge should order part of his statement of claim to be struck out. That seems to me to depend on whether he has followed the terms of ord. 19, r. 21, which says that "wherever the contents of any document are material, it shall be sufficient in any pleading to state the effect thereof as briefly as possible, without setting out the whole or any part thereof, unless the precise words of the document or any part thereof are material." In the case of Philipps v. Philipps, 27 W. R. 436, 4 Q. B. D. 127, things were said, which, I think, throw light on the meaning of that rule. A distinction was drawn between two kinds of facts—viz., facts which it is necessary for a party to prove in order to support his case, and facts which are evidence of those necessary facts. In pleading, as a general rule, the party ought to state the facts which it is necessary for him to prove. Rule 21 deals with facts which are evidence of the facts which have to be proved. The question is how to deal with a document which is evidence of facts to be proved. The rule says that it is sufficient to state the effect thereof as briefly as possible. That is the general rule, to which there is this exception: "Unless the precise words of the document or any part thereof are material." This exception refers to cases of libel, and although in my opinion we ought not to say that it is confined to libel, still I think that the cases other than libel in which the precise words of a document are material, must be very few. But are the precise words material here? I think not. The effect of the document is material, and the plaintiff, having stated the effect, has not broken the rule. The case of Philipps v. Philipps is not against our present decision. The paragraph in question is properly pleaded, and ought not to be struck out. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

Default having been made in payment of the interest, the plaintiffs brought this action, and applied for leave to sign final judgment under ord. 14, r. 1. Cave, J., made the order as asked.

The defendant appealed.

Montague Lush, for the defendant.—This case does not come within ord. 3, r. 6 (f), and therefore the writ cannot be specially indorsed. This is an action to recover possession founded on a forfeiture, and Arden v. Boyce, 42 W. R. 354, [1894] 1 Q. B. 796, shows that ord. 3, r. 6 (f), does not apply to such a case. The attornment in the mortgage deed created a tenancy from year to year, and the subsequent clause giving the mortgagee power to retake possession at any time was a forfeiture of the tenant's estate. Further, assuming that a tenancy at will was created by the attornment clause, such a tenancy does not come within ord. 3, r. 6 (f), as it is not a tenancy for a "term which has expired": Daubuz v. Lavington, 32 W. R. 772, 13 Q. B. D. 347; Hall v. Comfort,, 35 W. R. 48, 18 Q. B. D. 11; In re Willis, Ex parte Kennedy, 36 W. R. 793, 21 Q. B. D. 384.

A. T. Toller, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In Arden v. Boyce it was decided that ord. 3, r. 6 (f), does not apply to a case where the determination of the term is brought about by a forfeiture. The question therefore is whether there was in this case a determination of the term by a forfeiture. There is a clause in the mortgage deed whereby the mortgagor attorns tenant to the mortgagee from year to year. But there is also a subsequent clause which gave the mortgagee power, without there being any default on the part of the mortgagor, to enter upon and take possession of the premises at any time without giving previous notice. This latter clause is entirely independent of any forfeiture. Accordingly the decision in Arden v. Boyce does not apply, and judgment can be signed under order 14.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In Arden v. Boyce this court held that ord. 3, r. 6 (f), does not apply to a case in which the right to eject is based upon a forfeiture. In the present case the mortgagee seeks to eject the mortgagor, simply because the relationship of landlord and tenant has determined. True, one clause in the mortgage deed says that the mortgagor is to be a tenant from year to year. But by a subsequent clause the mortgagee might at any time, without giving any notice, enter upon and take possession of the premises, and determine the tenancy. That is to say, the mortgagor was made tenant at the will of the mortgagee, the landlord. The landlord has determined the tenancy as he was entitled to do, and there has been no forfeiture, and the decision in Arden v. Boyce does not apply.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The law takes no notice in general of the length of a term of years. A term does not give the seisin. It merely gives the possession as long as the term continues. The word "term" signifies a right to possession until the term comes to an end. The term may be for 1,000 years, or for any other fixed period, or during the will of the landlord. But in each case the term is of the same quality in the eye of the law. The decision in Arden v. Boyce was founded upon a principle which had been established by a long course of practice at chambers under ord. 3, r. 6 (f), and the previous statutory enactments containing similar words, that the court will not give a summary judgment in cases where an action for the recovery of land is based upon a forfeiture. A forfeiture is founded upon some default. In the present case there was no default whatever. It was agreed under the terms of the mortgage deed that there should be a tenancy from year to year, subject to a very important condition that the tenancy could be put an end to at any time without any precious notice, and without any default on the part of the tenant. The landlord determined the tenancy under the provisions of that clause. There was therefore no forfeiture. It would be strange, indeed, if a tenant for 1,000 years would, at the determination of the term, be liable to have judgment for possession entered against him under order 14, while a tenant at will would, on the determination of his tenancy, have a higher right.

Appeal dismissed.

KENNEDY v. DE TRAFFORD. (a.)

Mortgage — Power of sale — Mortgage by tenants in common — Sale by private tender to one of mortgagors for exact amount of mortgage debt — Other mortgagors not informed of sale — Validity of sale.

A mortgagee is not a trustee of a power of sale for the mortgagor, and is entitled to look after his own interests first, provided that he does not fraudulently, wilfully, or recklessly sacrifice the property of the mortgagor.

A sale under the ordinary power of sale in a mortgage was made by the mortgagee, by private contract to one of several of the mortgagors, at a price exactly equal to the amount of the principal interest and costs, but without the knowledge or consent of the other mortgagors;

Held, that such a sale was not necessarily invalid; and it appearing that an out and out sale was in fact intended, and that the mortgagee had previously given all the mortgagors the fullest opportunity of obtaining a transfer of the mortgage or of selling, if they could, the transaction was upheld as a valid sale to—not a mere redemption by—one of the several mortgagors.

Dictum of Lindley, L.J., in Farrar v. Farrars (Limited), 37 W. R. 196, 40 Ch. D. 395, explained.

Appeal from the Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

On the 1st of March, 1877, certain property in Manchester was mortgaged to Sir H. de Trafford by two tenants in common, Dodson and Carswell, to secure £60,000. The mortgage contained a power of sale in the usual form.

Sir H. de Trafford, the mortgagee, died on the 4th of May, 1886, and on the 9th of August, 1886, one of the mortgagors, Carswell, became bankrupt.

From the year 1883 the mortgagee's solicitor, Mr. Taylor, began to ask to have the mortgage money reduced, and on the 4th of November, 1886, after the bankruptcy of Carswell, notice calling in the mortgage was served. Various propositions were subsequently made for the reduction of the mortgage, but no part of it was paid off. On the 9th of January, 1888, the plaintiff, Dr. Kennedy, became the trustee in Carswell's bankruptcy. In May, 1888, Mr. Taylor was informally advised that the security was insufficient for a loan of £60,000, and he again pressed for payment, threatening foreclosure. Upon this there was further correspondence with a view to finding a purchaser, but nothing was done. In August, 1888, the plaintiff put up Carswell's moiety in the equity of redemption for sale, but there was no bid. On the 10th of August Taylor wrote a letter to Kennedy to the effect that the mortgagees intended to deal with the property as they pleased without further notice to him. That letter was not answered. In November, 1888, Mr. Taylor advertised the mortgaged property for sale by tender. No tenders, however, were made. Dodson received the rents of the property, paying the outgoings and the interest on the mortgages. Subsequently to Carswell's bankruptcy Dodson applied some part of the rents in reduction of the mortgage debt, which was then reduced to £58,123 5*s*. Dodson, one of the mortgagors (without the knowledge or consent of Kennedy), then offered to buy the property for £58,806 if the mortgagee would accept from him a mortgage for £54,000. This offer was ultimately accepted, and on the 16th of May, 1889, the property was conveyed to Dodson for £58,806, Dodson paying the £4,000 odd in cash and giving a mortgage for the balance.

This sale first came to the plaintiff Kennedy's knowledge in September, 1891, but from that date to May, 1895, he took no steps to impeach the transaction. During that time, however, he had brought an action against Dodson claiming, on the footing of partnership, to be entitled, as representing Carswell, to one-half of the profits made by the sale.

Kennedy now brought this action against the mortgagee to set aside the sale, and the Vice-Chancellor, being of opinion that reasonable precautions to obtain a proper price had not been taken, declared the sale to be invalid.

The defendants, the executors of Sir H. de Trafford; and Dodson, appealed.

Warmington, Q.C., and Clarkson, for the executors of Sir H. de Trafford. The mortgagees are not charged with want of bonâ fides, and there is no ground for avoiding the sale.

Astbury, Q.C., and G. Dodson, for the appellant Dodson.—There was no fiduciary relationship between Dodson and Kennedy. [They were stopped by the court.]

Farwell, Q.C., *P. O. LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal against an order made by the Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, declaring a sale by mortgagees under their power of sale to be invalid, and giving consequential relief; and the question, and the only question, raised on this appeal is whether that judgment is right or whether it is wrong.

The mortgage containing the power of sale which has been exercised, was a mortgage by two tenants in common of property in Manchester for £60,000, and the sale was by the mortgagee's executors. The power of sale contained in the mortgage deed was in the usual form, and the proviso for redemption was in the usual form; there was a provision that six months' notice was to be given before exercising it, and that condition was complied with. I merely mention that to show that the mortgage contained the usual powers of sale, and there was nothing special about it.

Now, what the mortgagees did (and I will state shortly the circumstances which led to it) was this. In May, 1889, they purported to sell this property under that power of sale to one of the mortgagors for the amount of principal and interest and costs. That is the transaction complained of. Mr. Farwell has invited us to affirm a proposition, which is entirely new to me, and which, of course, we have considered—that is, that such a transaction as this cannot stand in point of law; that is to say, that if several tenants in common of property mortgage that property, and confer upon the mortgagee a power of sale, a sale to one of the mortgagors for principal, interest, and costs, cannot be maintained under any circumstances, or, at all events, without the consent of, or notice to, the other mortgagor or mortgagors. Of course, if that is right, away goes this sale, because this was precisely a sale of that description. But is that proposition right? As I say, it has the merit of novelty; there is no authority discoverable in support of it, and on principle it appears to me to be untenable. Just consider how it acts upon the mortgagee—how such a doctrine as that would fetter the mortgagee in the exercise of his power of sale. It might be, and I think this case is itself an illustration of it, that if that doctrine were enforced, the mortgagee never could enforce his power of sale at all. I am not aware of any such authority or of any principle which goes that length. The mortgagee is entitled to sell to anybody who can buy, dealing, of course, fairly and properly in the ordinary way. I see no ground whatever for excluding any mortgagor if there happen to be several. It may be one of the very best protections for the mortgagee that he should be able to sell to such a person, if he cannot find a better purchaser. Now, upon that broad point I do not think this appeal can succeed, and, so far as I can see, that broad point was not even submitted to the Vice-Chancellor. He has not alluded to it in any way, as I take it for granted he would have done, if only for the ingenuity and the novelty of it.

But now we leave that, and treat this as a possible exercise of the power of sale. I want now to see whether there is any other ground for impeaching it. Mr. Farwell has suggested that this is merely a redemption by one mortgagor in disguise. The answer to that, I think, is to be found in the facts. Of course it might be so, there is no reason why it could not. But if you look at the facts it is quite obvious that Mr. Dodson, who was the purchaser, was not redeeming, and was not in a position to redeem. The mortgagees never would have got a farthing out of him upon any theory of redemption; unless he had become a purchaser, nothing would have led him to pay off the mortgage, and it is not in accordance with the facts to say that this was a redemption. I am not prepared to say that it is impossible, in point of law, for a mortgagor, or one of several mortgagors, to buy at the particular price which would enable the mortgagee to satisfy himself. If we cannot go that length, it would be absurd, it strikes me, to say that if it was £5 more or £5 less the doctrine would not apply. If it is a sale, I do not think there is anything to compel us to say that it must be a redemption. But was it a sale? I think the evidence is conclusive that it was. Both parties intended it to be a sale, and for the best possible reason—that redemption could not have been got.

Now, upon what ground can the sale be impeached? The Vice-Chancellor begins his judgment by referring to the cases of Warner v. Jacob and Farrar v. Farrars (Limited), which contain the principles applicable to this case, and then he says: "Now, in this case it is not suggested that the mortgagees did not act bonâ fide; and it is not suggested that there was any corruption or collusion on their part, or that the sale itself was at an under value so gross as to be in itself evidence of fraud." If that is so, and I believe every word of it, upon what ground can the sale be set aside? It is very difficult indeed to see; but by following the Vice-Chancellor's judgment I think I do see, what led him to set it aside. He was led, and I think a little misled, by some language which I used in the case of Farrar v. Farrars (Limited), which is as follows: "If in exercise of his power he"—that is, the mortgagee—"acts bonâ fide, and takes reasonable precautions to obtain a proper price, the mortgagor has no redress, even though more might have been obtained for the property if the sale had been postponed." Now, the Vice-Chancellor has come to the conclusion, in the present case, that reasonable precautions to obtain a proper price were not used. I find from my colleagues who took part in the judgment in Farrar v. Farrars (Limited), and who approved of it, that the reason why those words were added was this. A mortgagee is not a trustee of a power of sale for the mortgagor at all; his right is to look after himself first. But he is not at liberty to look after his own interests alone, and it is not right or proper or legal for him, either fraudulently or wilfully or recklessly to sacrifice the property of the mortgagor—that is all. If it could be said in this case that Mr. Taylor, who was the solicitor acting for the mortgagees, had done any of those things, I can understand setting aside the sale; but upon the facts it appears to me that, instead of not taking reasonable precautions, in the sense in which those words are used, to obtain a purchaser at a good price for this property, Mr. Taylor has, from first to last, acted like an honourable, upright, and businesslike man; attending, of course, to the interests of his clients, but, in my judgment, not in the least sacrificing the interests of the mortgagors. It is impossible to read the correspondence through, beginning as it does in 1879 and running down to 1895, to nearly the commencement of this action, without seeing that Mr. Taylor gave these mortgagors every possible opportunity of transferring or reducing the mortgage, or of selling, if they could. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] Accordingly, on the 16th of May, 1889, the property is conveyed to Dodson for £58,806, of which Dodson pays £4,000 odd down, and gives a mortgage for the balance, £54,000. That is the transaction impeached.

It is impeached on the broad ground which I have dealt with already; and now I will consider whether upon some narrower ground it can be set aside. It has been said that it was the duty of the mortgagees to inform Dr. Kennedy of this negotiation of Dodson for the sale. I confess I do not see that there is any such duty. It is said, and said truly, that Dodson said to the mortgagees: "Do not mention my name." Very likely, but how does that affect the bona fides of the mortgagees or the validity of the transaction? The real truth is, I suppose, that the creditors, or Dr. Kennedy on behalf of the creditors, have found out now that the property is worth more, and they are annoyed that Dodson, the co-mortgagor, should obtain that benefit.

No inquiry seems to have been made at the time by Kennedy; but in September, 1891—that is more than two years after the sale—Dr. Kennedy's solicitors write to Mr. Taylor making inquiries about it, and seeking to redeem, and they are told that the property was sold long ago. That is important, because in 1891 they knew all about the matter, what the sale was, and what the price was. From September, 1891, down to May, 1895, not a step is taken to impeach this transaction. Not only does Dr. Kennedy refrain from taking any step impeaching the transaction; but he brings an action against Dodson, the co-mortgagor, which is only intelligible upon the theory that the sale is affirmed. He says to Dodson: "You are the partner of the bankrupt, and I, as representing the bankrupt, am entitled to one-half of the profit you have made by that sale." So five years pass with full knowledge on the plaintiff's part of all the facts, no attempt to impeach the transaction, and a step taken which is utterly inconsistent with the invalidity of the sale. After that delay and election to abide by the transaction, with that full knowledge of the facts, I should have said this action was utterly hopeless.

But, quite apart from that, I think it only due to Mr. Taylor to say that I am distinctly of opinion that if this action had been brought a month after that sale to Dodson, the sale could not have been impeached. It appears to me that we should be throwing the greatest possible difficulties in the way of mortgagees if we were to say that Mr. Taylor, acting for these mortgagees, had done anything wrong, or had failed to take any step which was reasonable and proper in such a transaction as this. It is not only for the benefit of the mortgagees that powers of sale should be exercisable with facility. It is for the benefit of those who want to borrow money on mortgage quite as much as for the benefit of the lender. If mortgagees cannot realize their securities with comparative ease and safety, who will lend money on mortgage, and what will become of owners of property if their facilities of borrowing are destroyed by a strict, rigid application to powers of sale of principles which may possibly rest on very refined equities, but which are utterly unfit for ordinary business purposes? It appears to me that there was nothing at all amiss with this sale, and the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor must therefore be reversed, and the action dismissed with costs.

Now, as regards Dodson, it is said: Well, be it so; but you, Dodson, at all events, made some profit out of this transaction, which you ought to account for to Kennedy as owner of the other half of the mortgage. The answer to that is, I think, twofold. In the first place that claim has been based upon the theory of partnership, and partnership alone, and it has been already fought out and decided against Kennedy, in the action of Kennedy v. Dodson. In the present action to set aside the sale I cannot find that any such relief as that, was ever sought subsequent to the amendment. At first it was, but all that part of the prayer which relates to the partnership was afterwards struck out. In other words, the plaintiff has deliberately in the action of Kennedy v. Dodson stated his claim against Dodson upon the theory of partnership, and has been beaten, and no alternative case is raised upon the pleadings in this action. It appears to me, therefore, that upon this state of things no relief whatever can be given in this action against Dodson, even if the plaintiff were entitled to it. Some relief was given against Dodson in the action of Kennedy v. Dodson. There is an account, and if the plaintiff is entitled under the judgment in that action to make Dodson account for £864, or any other profits, he will be at liberty to do so. I do not say anything at all about it. I do say this, that I doubt very much whether under any conceivable theory the plaintiff can be entitled to anything more than a share of that £864. I do not believe in the theory that the sale to Dodson was a sale to him in such a fiduciary character as would disentitle him from holding the property. I do not think it was. As to that £864 I say nothing at all. There may possibly be a case about that.

But we are asked to say (and this is a very important point) that one of several tenants in common cannot get in for his own benefit an outstanding incumbrance, or an outstanding estate, or cannot be treated as otherwise than a fiduciary owner, standing in some fiduciary relation to his co-tenant. As a general proposition that appears to me not to be the law of England. It is very true that in this case Dodson received the rents. He was appointed to receive the rents. He was the agent of his co-tenant to receive the rents, and to that extent he must account, and so he has been ordered to account in the other action. But to say that because of that he could not buy is going further than I am prepared to go. With reference to the case which Mr. Farwell cited, the American case decided by Chancellor Kent (Van Horne v. Fonda), all I can say is this: I do not believe myself that there ever was a lawyer of greater attainments and greater judgment, and greater skill in the application of principles, than Chancellor Kent; but I do not know how far the law of America and the law of England are allied in these matters. I do happen to know this, that according to the law of America it is much easier for one co-owner of real property to get a lien on the whole, than it is in this country. Whether that affected the learned judge's view I do not know; but I am not prepared on the authority of that case to say that Dodson could be compelled to account for the profit he may have made out of this sale. If such an account can be got in the action of Kennedy v. Dodson, well and good; but no such account can be ordered in the present action. Therefore my judgment in this case is that the appeal must be allowed, and the action dismissed, with costs.

KAY, L.J.—I will add only a few remarks, out of respect to the learned Vice-Chancellor, from whose decision we differ. With all deference to him, it seems to me he has put a mortgagee in a more difficult situation than any authority which I know of in our books up to this time has done. Any loan of money on mortgage is, between mortgagor and mortgagee, a simple matter of business. They contract between themselves as to what their mutual rights and obligations shall be in regard to that loan of money. The court of equity has persistently refused to find in that relation anything like fiduciary duty on the part of one to the other so long as the mortgage exists. I agree that if the mortgagee realizes the mortgage, and receives more than enough to pay what is due upon it, with respect to the balance he does become in a fiduciary position; or if he gets the mortgage paid off, and has to deal with the property, he must take great care that he reconveys the property to the person who is really entitled. But otherwise, so long as the mortgage lasts and the money is due, the mortgagee is not, with reference to his power under that mortgage, in a fiduciary position to the mortgagor in any sense. I think the learned Vice-Chancellor in this case has treated the mortgagee as being subject to obligations and duties to the mortgagors which, according to my understanding of the law, do not exist at all.

Now, Lindley, L.J., has read from the judgment a passage which I had particularly remarked. The learned Vice-Chancellor says: "Now, in this case, it is not suggested that the mortgagees did not act bonâ fide, and it is not suggested that there was any corruption or collusion on their part, or that the sale itself was at an under value so gross as to be in itself evidence of fraud." Beginning his judgment with that emphatic statement, he goes on to a minute examination of the valuations and the other circumstances, from which he seems to come to the conclusion that the mortgagee did not exercise all that care and precaution which the learned Vice-Chancellor thinks he ought to have exercised by reason of some duty which he owed to the mortgagor. I confess, looking at the facts in this case, which are beyond dispute and denial, and which are contained chiefly in the correspondence, I come to an entirely different conclusion from the learned Vice-Chancellor, even on that point; but I differ essentially from him in the notion, which seems to me to pervade his judgment, of what are the duties of a mortgagee towards a mortgagor. [His lordship considered the facts, and continued:—] Now, reading as I have done the words by which the Vice-Chancellor began his judgment, what other ground can there be for setting this sale aside? Of course, we know there were a large number of other points argued—first of all, that Dodson was a tenant in common of the equity of redemption of this property with the trustee in bankruptcy of Carswell, his co-mortgagor; and it was broadly argued that a sale by the mortgagees to one of two mortgagors is ipso facto an improper thing. There is no authority for that in any English book that I know of. I never heard the proposition before, and I cannot conceive that it should be so, and it strikes me that it would be a very great disadvantage for people who want to borrow money if it were so, because the doctrine takes from the possible purchasers of the property under the power of sale one of the persons who would be most likely to give a good price for it. One of several tenants in common of a mortgaged property would be very likely to give much more than a mere outsider, in order to purchase a property. It would be a disadvantage, instead of an advantage, if that were forbidden by law. But what law forbids it? On what ground could such an order be made? There is no fiduciary relation, nothing which makes a mortgagor unable to buy from the mortgagee, that I have heard of. It is quite true that if there be a single mortgagor he has nothing to do but redeem, and if he pays the principal, interest, and costs, he redeems; but where there are several mortgagors, if one of them agrees to buy under the power of sale, what is there to prevent him? I confess, with all deference to the authority which is cited from the American reports (Van Horne v. Fonda), I do not think that authority is consistent with any law which has been established in England. I hold distinctly that there is nothing in the position of one of several mortgagor tenants in common to prevent him from buying the mortgaged property under the ordinary power of sale contained in the mortgage deed. So much for that point.

But then it was said, and this point was strenuously argued, that this was not in fact a sale at all; that it really was a redemption by one of the mortgagors; that Dodson only paid principal, interest, and costs, and for one of the several mortgagors to pay principal, interest, and costs is merely a redemption by that mortgagor. To my mind nothing can be clearer than this, that if Dodson had been asked to redeem for this price he would not have listened. What he wanted to do was to obtain the property as his own. There is not one word about redemption in any of the correspondence—in any of the evidence as to the negotiations, I mean—about treating this as a redemption; and that the parties never intended redemption, but did intend it to be a bonâ fide sale under the power of sale is absolutely undeniable. The mortgagee wants to exercise the power of sale. He finds the only way in which he can possibly get his money is by selling the property out and out to one of the mortgagors. He agrees with that mortgagor to sell it to him out and out, under his power of sale, and it is made out on these terms. What turns that into a redemption which was intended by both parties to be a sale? It was admitted that if this purchase money had been slightly above or slightly below the amount of principal, interest, and costs it could not have been redemption; and can that which is intended to be, and is carried out as, a bonâ fide sale, be said to be a redemption because the amount of the money which is all the mortgagee can get from anyone happens to be the same as the amount of principal, interest, and costs? I am not in the least impressed by that argument. It seems to me this was not a redemption in any sense, but it was intended to be a bonâ fide sale of the property under the mortgagees' power of sale.

Then another point was attempted, which was this: It was said that Dodson was in a fiduciary position, and that was sought to be made out in this way. Dodson was one of the two tenants in common of the equity of redemption. Dodson, by arrangement between himself and the representative of Carswell, received the rents, out of those rents he paid the interest of the mortgage; he also, it is said, managed the property—that is to say, he seems to have arranged with the tenants who took leases of the property, but of course he could not let it—he had no power of letting without the concurrence of the co-mortgagor. That is all, and that is the only way in which any suggestions can be made of fiduciary relation between Dodson and the representative of Carswell.

Now, is that a fiduciary relation which prevented Dodson from buying? I understand it might be pushed to this extent, though I do not agree with it, that if Dodson did buy, Carswell's representative might claim to share in the advantage of the purchase which he had made. But how can it affect the validity of the sale? To affect the validity of the sale you must show that there was a fiduciary relation between Dodson and the mortgagee. That was out of the question, as I pointed out. There was nothing like it. Therefore how any fiduciary relation between Dodson and the representative of Carswell can affect the validity of the sale I am totally at a loss to conceive. In my opinion it did not in any way, supposing that fiduciary relation to exist. I do not mean for a moment to express any opinion that a claim against Dodson by Dr. Kennedy on that ground could be supported; and the less is it probable for this reason, that, as pointed out, Dr. Kennedy did actually bring an action against Dodson claiming that they were partners, and claiming to share in the profit of this purchase upon that ground, and upon that ground only; and it was not until that suit came nearly to an end that he ever in any way raised this point of there being a fiduciary relation by reason of the receipt of the rents. That suit, so far as the claim to partnership was concerned, has been dismissed; and there, I think, is an end of it. That makes it, to my mind, utterly improbable that any claim could be maintained against Dodson upon that footing if we had to consider that. But I do not think we have to consider that, in this case at all. In this case the question is whether the sale was good or not. [His lordship then dealt with the facts as to delay and acquiescence, and came to the conclusion that the plaintiff came too late to impeach the sale. He then continued:—] However, I do not choose to rest my judgment merely upon that point, because it seems to me, looking at all the other facts, there is a very good answer indeed to this claim to impeach the sale. And, as I said before, I do not believe, if the mortgagee had at the time communicated to Dr. Kennedy the fact of the sale, that Kennedy would or could have interfered with the sale to Dodson, or that we should have heard of this litigation at all. Evidently Dr. Kennedy seeks to impeach this because the name of the purchaser was kept a secret from him at the time of the transaction, and he seems to have thought that gave him some right, either against Dodson or against the mortgagee, to obtain either the benefit of the sale, which was what he first sought, or, if not that, then to impeach the sale. I think this is not a ground at all on which any relief such as is given in this case by the learned Vice-Chancellor could be possibly granted.

Then there remains the question as between Kennedy and Dodson. Kennedy says shortly this: "Suppose this sale should stand, yet, between the time when you agreed to buy and the time when the sale was actually carried out, you went on receiving rents to the amount of £864, and those rents you applied as part of your purchase money in making this purchase, and I claim against you one moiety of that £864." That point is not raised in this action at all. This is a mere action for setting aside. If there be any such claim, which I do not for a moment wish to encourage, it may be brought in under the accounts which have been directed in Kennedy v. Dodson, of the rents received by Dodson, for which he is liable to account to Kennedy. How he can be liable to account for any other rent beyond that £864 I do not understand, because it seems to be admitted in this case that all the other rents were paid, either in keeping down the mortgage or in payment of the interest to the mortgagees. However that is a matter we have not to consider.

I end by concurring entirely in what has been already said, that Mr. Taylor acted in this case as a business man would act. He acted with very great consideration for the mortgagors—much more consideration than many mortgagees in his position would have shown—he acted as you would expect a solicitor for such a family as the De Traffords would act, with care and caution and consideration; and there is not in all that he did, to my mind, anything which can be observed upon against Mr. Taylor in any shape or way. In saying that, I am, of course, dealing with the position of the mortgagees. They acted through Mr. Taylor; his conduct was their conduct for the purposes of an action of this kind.

Therefore I think that the mortgagees are entitled to the judgment of the court. Their conduct from first to last has been entirely without any circumstance whatever which could throw the least doubt upon the validity of the sale. I therefore think that the decree which the learned Vice-Chancellor ought to have made in this case was to dismiss this action with costs.

BROWN v. STEDMAN. (a.)

Negligence—Lease—Surrender—Prior equitable mortgage—Notice—Priority.

A lessee who had deposited his lease by way of equitable mortgage with B. afterwards by deed surrendered the term to the lessor. The surrenderee at the time of surrender had asked the lessee to deliver up the instrument of lease, and was falsely informed by the lessee that he had left it with a friend, but that he (the lessee) had neither assigned nor charged his interest, nor pledged the instrument of lease. The surrenderee had no actual notice that the lease had been deposited by way of mortgage with B.

(a.) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the surrenderee had not, under these circumstances, been guilty of gross or wilful negligence, and was consequently entitled, as the holder of the legal estate, to priority over B., the prior equitable mortgagee.

Action.

This was an action asking for a declaration that a lease granted by the defendant, Mrs. Stedman, to J. Read was subsisting in favour of the plaintiffs as equitable mortgagees. The question turned on whether the defendant Stedman, who claimed to be surrenderee for value, was affected by constructive notice of the plaintiffs' charge.

In 1884 Mrs. Stedman had by deed demised certain premises to John Read for a term of twenty-one years.

In March, 1894, Read deposited the deed with the plaintiffs as security for a debt due from him to them.

In October, 1894, the plaintiffs commenced an action to enforce their security. This action was not registered as a lis pendens.

On the 22nd of November an order was made declaring that, the lease having been deposited with the plaintiffs by way of equitable charge, the plaintiffs were entitled to be considered mortgagees of the hereditaments comprised in the lease, and an account was ordered to be taken of what was due to the plaintiffs.

Pending such account and without the concurrence of the plaintiffs, negotiations were entered into by Read for the sale of the lease to one R. O. Friend, a co-defendant with Mrs. Stedman. Subsequently the lease was by deed of surrender surrendered by Read to Stedman, and a new lease was granted by her to Friend. Neither Mrs. Stedman nor Friend ever had actual notice of the plaintiffs' mortgage. The lease of 1884 was not handed over by Read at the time of the surrender; but the evidence of the managing clerk of Mrs. Stedman's solicitors was to the effect that, in answer to his inquiries after the deed, Read stated that he could not get it as a friend had it, but that he had not charged, assigned, or dealt with it in any way. In cross-examination, however, this witness admitted that Read appeared confused, and as if anxious to hide something. Friend was present when the surrender was signed by Read, and was represented by a separate solicitor.

Farwell, Q.C., and Edward Ford, for the plaintiffs.—A lessee has constructive notice of his lessor's title: Patman v. Harland, 29 W. R. 707, 17 Ch. D. 353. A surrender does not affect any derivative interest, whether by underlease or otherwise: Great Western Railway Co. v. Smith, 24 W. R. 443, 2 Ch. D. 235.

McSwinney, for Mrs. Stedman.—Mrs. Stedman's solicitors, by their managing clerk, made inquiries after the deed of 1884, and were bonâ fide satisfied with the answers of the lessee. There was no gross negligence on their part so as to affect my client with constructive notice of the plaintiffs' charge: Hewitt v. Loosemore, 9 Ha. 449; Espin v. Pemberton, 7 W. R. 221, 3 De G. & J. 547; Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Whipp, 32 W. R. 626, 26 Ch. D. 482. [CHITTY, J., referred to the judgment of Lord Cranworth in Perry Herrick v. Attwood, 6 W. R. 204, 2 De G. & J. 21.]

Rowden, for the defendant R. O. Friend.—Friend is a purchaser for value without notice. If Mrs. Stedman succeeds, Friend succeeds. He is in rather a better position. He satisfied himself that there was a proper surrender, and was not bound to see that the actual lease was handed back to the lessor. If he had made inquiries, he could only have got the same answer that Mrs. Stedman had. I rely on the Conveyancing Act, 1882, s. 3. Friend did everything a reasonable man could.

Farwell, Q.C., in reply.—There was gross negligence within the meaning of the authorities on the part of Mrs. Stedman's solicitors in their inquiries after the deed. There was no answer given as to the absence of the deed that could satisfy a reasonable man.

CHITTY, J.—The surrender was a transaction for value. Neither Mrs. Stedman nor her solicitors had actual notice of plaintiffs' charge. She did not get the instrument of lease. The case against her is that inquiries after it had to be made, and that, although inquiries were made, the answers given were such as to render her liable on the authorities. The law is well settled. In Hewitt v. Loosemore it was laid down that the holder of the legal estate is not to be postponed to a prior equitable one on the ground of his not having got in the title deeds, unless there be fraud or gross or wilful negligence on his part; and the court will not impute fraud or gross or wilful negligence to the holder of the legal estate if he has bonâ fide inquired for the deeds and a reasonable excuse has been given for not delivering them to him. This principle was also acted on in Espin v. Pemberton; and Lord Cranworth lays down the law in a similar way in Perry Herrick v. Attwood. It is a matter of fact in each case what constitutes negligence of this kind. One reported case is of little value on the facts in another. But taking the facts in Hewitt v. Loosemore and Espin v. Pemberton as a guide as to what has been considered gross negligence, in my opinion I should not be applying the true principle of law to the facts of this case if I were to hold that the legal title of the surrenderee should be postponed.

Damages—Measure of damages—Trespass—Injury to land—Wrongful tipping of spoil on land.

The defendants, who were colliery owners, had committed a trespass upon land to which they claimed to be entitled, but which was held at the trial of the above action to belong to the plaintiffs, by tipping or depositing thereon spoil, and they were restrained by injunction from further tipping upon the land. Part of the land had been covered by the defendants with spoil, the remainder was still available for tipping, but for no other purpose. An inquiry as to damages having been directed by the court.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages on the basis of the value of the land to the defendants for tipping purposes in respect of so much of the land as was actually used by the defendants for tipping, and as to the rest of the land, on the basis of its ordinary value, but without any interest.

Summons.

At the trial before Romer, J., the defendants, who were colliery owners, claimed title to certain land near their colliery by virtue of an alleged agreement, but it was held that there was no such agreement. By the judgment it was declared that the land belonged to the plaintiffs, and that the defendants had been guilty of committing a trespass upon the land by tipping or depositing thereon spoil or other material, and an injunction was granted restraining them from further tipping or depositing upon the land any spoil or other material. It was further ordered that the defendants should deliver possession of the land to the plaintiffs; and an inquiry was directed what, if any, sum of money was proper to be awarded to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs by way of damages for any injury sustained by the plaintiffs since the death of their predecessor in title by reason of the defendants' trespass by tipping or depositing spoil or other material upon the land. The form of the inquiry left open the question of the measure of damages.

In answer to the inquiry the official referee made a special report—first, that the sum proper to be paid by way of damage was the sum of £200; secondly, that the defendants had by their trespasses rendered the land belonging to the plaintiffs, 1a. 3r. 9p. in extent, valueless for any but tipping purposes; and, thirdly, that in assessing the £200 he had taken as the measure of damage the diminished value of the plaintiffs' land, in extent 1a. 3r. 9p., caused by the defendants' trespass. In arriving at the £200 the referee appeared to have taken the land at its agricultural value.

The plaintiffs had contended before the referee that the proper measure was the reasonable value of the land for tipping purposes, which was treated by the referee as £500 an acre, such being the purposes for which the defendants actually used the land, and also claimed interest by way of damages on such value from the time that the defendants commenced to trespass by tipping on the land. After referring to this contention with the claim for interest, the referee found that if the proper measure of damages were that so contended for, the sum to be paid was £963, and £141 5s. for interest, making together £1,104 5s.

The land in question was situate in a long, narrow valley to the north of the defendants' colliery, which was a short distance off. It appeared that there was no other land on the north of the colliery within a reasonable distance which the defendants could have procured for tipping purposes. Of the total area of the land 3r. 20p. had been covered by the defendants with spoil; the remaining portion, 3r. 29p., was still available for tipping purposes, but for no other purpose.

This was a summons on behalf of the plaintiffs to vary or refer back the above report.

Frederic Thompson, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants had the benefit of tipping on the plaintiffs' land, and the true measure of damages in such a case is not the ordinary value of the land, but the value for the purpose for which it was used by the defendants. In ordinary cases trespassers derive no benefit from their wrongdoing, but these defendants do. The case is analogous to the cases in reference to mining operations where trespassers have been held liable to pay on the footing of a way-leave (Martin v. Porter, 5 M. & W. 351; Jegon v. Vivian, 19 W. R. 365, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 742; Phillips v. Homfray, Fothergill v. Phillips, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 770, 20 W. R. Ch. Dig. 121), and not to the common case of injury to land, of which Jones v. Gooday, 8 M. & W. 146, which will be cited against the plaintiffs, is an example. The plaintiffs are entitled to interest by way of damages during the also time that they were kept out of their land by the defendants unlawfully tipping their spoil upon it: Marsh v. Jones, 40 Ch. D. 563, 37 W. R. Dig. 173; Peruvian Guano Co. v. Dreyfus, [1892] A. C. 166, 40 W. R. Dig. 69.

C. A. Russell, for the defendants.—The measure of damages ought to be the injury to the plaintiffs, not the benefit to the defendants: Hosking v. Phillips, 3 Ex. 168; Jones v. Gooday; Mayne on Damages, 5th ed., p. 430. The way-leave cases are very special, and offer no analogy here. Their principle does not apply to a case of innocent trespass like this. The defendants thought there was an agreement, and their acts were open and not surreptitious. There is no foundation for the claim to interest. The referee's assessment of damages is right, but the alternative assessment adopted by him is wrong, being on the footing that the defendants tipped on the whole of the land, which was not the case, and allowing interest, which ought not to be given on any view.

Thompson, in reply.—The principle of the way-leave cases is not confined to cases of guilty trespass. Jegon v. Vivian was not a case of that kind. [CHITTY, J., referred to Merest v. Harvey, 5 Taunt. 442.] Generally in cases of destructive trespass the consequent diminution in the value of the land is the limit of damages recoverable; in cases of beneficial trespass like this a different measure applies, and the referee was wrong in not taking into account the special value of the land to the defendants.

March 31.—CHITTY, J.—The question is, What is the measure of damages in the circumstances of the case?

In arriving at the £200 the referee appears to have followed the rule ordinarily applied in actions for injury to land (see Mayne on Damages, 5th ed., p. 430). In Jones v. Gooday, where the defendant in widening a ditch had cut into the plaintiff's land and carried away soil, it was decided that the plaintiff was entitled to be compensated for the loss he had actually sustained, and not for the expense of restoring the land to its original condition. The plaintiffs do not contend that the measure of damages is the expense of restoring the land to its former state, but they contend that the proper measure is the reasonable value of the land for tipping purposes, being the purposes for which the defendants actually used the land.

The question, then, is whether the value of the land for tipping purposes ought to be taken into consideration in assessing the damage. There is no authority directly in point. The plaintiffs rely on the decisions in reference to mining operations as showing the true principle. In Martin v. Porter Parke, B., directed the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation for the defendant passing through the plaintiff's coal with coals gotten from the defendant's own mines, and ought to pay as for a way-leave. Under the leave given to move to reduce the damages, the point whether this direction was right might have been raised, but it was not raised on the motion made. The actual damage sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the wrongful use of the underground way would have been trifling, but the principle acted upon was that the plaintiff was entitled to be compensated upon the footing of a grant of a way-leave at a reasonable rent, which was shown to be 2d. a ton in the neighbourhood. In Jegon v. Vivian the Master of the Rolls (Lord Romilly) and Lord Hatherley held that the plaintiffs were entitled to an inquiry what ought to be paid by way of way-leave for the passage of coal through their mines. In that case the defendants were trespassers who had held over after a lease granted by the tenant for life under a power, which lease was avoided by the plaintiffs, the reversioners. In regard to the coal which they had wrongfully gotten the defendants were ordered to pay damages, not on the more severe principle, but on the principle of their being (to use a phrase employed in these cases) "innocent trespassers"; yet in regard to the way they had to pay compensation on the footing of a way-leave. In Phillips v. Homfray, Fothergill v. Phillips, the damages were directed to be assessed on the same principle; but there the plaintiffs were treated as wilful or guilty trespassers.

Now, the question is whether the principle of the way-leave cases applies to a case of tipping. They are founded on the principle that a wrongdoer shall not make a profit out of his own wrong, and that the value of the land for the purposes for which it was actually used by the wrongdoer ought to be taken into consideration. There is this distinction between the way-leave cases and the case before me—that the use of the way for the passage of coal is underground and in some instances surreptitious, whereas in the case of tipping the user is on the surface and open; in the present case the fact appears to be that the plaintiffs were aware that the tipping was going on. But I cannot see that the distinction makes any substantial difference. I think that the principle does apply, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to damages on the basis of what would be a reasonable sum to be paid for the use of their land by the defendants for tipping purposes.

But, applying this principle consistently to the facts, I think that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the whole of the £1,104 5s. First, in regard to interest claimed, I think that all interest ought to be excluded from the computation of damages. To give interest would be to treat the plaintiffs as having invested their damages with interest in the hands of the defendants. Secondly, on the principle which I adopt, I think the plaintiffs are entitled to damages on the higher footing for so much only of the land as was actually used by the defendants for tipping. The plaintiffs at the trial obtained an injunction restraining the defendants from further tipping; the defendants cannot, therefore, use the rest of the land for tipping. To make the defendants pay the whole of the £963 would be to make them pay for the fee simple value of the land for tipping when they had used part only of the land for that purpose and are prevented by the injunction from so using the remainder. There is still an unexhausted tipping value in part of the land. It was admitted by counsel, as I understand, that of the total area of 1a. 3r. 9p. only 3r. 20p. were covered by spoil, and that the remainder—viz., 3r. 29p., or rather more than half—were still available for tipping, although valueless, as the referee finds, for any other purpose. It would be unjust to make the defendants pay for the 3r. 29p. on the principle of a tipping leave which they have not directly or indirectly enjoyed. In respect of this part of the land the defendants ought to pay on the footing of the diminished value of the land to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs' counsel said that on the evidence it would be impracticable for the plaintiffs to sell or let the 3r. 29p. for tipping purposes to any persons other than the defendants, and that the defendants, having found land to the south of their colliery, no longer required and would not take this portion of the land for tipping. Assuming this statement to be correct, it is immaterial. The plaintiffs cannot recover any greater sum for damages than is given by the just application of the principle which they invoke. I take it the parties will be able readily to apportion the damages in accordance with this judgment. If they cannot agree, the matter must go back to the referee with a proper direction.

A claim for a declaration that a mortgage is not charged upon property and for possession, and, in the alternative, for an account of what is due and redemption, is within ord. 18, r. 2.

Summons to strike out the plaintiff's statement of claim, because (inter alia) no leave was obtained to join other causes of action with a claim for recovery of land.

The statement of claim asked—(1) for a declaration that a certain mortgage constituted no charge on certain houses; (2) for possession of the said houses and property and the deeds relating thereto; (3) alternatively, so far as the alleged mortgage deed might be held to be a charge upon the property, for an account of what was due and redemption.

The indorsement on the writ was practically identical with the prayer of the statement of claim.

Hickey raised the preliminary point that the defendant, having appeared to the writ, could not now take the objection.

He cited Mulckern v. Doerks, 53 L. J. Q. B. 526, 32 W. R. Dig. 164; Wilmott v. Freehold House Co., 51 L. T. N. S. 552; and Hambling v. Wallani, W. N., 1889, p. 133.

NORTH, J.—I do not think that I can hold that this application is too late.

Beddall.—The claim is for two causes of action, redemption, and possession, and they cannot be joined without leave.

He referred to ord. 18, r. 2; Re Pilcher; and Gledhill v. Hunter, 28 W. R. 530, 14 Ch. D. 492.

NORTH, J.—I do not think that I need trouble you, Mr. Hickey. The plaintiff asks for a declaration that the mortgage is not charged upon the property, and to have the property given back to him. So far as the deed is a charge on the property, he asks to have what is due ascertained, and for redemption. These are the causes of action raised by the statement of claim, and they can be joined. In one claim the plaintiff asks for possession of the property on the footing that there is no mortgage; in the other he asks for possession if there is a mortgage, and in that case to pay it off. It seems to me that he is asking for relief to which he is entitled. He has a right to ask in the alternative.

Re MARGETTS (TAXATION). (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Several bills—One barred by the Statute of Limitations—Common order to tax—Vendor and purchaser—Several lots purchased—One or more bills—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, General Order, Sched. I., Part I., r. 8.

The taxing master ought to tax statute-barred costs, and leave the court to determine whether they ought to be paid.

Under a common order to tax obtained on application by the client, the client must pay what is found due on taxation; if the client wishes to raise the Statute of Limitations, he must obtain a special order.

Where several lots are bought for small sums, each having a separate title and separate abstract, a solicitor is entitled to the minimum scale fee in each case.

Summons.

This was an application on the part of A. M. Margetts to review the taxation of certain bills of costs. Messrs. H. C. Margetts & Son acted as solicitors for the applicant in respect of several matters, and delivered to her on the 26th of November, 1895, six bills of costs, the first of which was for work done between December, 1888, and October, 1889, though on the face of it it appeared to be for work done down to March, 1890. On the 19th of December, 1895, the client obtained the common order to tax the six bills. On the taxation, objection was taken to the first bill on the ground that it was statute-barred, and the taxing master certified that the bill was statute-barred, but nevertheless allowed it.

As regards another bill, a question was raised whether the purchase of four lots of land, all bought within a short period of time though not actually all together, really formed the subject of one transaction, or whether the solicitors were entitled to charge separately in respect of each lot. The purchase price of the several lots ranged from £10 to £105, and the solicitors had charged in respect of each lot the minimum scale fee allowed by rule 8 of Schedule I., Part I., of the general order made in pursuance of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, on the ground that each lot had a separate and distinct title, with separate abstracts which had to be investigated, and the taxing master had held the solicitors entitled to make this charge.

J. Ashton Cross, for the applicant.—The fact that the client has obtained the common order to tax does not prevent my relying on the Statute of Limitations as a bar to one of the bills. There is no acknowledgment by the client to take it out of the statute. There is nothing on the face of the first bill as delivered to show it is statute-barred. There are no items given, it is put as a sum charged for work done from December, 1888, to March, 1890. It was only on vouching that it appeared that the whole of the work was done by October, 1889: Budgett v. Budgett, 43 W. R. 167, [1895] 1 Ch. 202; Curwen v. Milburn, 38 W. R. 49, 42 Ch. D. 424; Green v. Humphreys, 26 Ch. D. 474, 32 W. R. Dig. 120. As to the second point, the work done was substantially one transaction, and the scale fee should be on the total amount of the purchase money added together.

T. L. Wilkinson, for the solicitors, was not called on.

KEKEWICH, J.—On such questions as the first raised on this application it is the practice of the judges of this division of the High Court to refer to the taxing master to ascertain whether there is any settled practice in the taxing office in relation thereto, and I have accordingly done so, and I find there is no settled practice. In Curwen v. Milburn it was held that the taxing master ought to tax all the items of the bill without regard to the Statute of Limitations, because the object was to ascertain the amount for which a lien was claimed; and in Budgett v. Budgett the taxing master rightly taxed statute-barred costs which retiring trustees claimed the right to retain out of the trust estate, as there the question was in respect of what the trustees were entitled to be indemnified. These two cases go a long way towards deciding that the taxing master was correct. The point I have to deal with is whether the taxing master ought to tax statute-barred costs. Convenience points to their being taxed. Whether they ought to be paid when taxed is a question for the court to determine. It is only the duty of the taxing master to deal with the items and say what ought to be allowed, and not to consider whether anything ought to be recovered. If I had found on inquiry that there was a fixed practice in the office, I should have followed it; but as I find there is not, the rule I have stated appears to me is the balance of convenience. Now the question is, Ought these particular costs to be paid? The order to tax is the common order with the usual submission to pay what appears to be due. No special conditions are annexed to the order, no exception is made as to disputing the retainer or otherwise. What, then, is the right of the client under such an order. He is bound to pay all costs which have been properly incurred. There is no injustice in that. He has the bills before him, and must know what business has been done. He applies for the order with his eyes open, and submits to pay what is due. The Statute of Limitations does not bar the debt, but merely the remedy. The more convenient construction of the order is that what is found on the taxation to be due is to be paid. The client submits to pay what is due on taxation. If the client wishes to raise the statute, it must be done by a special order.

As regards the second question, if the solicitor had been instructed to complete these purchases at separate intervals, so that each was completed before the other, the argument for the applicant would be untenable. Where there is one vendor of several properties and the same solicitor acting for him, so that the purchaser's solicitor has less trouble and his work is largely reduced, such a proposition might not be unreasonable. But the rule must be applied generally, and fine distinctions are impossible. Where, as in this case, each lot has a separate title, a separate abstract, and each title is investigated, the solicitor is entitled to the minimum scale fee in each case. The summons must be refused with costs.

MARSH v. JOSEPH. (a.)

Solicitor—Improper use of solicitor's name—Fund in court—Order for payment out on fraudulent petition

(a. Reported by F. T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by F. T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

— Dummy petitioner — Partnership — Liability to refund.

H., a solicitor, presented a fictitious petition, and thereby obtained an order for the payment out of a fund in court to a person whom he identified at the Paymaster-General's office as the supposed petitioner. H. had made use of the name of "C. & Co." (a firm of solicitors consisting of C. and G.) as if they were acting as solicitors for the supposed petitioner and had briefed counsel in their name, and had done all this without the knowledge of either C. or G.

On the 10th of August the Paymaster-General's cheque was paid into, and cleared by, a bank in which H. had caused an account to be opened in the name of the supposed petitioner. On the 12th of August a large part thereof was drawn out of the said bank by the supposed petitioner, leaving, however, a sum of £2,000 still undrawn. On the same day C. was first told by H. that he had used the name of C.'s firm as solicitors in formal proceedings now completed, and that there was a cheque at the Paymaster's Office for the costs of C.'s firm. C. thereupon went at once to the Paymaster's Office, obtained the cheque, and paid it into the account of his firm.

Subsequently to the 12th of August, part of the £2,000 remaining in the bank was drawn out by the supposed petitioner, and, although C. was then aware that his firm's name had been used without authority by H., he was ignorant of the fraud which had been committed by H. C.'s partner, G., knew absolutely nothing of the matter.

The Treasury having made good the fund,

Held, (1) that it was the duty of C., as an officer of the court, when, on the 12th of August, he first knew that his firm's name had been used by H. without authority in proceedings in court, to have at once informed the judge of that fact, and, if he had done so, that the £2,000 then in the bank would have been saved; (2) that C., by accepting the cheque for costs and placing it to the account of his firm, had thereby condoned on behalf of his firm the unauthorized use by H. of the firm's name; and (3) that G., C.'s partner, was together with C. jointly and severally liable to make good to the Treasury so much of £2,000 as was drawn out after the 12th of August.

This was a petition in the above action asking that an order under which the funds in court had been paid out to a false petitioner might be discharged, and that the funds might be replaced by the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, who, whilst admitting liability, sought to obtain an order to refund against a firm of solicitors whose name had been used in the proceedings under the following circumstances.

Under the trusts of a post-nuptial settlement made in 1858, the proceeds of sale of certain lands conveyed on trust for sale by an indenture of even date were directed to be held upon trust, after life estates to Mr. and Mrs. John Moses Marsh respectively, for the children of John M. Marsh as he should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment for all the children of the said John M. Marsh attaining the age of twenty-one, or if daughters marrying under that age, equally.

An action was commenced in 1877 for administration of the trusts of the settlement, and the usual judgment obtained.

In 1882 the hereditaments settled were sold, and the proceeds paid into court to the credit of the action, and invested in the purchase of £5,629 0s. 11d. India 3½ per Cent. Stock.

The said John M. Marsh died in March, 1895, having survived his wife and married again; and as he did not exercise his power of appointment the fund in court became distributable equally amongst his children who attained a vested interest.

In July, 1895, a petition was presented to the court in the action, purporting to be presented by Joseph M. Marsh, the eldest son of John M. Marsh, and alleging that the latter had exercised his power of appointment by a deed poll dated the 31st of December, 1894, and appointed the fund in court to Joseph M Marsh absolutely. The petition purported to be served on the trustees of the original settlement and on such of the other parties who, but for the execution of the deed poll, would have been entitled to the fund, and had placed stop orders on the fund. The petitioner's solicitors appeared from the petition to be "John Clear & Co.," and the respondents were purported to be represented by one John Hales. The affidavit filed in support of the petition purported to be made by the petitioner, and the alleged deed poll (which was in fact forged by Hales) was an exhibit thereto. The petition was heard as unopposed on the 29th of July, 1895, and an order made directing the sale of the stock in court, and the payment thereout of £15 agreed costs to the petitioner's solicitor John Clear, and £10 agreed costs to the respondent's solicitor; and, after providing for succession duty, the balance was ordered to be paid to the petitioner.

The stock was sold on the 6th of August, and on the 10th of August, John Arthur Hales (a solicitor), who had been identified some months previously at the Paymaster's Office as John Hales, attended at the Paymaster's Office with a person whom he identified as Joseph M. Marsh, and obtained a cheque for £6,137 8s. 9d. as the sum payable to the latter. Joseph M. Marsh in fact knew nothing of the proceedings. Hales then accompanied the person whom he falsely represented as Joseph M. Marsh, the petitioner, to Child's Bank, where Hales was known as a former customer, and introduced him as Joseph M. Marsh; the cheque was paid in, and an account opened in that name. On the 12th of August, between one and two o'clock, £4,000 was drawn out of the bank, and subsequently other small sums, leaving a balance of £1,966, which, on the discovery of the fraud in October by the parties entitled to the fund, was brought back again into court.

On the hearing of the present petition it appeared from the evidence that Mr. Clear, of the firm of Clear & Green, had known John Arthur Hales as a friend for five years, and that in July, 1895, Hales had called at Clear's office and asked him if he would act in some business as solicitor for some formal parties, which Clear agreed to do on receiving formal instructions; but no mention was then made either of the nature of the business or of the names of the parties; nor did Clear afterwards receive any formal instructions. On the 12th of August—i.e., on the day that the £4,000 was drawn out of Child's Bank, Hales called and informed Clear that the business in which he wanted Clear to act for formal parties was done, and that there was a cheque for him for the costs at the Paymaster's Office. Clear reprimanded Hales for using Clear's name without authority, but was informed it was a simple matter and was completed, and that counsel had appeared. Clear thereupon, on the same day (the 12th of August) went to the Paymaster-General's Office, obtained the cheque for £15 for costs, cashed it, and, having retained £4 5s. 6d., handed the balance to Hales for counsel's fees and out-of-pocket expenses. The £4 5s. 6d. was passed through the firm's account.

Cannot, for Hales.

KEKEWICH, J.—The principles on which the court exercises its jurisdiction in these matters are clear. I need only refer to Re Dangar's Trusts, 37 W. R. 651, 41 Ch. D. 178, and especially the passage in Stirling, J.'s, judgment on page 656, where he says that Mr. Nelson took upon himself a duty as an officer of the court, and he must be held responsible for the due discharge of that duty, which was to bring before the court all matters which were essential for the court to know in order to deal properly with the fund.

This is the principle that is to be applied to Mr. Clear in the present case; so far as he acted as a solicitor he must be held to be responsible, and this though he took no active part. I do not discredit Mr. Clear's evidence, which moreover is supported by the facts. He had no reason to believe that Hales had used or intended to use his name until the 12th of August, when Hales asked him to go to the Paymaster-General's office to receive a cheque for costs. The Paymaster-General's cheque had been handed over to some person purporting to be Joseph M. Marsh on the 10th of August, and was paid in the same day to Child's Bank; and £4,000 was drawn out on the 12th. The facts are sufficiently conclusive that £4,000 had passed beyond control before Clear knew, or had reason to believe, that his name had been used improperly. So far he is acquitted; but on the 12th he knew of the wrong action of Hales in using his name without authority, but he thought that he might condone the irregularity and receive the cheque for £15. Of course he did not know of the forgery, or that he had presented a petition in the name of Joseph M. Marsh without authority, and I do not think what had been done improperly towards himself could be said to have put him on inquiry; but as an officer of the court he had no right to condone an irregularity, or at least not without ascertaining that everything was right. In the words of Stirling, J. (in Re Dangar's Trusts) he ought to have seen that all that the court ought to know was before it. He was content to take the cheque without inquiry, and he is clearly liable for the amount of it.

Whether he is liable for more is a question that has given me anxious thought.

I am bound to insist on the strict performance of duty by an officer of the court. The non-contentious business of the court is probably more important than the contentious, but in order that it may be transacted properly a judge must have confidence in counsel and solicitors. That confidence I must say is very rarely abused.

Now in this case, if by reasonably prompt action on the part of Clear any part of the fund could have been saved, he must be held to be liable. If he had, when he discovered the irregularity, gone at once to Stirling, J., who was then sitting in chambers, I have no doubt that prompt inquiry would have been made, and notice then given to Child's Bank not to part with the money still there, and it would have been saved. It is reasonably clear that he knew of the irregularity before the remainder of the money then still in Child's Bank was gone, and the money in Child's Bank would have been earmarked as the proceeds of crime.

I have considered the point as to the nearness or remoteness of damage, and I have come to the conclusion that Hadley v. Baxendale, 2 W. R. 302, 9 Exch. 341, does not apply to neglect of duty as distinguished from breach of contract.

Clear must make good the £15 and so much of the £2,137 8s. 9d. as, on inquiry, is found to have been lost in consequence of his action, less the salvage costs payable out of the amount recovered from the bank.

The costs of this petition must be borne by Clear so far as they exceed what would be necessary to obtain the fund out of court and as between solicitor and client.

I acquit Mr. Green (Mr. Clear's partner in the firm of Clear & Green) of all moral delinquency, but I will have his case argued on Wednesday next.

March 11.—The case of Mr. Green was then argued.

Witt, Q.C., and De Witt, for Green.—A partner cannot be liable for anything done by a co-partner which is not within the scope of the partnership; it is not within the scope of a solicitor partnership for one partner simply to lend the name of the firm without more.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question is one of great importance to the profession, as well as to the parties immediately concerned. The reason of my judgment against Clear was that from the time he knew that his name had been improperly used, and through his not taking the steps he ought to have taken on such knowledge, he must be taken to have condoned the improper use of his firm's name by Hales, and must be taken as having acted as solicitor in the matter from the date of the presentation of the petition, and therefore through the entire proceedings. The general principles urged by counsel on behalf of Green (Clear's partner) I agree with; but I see no reason why, with proper precautions, a solicitor should not lend his name or that of his firm in a proper proceeding. I do not say what constitutes proper precautions, but at all events the solicitor lending his or the firm's name must preserve a proper control over the use of it, and must take steps against any abuse that might be made of the permission. When Clear said in effect on the 12th of August, "What has been done in the matter has been done by my authority," and took part of the costs—the solicitor's profit of the business—he was, as from the presentation of the petition, responsible for everything that was done, and he was bound to see that everything was done properly. If Clear had authorized the use of his firm's name in the first instance with proper precautions, Green would be clearly liable; and I am unable to see why he should not be liable now. I acquit Green entirely of all personal blame, and the question against him now is merely one of law.

On that question I decide against Green, and the order will be to declare both Clear and Green jointly and severally liable. I regret I cannot make any distinction as to costs.

Lunacy.

Lindley, Kay, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ. March 16, 21.

Re FARNHAM. (a.)

Lunacy—Lunatic bankrupt—Property vested in or under the control of trustee in bankruptcy—Jurisdiction of court sitting in lunacy to order transfer.

Where property of a lunatic so found who has also been adjudicated a bankrupt is vested in or under the control of the trustee in the bankruptcy, the court sitting in lunacy has no jurisdiction, upon an application made in lunacy, to order such trustee to transfer that property to the credit of the lunacy.

This was a summons taken out in lunacy by the committee of a lunatic so found against the trustee in bankruptcy of the lunatic, asking for an account of all moneys of the lunatic in the possession or under the control of the trustee in bankruptcy; and also that the trustee might be ordered to pay into court in the lunacy all such moneys.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Lindley, L.J.

Warmington, Q.C., and Buckmaster, for the applicant, the committee.—These moneys are needed for the support and maintenance of the lunatic, and it follows from the decision of this court in the case of In re Farnham, [1895] 2 Ch. 799, that the moneys ought to be paid into court for the lunatic's benefit.

R. J. Parker, for the trustee in bankruptcy.—This court has no jurisdiction to make the order asked for. In the former case the funds were actually in the control of the court in lunacy, and the trustee wanted to get possession of them; but now the tables are turned, and the trustee cannot be required to hand it over: Brockwell v. Bullock, 37 W. R. 455, 22 Q. B. D. 567; Re Platt, 36 W. R. 273, 36 Ch. D. 410.

Warmington Q.C., in reply, referred to section 117 of the Lunacy Act, 1890; In re Winkle, 42 W. R. 513, [1894] 2 Ch. 519; and In re Plenderleith, 42 W. R. 224, [1893] 3 Ch. 332.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The point raised in this case is one of some importance. The case stands in this way. Mr. Farnham was found a lunatic by inquisition in August, 1893, and on the 17th of March, 1894, a receiving order in bankruptcy was made against him. In November, 1893, the sheriff seized certain goods of the lunatic, which, in February, 1894, were sold by the sheriff. The proceeds of sale were claimed by the trustee in bankruptcy, and are now in the control of the court in which the bankruptcy is pending—namely, the county court of Leicester. The proceeds of sale are not in the court in lunacy, but are standing to the credit of the bankruptcy in the Leicester County Court. In these circumstances the committee of the lunatic comes in lunacy, asking, first, for an account of all moneys in the possession or under the control of the trustee in bankruptcy, and, secondly, that the trustee in bankruptcy may be ordered to pay into court all such moneys. The master, when this summons came before him, pointed out to the parties that he felt great difficulty on the question whether he had any jurisdiction to make such an order as was asked for; and he therefore adjourned it to the judge sitting in chambers, who adjourned it to us.

On the case coming on before us Mr. Parker at once took the point that we have no jurisdiction, and we are of opinion that he is right in that contention. This case is not in the least like the case (Re Farnham) already decided in this lunacy (reported [1895] 2 Ch. 799), where the property which was then claimed by the trustee in bankruptcy was in the custody of this court sitting in lunacy. The trustee in bankruptcy asked us to hand it over to him. We said: "No; it is in our custody for the benefit of the lunatic, and we won't part with it." In the course of the judgment in that case there may be expressions which apply to the present question. But now the tables are turned. We are not asserting a right to retain property in our custody, as on that occasion, when we had the property (plate) ourselves and had clear jurisdiction to deal with it. Our observations were addressed to that state of things. I have looked in vain through the Lunacy Act and the Bankruptcy Acts for any section which gives us any jurisdiction over the Court of Bankruptcy. Mr. Parker has called our attention to the case of Brockwell v. Bullock, where the jurisdiction of the Lunacy Court over other courts is very carefully gone into by Fry, L.J., who in the course of his judgment discussed the cases, and pointed out that the court in lunacy has no jurisdiction to restrain proceedings against a lunatic. That is the short answer to this case. But it does not quite stop there, for though the justices of the Court of Appeal sitting in lunacy have all the powers of judges of the High Court, yet as judges of the High Court we have no power to interfere with the jurisdiction of the county courts It is true that there is a right of appeal from the county court in bankruptcy to the Divisional Court under the Bankruptcy Act of 1883; but, putting together that Act and the Judicature Act and the decision in Re Platt, I am of opinion that we have no power to do this, and the summons must be dismissed.

Then we are asked to sanction an application by the committee to the Court of Bankruptcy to have this money paid to her or to annul the adjudication. We have come to the conclusion that it is not for the benefit of the lunatic that such an application should be made. Our reasons are shortly these. Such an application by the committee to the Court of Bankruptcy for the payment out of this money to her would, in our opinion, be unsuccessful. The only way to succeed would be to apply to annul the adjudication. We are rather disposed to think that such an application would be successful, the bankruptcy having taken place since the inquisition; but it is anything but a clear point. If the committee made the application it might lead to an appeal to the House of Lords; and, seeing that the estate of this lunatic is not large, we are not prepared to say that it is for the benefit of the lunatic to sanction such an application. We are very much influenced indeed by the lapse of time which has expired since the bankruptcy, and under the circumstances we think that the application to annul the bankruptcy might fail upon that ground; at all events it increases the danger of the experiment. Without saying that the bankruptcy could not be successfully impeached, we do not think it would be for the benefit of the lunatic to endeavour to annul the bankruptcy. Therefore no such leave ought to be given.

KAY, L.J.—This case is so important that I will add a few words. The application is perfectly novel. It is a summons taken out by the committee asking for an account. [His lordship read the summons.] Now, no doubt, the Court in Lunacy, or the judges who are intrusted with the jurisdiction in lunacy, have gone very far indeed in this direction. For a long time past it has been recognized as within their power to apply moneys of the lunatic which are in their control in lunacy for the maintenance of the lunatic, although he may have creditors who are unpaid, and although the application of these moneys in this way may prevent these creditors from ever being paid. The court has gone as far as that. But there is no case so far as I know in which the court has gone any further than that. The court has never taken any property out of the hands of creditors in order to apply it for the benefit of the lunatic. To do so would be monstrous. Suppose that instead of being paid into the Bankruptcy Court this money had been paid to a creditor, would this court order the creditor to return it on the ground that it was wanted for the benefit of the lunatic. The court would not dream of doing any such thing. It would have no jurisdiction to do so. The jurisdiction of the court is strictly limited to property in its custody or under its control. Here the moneys in question are not in the actual custody of the trustee in bankruptcy. They are under the control of the Board of Trade, which is pretty much the same as if they had been paid into the Court of Bankruptcy, whose duty, so long as the bankruptcy subsists, is to divide it amongst the creditors. Now, what power has the court sitting in lunacy to order the trustee in bankruptcy, still less the Court of Bankruptcy, to hand these moneys over to the committee in order that they may be applied for the benefit of the lunatic. That is very nearly as strong a step as ordering a creditor who had received his debt to refund it. If not actually in the possession of the creditors, this money is in the possession of the trustee in bankruptcy for the benefit of the creditors, or of the Court of Bankruptcy for the benefit of the creditors. Unless there is an express statutory power giving the Court in Lunacy power to order a third person, who is no party to the lunacy proceedings, to hand this money back again, in my opinion it would be doing something which the Court in Lunacy has never attempted to do up to this time, and which it has no jurisdiction to do. We asked, Is there any provision in the Bankruptcy Act which confers that power? None could be found. I know of none. I should think it extremely unlikely that the Legislature would put it in the power of judges in lunacy to order third parties, who are not parties to the lunacy proceedings, without any proceeding against them to hand over money to the Court in Lunacy, money which they have received. At any rate there is no such power; I cannot conceive it possible that there should be. All that could have been done would be to direct the committee to take proceedings in bankruptcy in order that we may get the money from the trustee in bankruptcy. That would be a monstrously strong thing to do. I cannot think that the judges in lunacy would ever do such a thing as that.

It is said that the bankruptcy might be annulled. On that I give no opinion whatever. Assume that it might be; the question is, Is it for the benefit of the lunatic that we should direct the committee to embark in a litigation which must be carried on in the Bankruptcy Court to have the bankruptcy annulled on the ground that at the dates when the act of bankruptcy was committed, and when the receiving order was made, the bankrupt was a lunatic? That would be an experimental action, and I do not know what the result would be; but we do know that the property of this lunatic is very small, and in such litigation a large proportion of that small property would be swept away; and, seeing that the only object of that application would be to take away from the creditors of the bankrupt that which in any view—legal or moral—they are entitled to, it is impossible to say that it is the duty of the judges in lunacy to direct the committee to commence proceedings the result of which would be doubtful, and which would certainly injure the creditors of the lunatic, and might not benefit the lunatic at all. It would be perfectly ludicrous if we directed the committtee to take any proceedings other than proceedings to impeach the bankruptcy. If the committee were to commence proceedings and say, "I do not impeach the bankruptcy, but I ask the Bankruptcy Court to give me the money," it would be ludicrous. I can only conceive one possible answer to it—namely, that the Court of Bankruptcy will not part with property available for the payment of the creditors. I think that this application is quite misconceived. We cannot order the trustee in bankruptcy to pay this money over, nor can we, in the interest of the lunatic, direct the committee either to take proceedings to have the bankruptcy annulled or, treating the bankruptcy as valid, to take proceedings to try to induce the Court of Bankruptcy to allow this money to be paid to the committee.

The application fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

MILLER v. COLLINS. (a.)

Married woman—Reversionary life interest in proceeds of sale of real estate—"Interest in land"—Trust funds invested on mortgage of realty—Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), ss. 1, 77.

A married woman's beneficial interest in a sum of money properly invested by her trustees on a mortgage of land conveyed to them, is an "estate" within the meaning of that word as defined in section 1 of the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act. Consequently the married woman is competent to dispose of her interest in such money by virtue of section 77 of the same Act.

So held by the Court of Appeal (Kay, L.J., dissenting).

Appeal from Stirling, J.

The question raised was whether an assignment by a married woman of her interest in a reversionary fund invested upon a mortgage of real estate under a settlement executed before Malins' Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57) was valid or not.

The reversionary interest in question was that of a Mrs. Clayton, and was created by a settlement made in 1855. By that settlement land was vested in trustees upon trust for Mr. Clayton for life, with remainder to Mrs. Clayton for life, with certain remainders over. The settlement contained a power enabling the trustees to sell and invest the proceeds on mortgage; but there was no direction or power to reinvest in the purchase of land. The trustees sold the land so settled and invested the proceeds, amounting to £1,100, on mortgage. By a deed dated the 21st of July, 1869, Mr. and Mrs. Clayton sold their life interest in this £1,100 to one Hardy, through whom the defendant claimed. This deed comprised some houses in which Mr. and Mrs. Clayton were interested, besides their life interest in the above-mentioned fund. The deed was duly acknowledged by Mrs. Clayton, and was enrolled as required by the Act for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries. In 1869 Mrs. Clayton's interest in the £1,100 was a reversionary interest, and the deed of 1869, so far as her life interest was concerned, could only bind her if such interest could be bound under the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act.

Mrs. Clayton survived her husband, and she was still living when, on the 7th of July, 1894, the defendant entered into the contract, the subject-matter of this action, for the sale of her life interest to the plaintiff.

This action was instituted in 1895; and by it the plaintiff, the purchaser under the contract of the 7th of July, 1894, claimed a declaration that the defendant, the vendor, had no title to Mrs. Clayton's life interest, on the ground that the deed of the 21st of July, 1869, could not pass Mrs. Clayton's then reversionary life interest. The defendant counter-claimed for the balance of the purchase money, and damages for breach of contract.

By section 1 of the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act the word "estate" shall extend to an estate in equity as well as at law, and shall also extend to any interest, charge, lien, or incumbrance in, upon, or affecting lands either at law or in equity, and shall also extend to any interest, charge, lien, or incumbrance, in, upon, or affecting money subject to be invested in the purchase of lands.

By section 77 of the same Act a married woman, by deed duly acknowleged and with her husband's concurrence, may dispose of lands of any tenure and money subject to be invested in the purchase of lands, and also dispose of, release, surrender, or extinguish any estate which she alone, or she and her husband in her right, may have in any lands of any tenure, or in any such money as aforesaid, and may release or extinguish any power which may be vested in or limited or reserved to her in regard to any lands of any tenure, or any such money as aforesaid, or in regard to any estate in any lands of any tenure, or in any such money as aforesaid, as fully and effectually as she could do if she were a feme sole.

Stirling, J., held that the wife's interest was not an interest in land within the meaning of the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act, and that she could not dispose of it under section 77 of that Act; he therefore ordered the defendant, the vendor, to return to the plaintiff, the purchaser, his deposit, and to pay damages to the purchaser for the breach of the contract of sale.

The defendant appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Willis-Bund, for the appellant.—This is an interest in land within the meaning of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 3, and the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Watts, Cornford v. Elliott, 33 W. R. 885, 29 Ch. D. 947, is conclusive to show that it is so. See also In re Durrant & Stoner, 30 W. R. 37, 18 Ch. D. 106; Briggs v. Chamberlain, 1 W. R. 346, 11 Hare 69. Stirling, J., relied on In re Newton's Trusts, 23 Ch. D. 181, 32 W. R. Dig. 64; had it not been for that case he would have decided differently. We submit that that decision was wrong. [KAY, L.J.—Does Re Harris, Jacson v. Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, 29 W. R. 119, 15 Ch. D. 561, touch the present case?] No.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Douglas, for the respondent.—This is an interest in a mortgage debt and not in land, and is therefore not within the statute. If a married woman has an interest in land, she can dispose of that, but she cannot dispose of her limited interest in a mortgage debt by fine unless she is also the owner of it; the authorities are all the other way.

They referred to In re Algeo, Ir. Rep. 2 Eq. 485, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 100; Palmer v. Locke, 30 W. R. 419, 18 Ch. D. 381; In re Thackwray and Young, 37 W. R. 74, 40 Ch. D. 34; Re New Land Development Association and Fagence, 40 W. R. 295, 551, [1892] 2 Ch. 138.

Cozens Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—There is no reason why the language in the Fines and Recoveries Act should have any narrower application than it has in 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. The critical period is at the date when the settlement was executed. Had the lady an interest in real property in July, 1869? The doctrine that a doubtful title should not be forced on a purchaser is because he ought not to be exposed to litigation; but here no doubt arises, because the married woman is now dead, and therefore the doctrine does not apply.

He referred to Forbes v. Adams, 9 Sim. 462; Alexander v. Mills, 19 W. R. 310, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 124.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 24.—LINDLEY, L.J., read the following judgment, in which A. L. SMITH, L.J., concurred:—This is an appeal from a decision of Stirling, J., declaring that a vendor of a certain life interest could not make a good title to it, and ordering him to return to the purchaser his deposit, and to pay damages to the purchaser for breach by the vendor of the contract of sale. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] The whole question therefore is whether a married woman's beneficial interest in a sum of money properly invested by her trustees on a mortgage of land conveyed to them is within section 77 of the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act. On reading that section, the above question will be found to turn on whether that interest is "an estate" within the meaning of that word as defined in section 1 of the same Act. Stirling, J., has held that it is not, and he has done so on the authority of a decision by Chitty, J. (Re Newton's Trusts), to which I will refer presently; but I gather from his judgment that had it not been for that decision he would have decided this case the other way. [His lordship read the two sections 1 and 77, and continued:—] Now, I confess I am quite unable to see the impropriety of describing the interest of a person beneficially entitled to money invested on mortgage held by his trustee as an interest in land. The interest of the cestui que trust is not confined to the money, but extends to the security for it—i.e., to the land held by his trustee. Such land is vested in the trustee; but upon trust for whom? The only possible answer is, upon trust for those persons who are beneficially entitled to the money. If there is only one such person, and he is sui juris, the trustee can be required to transfer the security to him—i.e., to assign the debt and convey the land to him. If there are several such persons, and they are all sui juris and absolutely entitled to the money, and they agree, they can also require the mortgage debt to be assigned, and the land to be conveyed to them. These are only illustrations which lead me to say that a cestui que trust of a mortgage debt has an interest in the land. If the debt is so settled that the cestuis que trust have not the right to call for an assignment of the debt to them, they are nevertheless cestuis que trust of the whole security—debt and land—and each of them has an interest, though possibly a limited interest, in the one quite as much as in the other. It is true they can only reach the mortgagor or the land through their trustee, but this does not show that they have no interest in the land, the legal estate in which is in their trustee.

It was contended before us that the words "interest in land" in section 1 of the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act were used by way of contrast to "charge, lien, or encumbrance on or affecting land," and that Mrs. Clayton's interest was only an interest in a charge or encumbrance, and neither an interest in land nor a charge or encumbrance. But this criticism of the language is, in my opinion, unsatisfactory and unsound. The word "encumbrance" is wide enough to include "charge" and "lien," and yet all three words are used. Further, I can find no indication of any intention in this Act to make any distinction between a charge or an encumbrance, and a partial interest in a charge or in an encumbrance. The object of the Act does not require any such distinction to be drawn, nor does the language of the Act. On the contrary, such a distinction would defeat, and not promote, the object to attain which the Act was passed. The truth is that, in defining "estate," no contrast is made, or intended to be made, between one interest in land and another, but the sentence is framed so as to include all interests, legal or equitable, in land, or money charged upon it or to be invested in its purchase or to arise from its sale, and several words are used by way of precaution to emphasize the meaning and to make sure that nothing intended to be included should inadvertently be omitted. This is how the matter appears to me to stand on principle and on the construction of the Act.

I pass now to consider the authorities, and first I will refer shortly to the decisions on the Act itself. In Hobby v. Collins, 4 De. G. & Sm. 289, Knight Bruce, L.J., certainly held that the Act did not enable a married woman to dispose of her reversionary interest in money charged on land, or subject to a trust for investment in land. But this case has not been followed, and it has been disapproved by Lord St. Leonards (see his Real Property Statutes, pp. 232, 233). In the following cases such interests have been held to be within the statute: Briggs v. Chamberlain, where the married woman's interest was a reversionary interest in money to arise from the sale of land. Tuer v. Turner, 3 W. R. 583, 20 Beav. 560, was a similar case. Williams v. Cooke, 11 W. R. 504, 4 Gif. 343, is another decision in accordance with these. In that case a wife's equity to a settlement turned on the effect of her acknowledged deed on her reversionary interest in a sum of money charged on land. Re Durrant & Stoner was another case of a reversionary interest in money. The money there had been improperly invested in land, but a married woman's interest in it was held bound by a deed executed and acknowledged according to the Act. These cases can, no doubt, be distinguished in their details from the present, but not, I think, in principle. They are all alike in being reversionary interests in money, and in my opinion it is immaterial whether the money is charged upon, or is to arise from, or is subject to be invested in, land. In Briggs v. Chamberlain Wood, V.C., emphatically stated: "The question does not turn on the difference between an interest in possession and an interest in reversion. The question is whether it is an interest in land which can pass by a fine or by a deed having a like effect."

In Re Newton's Trusts, Chitty, J., appears to have decided the exact point which arises in the present case, and to have decided that the reversionary interest of a married woman in money invested by her trustees on mortgage was not within the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act. I confess I have great difficulty in understanding that case. It seems to have turned on the fact that the married woman had a reversionary interest in only two-thirds of the mortgage debt, and that the owner of the other third did not join in the assignment. The decision appears to me to be opposed to those which I have mentioned, although, no doubt, it is consistent with Hobby v. Collins. I feel compelled to say that I think Re Newton's Trusts was decided on too narrow a view of the Act.

On the more general question, whether an equitable interest in a mortgage debt is an "interest in land," the decisions on the Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 36) are important, for the language of that Act is almost precisely the same as that of the definition of "estate" in the Act for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries. In Brook v. Badley, 16 W. R. 947, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 672, Lord Cairns pointed out that a person could not be said to have no interest in land simply because he could not himself actually obtain possession of it, nor because it could be conveyed by trustees without his concurrence. Again, in Re Watts, Cotton and Fry, L.JJ., expressed their clear opinion that an equitable interest in a mortgage debt was an "interest in land" in the proper sense of that expression, and within its meaning as used in 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. These decisions confirm the opinion which I entertain myself, and I can discover no reason for holding that the language of the one Act ought to be construed differently from that of the other.

Mrs. Clayton's interest in the £1,100 in question might, in my opinion, be properly regarded either as an interest in land or as an encumbrance upon or affecting it. Her deed affected not only her interest in the land, but also her interest in the money which formed the encumbrance upon it, and which, in truth, was the foundation and the measure of her interest in the land. Her interest in the land and in the money secured on it is well within the words used to define "estate," and I see no justification for construing those words narrowly, even if the result may be to enable married women to do more by an acknowledged deed under the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act than they could have done by a fine before the Act passed, or can be done even now under Vice-Chancellor Malins' Act, which excepts money to which married women are entitled under their marriage settlements.

Something was said about the vendor's title being too doubtful to force on the purchaser. But there is no risk of eviction or disturbance, and, as was pointed out when the case was argued, there is really nothing in this point. The vendor is entitled to the balance of his purchase money, which is practically the real question in dispute. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, the judgment below reversed, and judgment be entered for the defendant both on the claim and on the counterclaim, with costs both here and below.

KAY, L.J., read a written judgment, in which he stated the facts, and continued:—The question is whether the equitable life estate in reversion to which Mrs. Clayton was entitled in the income of the £1,100 was, at the date of the assignment by her in 1869, an "interest in land" within the meaning of those words in the Fines and Recoveries Act, so that, with her husband's concurrence, she could convey it by an acknowledged deed. If it was, this somewhat peculiar result follows: If the sum had been variously invested, part on mortgage and part in Consols, so much income as was derived from the part secured by the mortgage only, would pass; the rest would not pass. The £1,100 lent to the mortgagor was a debt due from him. That he gave a security on land for payment of that debt, in addition to his personal liability, could not make the personal debt of £1,100, land or an interest in land. Formerly a mortgagor had to give a bond for the debt. Now he covenants in the mortgage to pay it. But, in either case, at the time of the passing of the Fines and Recoveries Act all that the mortgagee could do as to the debt was to make an assignment of it which was only a contract in equity, and give a power of attorney to use the transferor's name to recover it. Could a married woman assign the debt under the Fines and Recoveries Act? If she could, the Act enabled her to make a legal assignment of a debt which no one else could do. What she attempted to assign in this case was the income during her life in the reversion of the £1,100, not the mortgage security or any interest in it. When a question arises as to the meaning and effect of words used in an Act of Parliament, the ordinary mode of solving it is to consider the object of the statute, and to see whether the case comes within the real meaning and purpose of it. The object of the Fines and Recoveries Act was, so far as married women were concerned, to facilitate the transfer of real estate by providing a simpler mode of conveying their interests in it, than the somewhat cumbrous device of a fine. Would it facilitate the transfer of real estate to hold that the deed of 1869 passed the married woman's reversionary life estate in the £1,100? Her concurrence was not necessary to enable the trustees to deal with the mortgaged estate. They could convey it, transfer, or release it from the mortgage debt without her, and, supposing such acts to be done in the due performance of the trust, she had no power to interfere. Could the Fines and Recoveries Act have been intended to enable her to dispose of her reversionary life interest in equity in the income derived from a debt which was collaterally secured by a mortgage so situated? I asked during the argument whether there was any authority for saying that such an interest could have been transferred by a fine. None was produced, and my impression is that such an interest could not have been so transferred. This would be another reason for presuming that the case did not come within the Act. Mr. Hastings called attention to the words of section 1 defining "estate." Section 77 enables a married woman to dispose of any estate in land. Section 1 says that "the word 'estate' shall extend to an estate in equity as well as at law, and shall also extend to any interest, charge, lien, or encumbrance in, upon, or affecting lands, either at law or in equity." It was suggested that that must be read "any interest in lands, or any charge, lien, or encumbrance upon or affecting lands," and I think that it is so. It is correct to speak of an interest in land, but hardly to say an "interest upon or affecting land." Those words "upon or affecting" are rather applicable to "charge, lien, or encumbrance." Then it was argued that "interest in land," as there used, must mean something other than "charge, lien, or encumbrance." If it included them, those words would be superfluous. It is not a sweeping clause following those words. I do not rely upon this argument. However the words are read they do not seem to me to express any interest in a debt which is also secured by a charge, lien, or encumbrance on land. The word "mortgage" does not occur in the definition, probably because the Act was only dealing with land, and the word "mortgage," as popularly used, includes both the personal debt and the charge. The words seem to contemplate dealing with the land so as to free it from a charge, lien, or encumbrance, when such an encumbrance is vested in a married woman or her concurrence is necessary to deal with it, but not to an assignment of a reversionary interest in equity in money which happens to be secured by a collateral charge or encumbrance, and least of all to an assignment of an equitable reversionary interest for life in such money.

I will now refer to the cases which seem to approach most nearly to the question we have to consider. In Goodrick v. Shotbolt, Prec. Ch. 333, a married woman was entitled in equity to a bond and warrant of attorney given before her marriage by her intended husband to her father to secure £300 to her on the death of her husband, if she survived him. Judgment was entered by her father on the warrant of attorney, which thus created a charge upon all the real estate of the husband. The wife joined with her husband in conveying his land by deed and fine in order to extinguish her equitable interest in this charge. She survived both her husband and her father, and took out administration to her father, and then, as his administratrix, sought to extend the judgment against her husband's land, and it was held by Lord Keeper Sir Simon Harcourt (afterwards Lord Chancellor Harcourt) that the fine extinguished her equitable right to the charge created by the judgment, and that therefore she could not extend the land under the judgment, but must enter satisfaction upon it. This seems to show the true operation of a fine in such a case. To extinguish the charge upon the land was a very different thing from assigning the reversionary interest in the £300 to a third person. The fine did not affect the right to the bond debt, nor could it transfer the bond debt. But a fine might be used to effect a transfer of money which was solely an interest in land. For instance, in May v. Roper, 4 Sim. 360, it was held that a fine by a married woman did pass her share of the proceeds of sale of real estate, which was devised in trust to sell and to pay part of the proceeds to her; and this was again held in Forbes v. Adams. In these cases the share of the proceeds, until the sale had actually taken place and the real estate was completely converted, was an equitable interest in the land, and nothing else. So in Briggs v. Chamberlain land was held in trust for sale, and a cestui que trust of a share in the proceeds, being a married woman, mortgaged her interest, with the concurrence of her husband, by a deed duly acknowledged. This was solely an interest in land, and therefore bound by the mortgage. In Williams v. Cooke a woman, before her marriage, had a debt due to her secured by a deposit of deeds with her, and, with the concurrence of her husband, she, by acknowledged deed assigned this charge by way of mortgage. This was not a reversionary interest; the husband and wife could assign the debt in equity, and under the Act could also make a valid conveyance of the security. In Re Durrant and Stoner trustees improperly invested the trust moneys in the purchase of land, and the cestuis que trust, who were married women, joined with the trustees in selling and conveying the land by acknowledged deed. In that case the married women had a lien on the land, and the trustees could not have conveyed it without their concurrence; so that it came within the words and within the object and purpose of the Act. In Re Newton's Trusts trustees of personal estate invested part of it on mortgage. A married woman was entitled to one-third of such personal estate in reversion after a life estate. She and her husband by a deed, in 1854, before Vice-Chancellor Malins' Act, purported to concur with the tenant for life and the other cestuis que trust in reversion, in assigning the mortgage debts and all other the personal property by way of mortgage, and the married woman acknowledged this deed under the Fines and Recoveries Act. Chitty, J., said that the question turned upon the construction of the Fines and Recoveries Act, and that the deed was not sufficient to pass the interest of the married women in the mortgage debts. The learned judge afterwards referred to the non-concurrence of one of the cestuis que trust in remainder—I suppose because the other cestuis que trust could not alone require a transfer to themselves of the mortgage. But I understand the main reason of the decision to be, that what the married woman purported to assign was an equitable interest in a debt secured by mortgage, and not merely an "interest in land" within the meaning of those words in the Fines and Recoveries Act.

But great reliance was placed upon Re Watts. That was a case under the Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 36). A testator had bequeathed such part of his personal estate as could by law be so given to charities. Three items were in question—(1) a mortgage to the testator of an equitable life estate in personal property, which was invested on mortgage in the names of trustees; (2) a mortgage of another equitable life interest and half the reversion in personal property, which was invested on mortgage in the names of trustees; (3) a similar mortgage of the other half. Pearson, J., held that the first was pure personalty and passed to the charities, because the testator did not in that case take any real interest in the original mortgage, all he took was the income of the money invested on mortgage. But as to (2) and (3) he decided that these were interests in land, because by foreclosing both, the testator (the mortgagee of these interests) would become entitled to call upon the trustees to transfer the original mortgage to him, and would thus become entitled to the land. There was no appeal as to (1), the mortgage of the life interest; but as to (2) and (3) the case was appealed, and the decision of Pearson, J., was affirmed, on the ground that these mortgages gave to the mortgagee an interest in land; Cotton, L.J., saying that "a mortgage by some of the cestuis que trust of their interests under a settlement, the funds subject to which are invested on mortgage of land, confers an interest in land, and therefore cannot be bequeathed to a charity"; and Fry, L.J., expressed an opinion that the charge need not be direct to create an interest in land under the Act. So far as direct authority can be found, the decision of Chitty, J., in Re Newton's Trusts and that of Pearson, J., in Re Watts are against the view that a married woman could transfer her reversionary interest in personal property, which is invested on mortgage in the names of trustees by acknowledged deed under the Fines and Recoveries Act. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Watts was under a different statute, and was a case in which the testator was or might become absolutely entitled to the debt and to the mortgage security, and it does not seem to me to govern the present case.

My opinion is that the equitable life interest in reversion of the married woman in the £1,100 in the present case, could not be transferred by an acknowledged deed under the Fines and Recoveries Act, and consequently, that the vendor's title was bad, and that the plaintiff should recover his deposit, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Since Vice-Chancellor Malins' Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57), which expressly authorizes assignments by acknowledged deeds of personal property to which married women are entitled in reversion under an instrument made after the 31st of December, 1857, not being a settlement made on marriage, this question will not often arise. But it may be that under a marriage settlement a married woman is entitled to a reversionary interest for life in personal property which happens to be invested on mortgage. She cannot assign this under Vice-Chancellor Malins' Act. Can it be that, though expressly prohibited by that Act, it can be disposed of under the Fines and Recoveries Act?

In re NEWTON (INFANTS) (a.)

Infant—Religious education—Rights of father—Abdication by course of conduct.

Where a father had acquiesced in his two daughters being educated as Protestants until they had attained the ages of fifteen and eleven respectively, the court refused the father's application to have them educated as Roman Catholics, being of opinion that such a resumption of the father's authority would be contrary to the interests of the children.

This was an appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J.

The infants were two girls, aged respectively fifteen and eleven, the only surviving children of John Newton. The father had originally been a Roman Catholic, but had married a Protestant wife, and had allowed all the children of the marriage to be brought up in the Church of England. The mother died in 1888. Up to that time the father had been for a long period a teetotaller, but after his wife's death he fell into habits of intemperance, and was on several occasions convicted upon charges of being drunk or drunk and disorderly. He also neglected his two surviving children, who were found by their half-brother in a state of destitution. The father, however, produced evidence to show that, since the occasion of his last conviction, in August, 1894, he had reformed his habits and become a sincere Roman Catholic.

The infants were wards of court, an aunt of their mother having provided each of them with an annuity of £50, and were being educated at a Protestant school to which they had been sent by an order of the court. The father took out a summons that they might be removed from the school at which they were being educated, to some suitable Roman Catholic school.

Kekewich, J., having interviewed the children, and being of opinion that it was not for the benefit of the elder child to be removed from the school, and that it was inadvisable to separate the two children, refused the application.

The father appealed.

Costelloe, for the appellant.—In this case the court has no jurisdiction to interfere with the father's parental authority. The fact that the father is alive makes the case still stronger. not be removed, and that is the chief consideration. The father has forfeited his rights.

Costelloe replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Nothing will be gained by looking further into the authorities. The case is a curious one, and not free from difficulty. [His lordship stated the facts.] Re Agar-Ellis and Re McGrath show that the court has jurisdiction to disregard the wishes of the father, but a strong case must be shown. In no other case has the father been alive except when he has been so ill-conditioned as to be deprived of all right to the custody of his children. Looking at Re Agar-Ellis and Re McGrath we have to consider the father's rights, and whether any circumstances have arisen curtailing them. I am of opinion that on the whole Kekewich, J., was right. The elder girl is old enough to choose for herself, and it would be a pity to separate the two.

KAY, L.J.—There is no doubt about the law which is applicable to this case, but the peculiarity is that the father is still living. He now, when his children are fifteen and eleven respectively, desires that their religion should be suddenly changed. What is the law applicable to such a case? It is found in Re Agar-Ellis in the judgment of James, L.J., than whom no judge ever placed the rights of a father on a higher level. He said (10 Ch. D., at p. 71): "It is conceded that by the law of this country the father is undoubtedly charged with the education of his children. The right of the father to the custody and control of his children is one of the most sacred of rights. No doubt the law may take away from him this right, or may interfere with his exercise of it, just as it may take away his life or his property or interfere with his liberty, but it must be for some sufficient cause known to the law. He may have forfeited such parental right by moral misconduct or by the profession of immoral or irreligious opinions deemed to unfit him to have the charge of any child at all, or he may have abdicated such right by a course of conduct which would make a resumption of his authority capricious and cruel towards the children." In that case the mother had, without the father's knowledge, caused the children to be brought up in the Roman Catholic religion. It was not a case where the children had imbibed views. This case is different. The children have always been brought up as Protestants without the slightest objection on the father's part. If the father had died after in this way assenting to the education of his children as Protestants, it is impossible to conceive that any court would have interfered. Then does the father being alive make any difference? The father has "abdicated" his right, and it would be "capricious and cruel towards the children" to change their religion.

There is a little difficulty about the younger girl; but they have always been together, and should not now be separated.

The case falls within the exception mentioned by James, L.J., and I think Kekewich, J., took the wise, proper, and legal course.

Appeal dismissed.

TOMLINSON v. BROADSMITH AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Partnership — Managing partner — Authority — Action against firm — Instructions to solicitor — Entering appearance in names of partners—Duty of solicitor—Information to partners of progress of action—Negligence.

The managing partner in a trading firm has authority to defend an action brought against the firm.

A solicitor employed by the managing partner in a firm to defend an action brought against the firm has authority to enter an appearance in the names of each of the partners.

Judgment was recovered in an action against a firm. The solicitor for the firm communicated this fact to the partner who had instructed him to act, but not to the other partners.

Held, that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the solicitor.

Appeal of the defendants from the judgment of Kennedy, J., at the trial of the action with a special jury at Manchester.

The defendants were a firm of solicitors, and the action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages on the ground that the defendants wrongfully and without the plaintiff's authority entered an appearance on his behalf in an action against a firm in which the plaintiff was said to be a partner, by reason of which judgment was obtained against him without his knowledge, and an execution was put into his house. Alternatively the plaintiff alleged that if the defendants had acted with his authority, they had been guilty of negligence in not informing him that judgment had been obtained against him.

In 1893 the plaintiff, in conjunction with Preston, advanced £1,000 to one Horton for the purpose of assisting him in a business then carried on by him. A deed was entered into by the parties by which the plaintiff was to have 10 per cent. interest on his loan, and one-third of the profits of the business; but it was expressly stipulated in the deed that the plaintiff and Preston were not to be partners with Horton. The deed further provided that Horton was to manage the business, and that he was not to hold out the plaintiff and Preston as his partners.

The learned judge at the trial, and the Court of Appeal, held that the effect of the deed was to constitute the parties partners.

In 1894 an action was commenced against the firm for goods supplied. Horton instructed the defendants to act as solicitors on behalf of the firm, and to defend the action. The defendants thereupon entered an appearance in the names of each of the partners as required by ord. 48A, r. 5. Judgment was obtained in the action under order 14, and execution was levied upon the plaintiff's goods. The plaintiff paid out the execution and then brought this action.

In answer to the allegation of negligence, the defendants proved that they had informed Horton that judgment had been recovered against the firm.

The jury, in answer to questions left to them, found that the defendants had no authority from the plaintiff to enter an appearance in his name, and that the defendants had also been guilty of negligence in the performance of their duty as solicitors. The jury assessed the damages at £200, for which sum the learned judge gave judgment.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and W. F. Taylor, Q.C., for the defendants.—There was no evidence to go to the jury on either question. It is within the scope of authority of a managing partner to defend an action brought against the firm; and that being so, he has authority to employ a solicitor to defend the action in the manner provided by ord. 48A, r. 5—i.e., by entering an appearance for each of the partners. Secondly, there was no negligence on the part of the defendants in not informing the plaintiff of the progress of the action; it was sufficient for them to communicate with Horton, from whom they had received their instructions.

Pickford, Q.C., and E. Acton, for the plaintiff.—This was a trading business, and one partner had no implied authority to act for the others in matters of litigation: Hambidge v. De la Croúe, 3 C. B. 742; Adams v. Bankart, 1 C. M. & R. 681. It is true that in Lindley on Partnership, 6th ed., p. 280, it is stated that "one partner may defend an action brought against the firm, indemnifying the firm against the consequences of so doing if he acts against the will of the other partners"; but that shows that there is not an absolute authority, and the cases cited (Goodman v. De Beauvoir, 12 Jur. 989; Harrison v. Jackson, 7 T. R. 207; Morley v. Strombom, 3 B. & P. 254; and Goldsmith v. Levy, 4 Taunt. 299) do not support the proposition laid down. There was negligence on the part of the defendants in not informing the plaintiff that judgment had been signed against the firm, and that he was liable to have his goods taken in execution.

W. F. Taylor, Q.C., in reply, cited Whitehead v. Hughes, 2 Cr. & M. 318.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case an action was brought against a firm of solicitors by the plaintiff, who alleged that the defendants had without authority entered an appearance for him in an action against a firm, and that in consequence of that act of the defendants, an execution was put into his house. The plaintiff further alleged that even if the defendants had authority to act on his behalf they had been guilty of negligence. The case was tried before Kennedy, J., and a jury, and the jury found that the defendants had no authority to enter an appearance for the plaintiff, and that the defendants had acted negligently towards the plaintiff in the conduct of the action. Kennedy, J., on these findings gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants have appealed, and contend that there was no evidence on either head, and that judgment ought to be entered for them.

The facts were these. The plaintiff Tomlinson, and Preston and Horton were partners in a trading business. The plaintiff and Preston, it is true, contended that they were not partners, but the question whether they were or were not depended on the construction of the deed entered into by the three, and that was a question for the judge. The judge held that the true effect of the deed was to make the plaintiff and Preston partners with Horton, and we agree with his ruling on that point. The plaintiff and Preston did not desire that it should be known that they were in the business, and stipulated that their names should not appear; but nevertheless they were in fact partners with Horton. The three partners agreed that Horton should manage the business. Horton, as manager, was empowered to do everything in the ordinary course of a trading business. The partnership required goods, and Horton, as manager, had authority to order goods and to bind his partners to pay for them, although as a matter of fact he ordered the goods without disclosing that the plaintiff and Preston were partners with him.

Now, it cannot be doubted that an action by creditors for goods supplied to a firm, is a transaction in the ordinary course of business of the firm. Horton therefore had authority to deal with the action which had been brought, and to defend that action in the ordinary manner. One mode of defending such an action is under ord. 48A, r. 5, by which an appearance is entered in the name of each partner; Horton in his capacity of manager having the right to defend the action, had authority to instruct a solicitor to enter an appearance for the other two partners, and he instructed the defendants to do so and to defend the action. The plaintiff contended that he was not a partner, but if so, the rules provide that he might have appeared under protest. Some criticisms have been made on a note in Lindley, L.J.'s, book on Partnership, where several cases are cited as instances of the matter referred to. Although the authorities cited may not be very pertinent, still Lindley, L.J., lays down the principle that a managing partner has authority to enter appearance for his partners in an action against the firm. The rule which has been referred to of not citing text-books in the lifetime of the author is not a hard and fast rule, and a book by so high an authority as Lindley, L.J., may certainly be referred to as an authority. Moreover, I think that the case of Goodman v. De Beauvoir, 12 Jur. 989, cited in the note, is an authority for the principle enunciated by Lindley, L.J. Therefore when Horton exercised his authority by instructing the defendants to act as solicitors for the firm they were authorized to act as they did in entering an appearance for the plaintiff. It is contended for the plaintiff that he put an end to Horton's authority by forbidding him to enter an appearance in the plaintiff's name. Even if the plaintiff had expressly done so, but had not taken away Horton's authority as managing director, I am strongly of opinion that Horton was still right in acting as he did, but it is not necessary to decide that point, for there is no evidence that the plaintiff did forbid Horton to enter an appearance for him. The plaintiff merely said that he would not appear at all because he was not a partner. That did not take away from Horton his authority to act as managing partner. Therefore on that part of the case the learned judge ought in my opinion to have directed the jury that, so far from there being no evidence that Horton had authority to act as he did, there was conclusive evidence that he had authority.

Then it is said that the defendants acted with negligence in the course of the litigation. It cannot be suggested that there was negligence on their part in the conduct of the case up to the point when judgment was obtained. Judgment was entered against the plaintiff as a matter of course, as, indeed, was inevitable. But it is alleged that the defendants were negligent because they did not inform the plaintiff that judgment had been entered against him. It would, in my opinion, be a very dangerous application of the principle of negligence to say that, however many partners there might be, and although the solicitors were acting under the authority of the managing partner, they were bound to send separate notice of the judgment to each partner. In this case the defendants were instructed by Horton, and when judgment was obtained they did, in fact, inform him, and, in my opinion, they had a right to assume that Horton would do his duty, and would inform the plaintiff of the progress of the action.

I come to the conclusion that there was no evidence on which the jury ought to have been asked to say that the defendants had been guilty of negligence. The plaintiff's case therefore fails on both heads for want of evidence, and the judge ought therefore to have held that there was no case to leave to the jury, and to have entered verdict and judgment for the defendants.

LOPES, L.J.—There are certain facts in this case which are not in conflict. It is admitted that the plaintiff, Preston, and Horton were partners, that Horton was appointed managing partner, and that he was never displaced from that position. Two actions were brought against the firm for goods supplied. It is not disputed that Horton gave directions to the defendants to enter an appearance in the actions, and that the defendants did enter individual appearances in the names of each partner under ord. 48, r. 5. Those being the facts, the plaintiff brings this action.

The first question is as to Horton's authority to act as he did. It is good law to say that the managing partner of a business has an implied authority to direct a solicitor to enter an appearance in an action against the partnership: see Goodman v. De Beauvoir. There being that implied authority the plaintiff must show that the authority was negatived by him. Whether the authority could be negatived except by removing the managing partner it is unnecessary to decide, but it is clear that the plaintiff must show that the authority was expressly negatived. There does not appear to me to be any evidence of that in this case. The most that can be said in favour of that view is that at the interview which has been referred to, the plaintiff said that the matter had nothing to do with him because he was not a partner. The defendants, however, knew that the plaintiff was a partner, and in what the plaintiff said there was nothing approaching a withdrawal of the implied authority of the managing partner. In these circumstances I think the judge ought to have held that Horton had authority to instruct the defendant to enter an appearance on behalf of the plaintiff and to have so told the jury, and to have decided in favour of the defendants.

As to the second point I can see no evidence of negligence. I do not think that the defendants, in acting as they did, were guilty of even an error of judgment. The defendants communicated to Horton the fact that judgment had been entered against the plaintiff, and I do not think that the fact that the defendants did not communicate direct with the plaintiff is evidence of negligence.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree entirely. I have no doubt that the agreement entered into by the plaintiff and Preston with Horton constitutes a partnership between the three, although the whole conduct of the partnership was to be left to Horton. He ordered goods for the purpose of the business, and a writ was issued for the price of the goods against the firm in the firm name. Horton instructed the defendants to defend the action. I have no doubt whatever that Horton, by reason of the relationship existing between himself and the other parties, had authority to do that. I do not think that it makes any difference even if it had been clearly expressed at the interview which took place—which I do not think that it was—that the plaintiff and Preston would not do anything to defend the action. I do not think they had a right to say that the action should go undefended or that it should be defended otherwise than in the way in which actions against partnerships are properly defended. If it had been a case of an action against one of the firm's customers, the managing partner would have had the right to take the proper steps to recover the debt, although one of the partners might have objected to the name of the firm being used. The same thing may be said with regard to a defence. One partner has no right to say that his name shall not be used if the proper course in defending an action is to use the names of the individual partners, and it makes no difference that the plaintiff in this case contended that there was no partnership. That was an assertion which, however sincerely made, he had no right to make.

As to the alleged negligence I concur in the view that there was none. The action therefore fails, and judgment must be entered for the defendants.

Held, that, in the absence of such an application to tax, section 118 of the Act did not apply so as to prevent the solicitor from recovering on the untaxed bill of costs.

Held, also, that section 118 did not in any way affect the costs incurred in the High Court before the action was remitted.

Boydell v. Millar, 39 W. R. 335, approved.

Appeal by the defendant, and cross-appeal by the plaintiff, from the judgment of Day, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was by a solicitor upon his bill of costs, incurred when acting as solicitor for the defendant in an action of Sales v. Mayo, which was originally commenced in the High Court, and remitted for trial to the county court under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The defence was that the bill had not been taxed in accordance with section 118 of the County Courts Act, 1888. No application was made to tax the bill, and this action was commenced more than twelve months after its delivery. Day, J., held that under section 118, in the absence of taxation, the plaintiff could not recover the costs in the county court subsequent to the order of remittal, but that that section did not affect the costs previously incurred in the High Court, and he accordingly gave judgment for these latter costs.

Moresby, for the defendant.—By the order of remittal under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the action became a county court action, as if it had been originally commenced in the county court. Therefore all the costs come within section 118 of the County Courts Act, 1888, as county court costs, and, though the scale for the taxation of the costs before and after the order of remittal is different, that section makes the absence of taxation a bar to the plaintiff's right to recover.

He referred to Harris v. Judge, 41 W. R. 9, [1892] 2 Q. B. 565; Boydell v. Millar, 39 W. R. 335; Duke v. Davis, 41 W. R. 673, [1893] 2 Q. B. 260; Bowles v. Drake, 30 W. R. 333, 8 Q. B. D. 325.

H. Dobb, for the plaintiff.—Section 118 only applies to costs incurred in the county court. It has no application to the costs incurred before the remittal of the action. Remitted actions are not for all purposes the same as actions commenced in the county court: White v. Cohen, 41 W. R. 396, [1893] 1 Q. B. 580. Further, as regards the costs in the county court, section 118 does not make taxation a condition precedent to the right to recover those costs. There must be an application to tax the costs within the twelve months, otherwise the section does not prevent the solicitor from suing on his bill.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—An action was brought in the High Court against the present defendant, and in that action the present plaintiff acted as her solicitor. That action was remitted to the county court and tried there, and the present plaintiff continued to act as solicitor for the defendant. The plaintiff sent in his bill of costs in respect of that action, and after waiting a considerable time he brought this action in the High Court upon his bill of costs. The bill was delivered more than a year before this action was commenced, and the right to have it taxed was therefore lost, in the absence of special circumstances. No special circumstances were alleged to exist in this case. The defendant had in fact never asked to have the bill taxed.

With regard to the costs incurred in the High Court before the action was remitted, the case of Boydell v. Millar was authority for holding that those costs could be recovered in an action in the High Court. I agree with the decision in that case, and therefore the defendant's appeal fails.

As regards the cross-appeal of the plaintiff, in my opinion the true construction of section 118 of the County Courts Act, 1888, is that costs and charges in the county court shall, if the solicitor or client makes an application to that effect, be taxed, and no solicitor shall be entitled in such a case to recover the costs unless they are first taxed. But the section only applies when there is an application to tax, and the provision that a solicitor shall not recover the costs unless they are taxed only comes into operation if an application is made to tax the costs within the proper time. In the present case there was no application made to tax the costs, and the plaintiff has a right to bring his action on his bill in the High Court. The cross-appeal must therefore be allowed.

LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed; cross-appeal allowed.

In re POLLARD'S SETTLEMENT. (a.)

Married woman—Restraint on anticipation—Discretion of court to remove restraint—Debt to moneylender—Costs of defending criminal proceedings—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 39.

The court in exercising its discretion under section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to bind the interest of a married woman in any property notwithstanding that she is restrained from anticipation, has to consider all the circumstances and to balance the undoubted benefit of the restraint against the alleged benefit of its removal.

Married women who have got into debt through extravagance or have gone to moneylenders will not, as a rule, be relieved from the restraint on anticipation.

It is for the benefit of a married woman to defend herself against legal proceedings involving an imputation on her character.

Summons.

This was a summons by a married woman for an order under section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, releasing her interest under a settlement made on her marriage, in 1882, from restraint on anticipation. The whole of the property to the income of which the applicant was entitled, subject to restraint on anticipation, was stated to be worth £30,000, and the net income to amount to about £1,067.

In April, 1892, an order was made under section 39 enabling her to raise £2,000.

In November, 1894, a second order was made enabling her to raise a further £1,000. The result was that her present income was about £830 per annum. There were five children of the marriage.

The applicant having obtained, in January, 1893, a divorce from her husband on the ground of his cruelty and adultery, had remarried in the following May. Her second husband was stated to be an undischarged bankrupt and absent abroad. There were no children of the second marriage.

The present summons, being her third application, was for an order enabling her to raise some £600 in order to pay off a debt of £500 and interest contracted with a moneylender, for which debt her stepfather, a clergyman, had joined as surety. The creditor had signed judgment and put an execution into the surety's rectory.

Chitty, J., having made an order in chambers refusing the summons, the applicant now moved in court to vary the order in chambers by giving her liberty to charge her interest to the extent of £800. The additional £200 was asked to enable the applicant to meet the costs of a pending prosecution of the applicant for the alleged offence of stealing furniture, under which she had been remanded by the magistrate on her own recognizances.

Farwell, Q.C., and Johnston Edwards, for the married woman.

Eyre Thompson, for the trustees of the settlement.

CHITTY, J.—Applications like the present are usually heard in chambers. That is more convenient, as the judge can inquire and ask many questions which had better not be asked before the public.

The courts of equity established the doctrine with reference to restraints on anticipation, considering that it was for the protection of the married woman, and that it was for her benefit that a provision should be secured to her which she was incapable of anticipating during coverture. Such cases, however, as Robinson v. Wheelwright, 4 W. R. 427, 6 De G. M. & G. 535, where it was clearly for the benefit of the married woman that the restraint should be removed, but where the court had held that it could not remove the restraint, had led to the passing of section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. This enactment confers a discretionary jurisdiction on the court, which ought not to be exercised unless for the benefit of the married woman. The court must take into consideration all the circumstances, and it has to balance the undoubted benefit of the restraint against the alleged benefit of its removal, and to see whether the benefit of removal preponderates. It is not necessary to serve the trustees of the settlement, but the usual practice is to serve them. These applications being practically ex parte, the court has to look at the evidence with some jealousy. The trustees frequently do not wish to oppose. There are many cases where it is thought advisable to pay what are called the married woman's debts. These are not infrequently the debts of her husband. Even then it might be for her benefit to relieve her from difficulties in which the whole family is placed. There are other cases where the debts are incurred through no extravagance, but extra expenses have been incurred for doctors, nurses, and the like, or the family has got into a state of indebtedness through no fault of the married woman, or even of her husband. Recently, however, attempts are being made by married women who have got into debt through extravagance to endeavour to obtain in chambers, orders for the removal of the restraint. If judges in chambers yield to applications like the present, the result can easily be forecast by solicitors. The married woman has only to involve herself in difficulties and make piteous affidavits. Directly such a system should get into vogue the married woman would be able to force the hands of the court, and, in effect, destroy the restraint on anticipation.

The applicant now comes with her third application—namely for £600 and another £200. I have to consider what is for the benefit of the married woman within section 39 of the Act. That it is honest for debts to be paid is not a leading consideration in applications like the present. I desire to state that as a rule I cannot relieve married women from the restraint on anticipation in those cases where they have gone to moneylenders. I will not allow the hand of the court to be forced in this way. If I grant the present application I shall be establishing something like a precedent. The application in chambers has been refused, and the result which I have arrived at in court is the same as that come to in chambers. No case here has been established which would justify me in exercising my discretion by acceding to the application. I regret the circumstances which have occurred, but they are not to be judicially taken into consideration. The lady herself can set aside a sum out of her income if she thinks fit to do so. This is the third time she has come to the court, and I cannot remove from my mind the circumstance that she had recourse to a professional moneylender.

There is another point in this case. A prosecution has been instituted against the lady for stealing furniture, and it is further asked that the restraint should be removed so as to enable her to defend herself. Curiously enough I had a similar case in principle before me in chambers, where divorce proceedings had been instituted against the married woman, who was desirous of defending herself against the imputation on her character. It is undoubtedly for the benefit of the married woman to defend herself under such circumstances. I will let this part of the application stand over, giving leave to amend the summons, and I will listen to an application in chambers in the event of her being committed for trial, and if it comes before me in chambers I will consider the matter, but I must not be understood as saying that I will accede to the application.

Application dismissed.

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Long lease not at rack rent—Money premium as well—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881—General Order—Schedule I., Part I., rr. 7, 8—Schedule I., Part II., r. 5.

Where a long lease, not at a rack rent, is granted in consideration of a money payment or premium, the lessor's solicitor is entitled to be paid both the scale fee payable under Schedule I., Part II. (2*nd scale*), in respect of the rent, and the scale fee payable under Schedule I., Part I., on sales, purchases, and mortgages, in respect of the money payment or premium.

Summons to review taxation.

A lease for ninety-nine years was granted at a rent of 12s. 1d. and a premium or fine of £12 1s. 8d.

The solicitors' costs were taxed by the taxing master, who allowed £5 under Schedule I., Part II. (2nd scale), in respect of the rent, and £3 under Schedule I., Part I., r. 8.

F. Thompson, for the client.—The taxing master is wrong in allowing two minimum fees in respect of the same transaction and the same title. In re Onward Building Society, 41 W. R. 107, [1893] 1 Q. B. 16; In re Russell, 33 W. R. 815, 30 Ch. D. 114; In re Field, 33 W. R. 553, 29 Ch. D. 608. The proper course is to take the scale fee on the rent, and add in respect of the fine the amount payable on a sale, purchase, or mortgage; but the solicitor is not entitled to a minimum fee of £3 in addition to the scale fee on the lease, but to 15s. only.

Upjohn, for the solicitor, was not called upon.

NORTH, J.—The taxing master is right. This is a case in which there is a conveyance of a lease for ninety-nine years at an annual rent of 12s. 1d. and a fine of £12 1s. 8d., and the solicitor is to be paid according to the scale.

The conveyance comes under Schedule I., Part II. (2nd scale), "or other long leases not at a rack rent," and accordingly, as the rent is less than £5, the solicitor's remuneration is £5. But there are further rules. By rule 5 "where a conveyance or lease is partly in consideration of a money payment or premium and partly of a rent, then in addition to the remuneration hereby prescribed in respect of the rent there shall be paid a further sum equal to the remuneration on a purchase at a price equal to such money payment or premium." That carries us back to Part I. of the schedule, the scale on sales, purchases, and mortgages. The scale on the first £1,000 is 30s. per £100, which would make the fee here 30s. But by rule 7 "fractions of £100 under £50 are to be reckoned as £50," so this premium would be reckoned as £50, and the remuneration would be 15s. But by rule 8 "where the prescribed remuneration would but for this provision amount to less than £5, the prescribed remuneration shall be £5, except on transactions under £100, in which cases the remuneration of the solicitor for the vendor, purchaser, mortgagor, or mortgagee is to be £3." That amount then is payable upon the fine. So we have the remuneration payable in respect of the rent £5, and in respect of the fine of £12 1s. 8d. £3, which added together make £8 in all. Mr. Thompson says that only 15s. should be added to the amount payable under the second schedule, and that the title is the same. But rule 8 has to be applied as in the case of sales, purchases, and mortgages, and I think that the taxing master is right in allowing £8.

Building society—Instrument of dissolution—Signatures—Infants—Joint holders—Agents—Curing invalidity by adding names to duplicate instrument—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), ss. 32 (3), 38, 39.

In counting the three-fourths of the members required by section 32, sub-section 3, of the Building Societies Act, 1874, to consent to the dissolution of a building society (1) infants may be counted unless prohibited by the rules from assenting to the dissolution; (2) joint holders of shares must all sign, but only count as one; (3) semble, a member signing by his duly authorized agent may be counted.

An instrument of dissolution which is invalid through not containing the requisite number of signatures, and which has been registered, is not cured by adding names to the duplicate of the instrument returned to the society by the Registrar of Building Societies.

Action.

This was an action by an advanced member of the Second Watford Starr-Bowkett Building Society seeking to restrain the society, and the defendants Jeffs and two others, who were trustees of a deed purporting to dissolve the society, from acting on the same, on the ground that the deed had not been signed by the requisite majority of members as required by the Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), s. 32, sub-section 3, because (1) some of the signatures were those of infants; (2) others were only those of one of two joint holders, whereas both ought to have signed; (3) signature by a member did not imply consent in respect of all his shares; (4) the names of some members were affixed by their agents. The defendants contended that, assuming the deed to be invalid, it had been cured by signatures which had been added to the duplicate deed returned to the society by the Registrar of Building Societies, although that deed was not registered. The facts appear more fully from the judgment.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and MacSwinney, for the plaintiff.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Dunham, for the defendants.

NORTH, J.—This is a building society incorporated under the Act of 1874 and the subsequent Acts, and which was formed in September, 1888. The plaintiff is a mortgagor to the society and an "advanced" member, the mortgage being dated the 3rd of March, 1893. On the 21st of March, 1894, the society by a meeting duly convened passed a resolution of winding up. Then on the 20th of April, 1894, the instrument of dissolution was prepared and signed by a considerable number of members of the society, and on the 4th of July, 1894, that instrument was registered. On the 13th of February, 1895, this action was commenced by Mrs. Dennison suing in respect of her separate estate on behalf of herself and other members of the society except the defendants, and she seeks to have it declared that the instrument of dissolution to which I have referred was an invalid instrument. In that instrument the number of members is said to be 151 and the number of shares 447, and the only objection to the instrument of dissolution is that it is alleged to have not been signed by the proper majority of the members of the society. It purports to be signed by 115 members out of 151.

The 32nd section of the Act of 1874 provides for the mode of dissolution and winding up of building societies. It is not being wound up under the supervision of the court, and therefore we are thrown on to sub-section 3 of that section, which provides for a society being wound up by dissolution with the consent of three-fourths of the members holding not less than two-thirds of the number of shares in the society testified by their signatures to the instrument of dissolution. Now it is not disputed that the number of signatures obtained represented in fact two-thirds of the number of shares; therefore we may leave that out of consideration. The only question is whether the consent of the proper number of members—namely, three-fourths—has been obtained. The section provides that alterations may be made in an instrument of dissolution with the like consent of the same number of persons testified in the same manner, and the alterations made are to be binding on the members. Now, in the present case there have been, I think, five objections suggested upon which it is said the instrument was not signed by the proper proportion of members.

The first objection is this, that some of the members who signed consent, did so only in respect of some of the shares which they held, and that being so, it is said they did not sign a consent in respect to the other shares, and that therefore the number is to be reduced accordingly. The number of 115 has been calculated upon the footing that every member who has signed his consent did so with respect to all his shares, and in my opinion that is the true effect of the signatures. I do not know how a member can give a half consent and not an entire consent. We are not embarrassed with the case of a person who has signed with respect to a number of his shares and has refused his consent to the rest. We have the simple fact testified to by those signatures of the consent to the dissolution. In my opinion the members who consent by signing generally are not consenting in respect of any particular shares, and therefore that point is one which I decide in favour of the defendants.

The second point raised is as to Mrs. Franklin. She did not sign the deed herself, but her name appears in the proper place. There is no question about her consenting, but her signature was placed there by her husband. It is her own name he has signed, it was signed by him in her presence at her request and by her authority, and the question is whether that is sufficient or not. The plaintiffs relied upon a case (The Second Edinburgh and Leith 493rd Starr-Bowkett Building Society v. Aitken, 19 Court of Sess. Cas., 4th series, p. 603) which was decided in the Court of Session, Edinburgh; that case, of course, is no authority here in any way, but it is no doubt a decision upon the construction of the same Act of Parliament that I have to deal with and deciding the point I have to deal with, and as it decided that an agent could not sign, if there was nothing before me except that case I should simply follow that decision. But there are other cases in the Court of Appeal in England, among others Re Whitley, 34 W. R. 505, 32 Ch. D. 337, which indicate that an agent can sign a memorandum of association. If I had to decide the point here, I should follow the English cases.

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The point really is not material, for the reason that there are 115 signatures, and, assuming all the rest are good for this purpose, even if you take away this one from the 115, there are sufficient signatures, 114, for the dissolution. The case is altogether immaterial.

The next point is this: There are several cases of signatures in which the consent was signed by persons who were infants. As to that it is necessary to consider what the positions of these persons signing are, to see if they are competent to sign. The 38th section of the Act says that any person under the age of twenty-one may be admitted a member unless the rules of the society specially prohibit it. He shall not vote, however, or hold any office in the society. One would have expected in a clause like that to have some explanation given as to what the position of an infant might be, but nothing further is contained in that section. Then we turn to the rules. Now this is clearly a case in which the rules of the society do not prohibit such an admission, therefore minors may be members. The third rule says expressly that "a minor may take shares and may transfer the same, but cannot hold office, vote, nor act as substitute for any officer." Infants, however, can (it has been decided) do a great many things, among other things they can sign a memorandum and articles of association. Then, again, an infant if he is a member of a company may be a contributory, and every contributory may present a winding-up petition. Of course an infant can only do that by his next friend responsible for costs, but still it is the infant's petition, and the company may be dissolved. It is true, under the latter part of sub-section 4 of the 32nd section, the winding up by the court can only be on the petition of a member authorized by the consent of three-fourths of the members; but if he had that, an infant might present a petition. I mention that for the reason that it was suggested that it was a strong thing to say that an infant can take the step of consenting to a dissolution of the society, but it is clear under that clause that he can do that very thing in another way, with the proper authority. Nor can it be said that the prohibition as to an infant's voting prevents him from consenting to a dissolution. I confess I do not think that is the meaning of the word voting, and I do not think voting includes giving such a consent as this. There is no voting in the ordinary sense, and if it had been intended that an infant was to be disqualified from consenting to a dissolution, I think there would have been some provision providing for it. The fact that certain infants signed does not make the instrument invalid, because I see nothing to prevent an infant from giving such a consent.

Then the fourth point is this: There are five cases where shares are held in the names of two persons jointly, one only of whom has signed. Now this raises a different question altogether. Section 39 provides for the case of joint holders of a share; but that appears to be an interpolation that does not quite fit in with the Act. Perhaps it was intended to leave to the rules of the society to point out what was the position of joint holders of shares. If that was the intention, it has not been carried out by the rules in this case, for I find nothing in the rules dealing with the position of such members. Looking at the third rule, however, I find that a member has to pay an entrance fee of one shilling per share. If there are half a dozen members holding one share, however, it would be strange to say that six separate entrance fees are to be paid by six persons who among them only hold one share. That seems to be the view the society have taken, and the rules do not say that the number of members is to be limited by the number of shares. No member, however, is to have more than one vote whatever number of shares he has. Yet if six persons, holding between them one share, were all treated as members they would have six votes. That seems an extremely unlikely provision to have made. The confusion that would arise would present insuperable obstacles in the working of the society. I do not think it necessary to go through the rules of the society in detail, but it seems to me it would be impossible to work them unless the joint holders of shares were considered as one person. I think that view is the correct one, and therefore you cannot have a consent given in respect of a share unless it is given by all the joint holders of that share. I do not see how a person who holds one-sixth of a share can give a consent which in any way affects the other joint holders. It was suggested that one might sign as agent for the rest, and I am not prepared to say that he might not so sign in a proper way as agent for the others, but there must be evidence to show that he has authority, and there is not the slightest evidence here that the persons who did sign here had the authority of the other joint holders. That reduces the number of signatures on the deed to 110 instead of 115, and the original deed of dissolution is therefore invalid.

Then the defendants raise another point. It was said, assuming the deed to be invalid, it has been cured by what has taken place since that time. I am sorry to say I do not see my way to uphold the deed of dissolution by reason of the signatures that have been subsequently put to the duplicate. It appears that seventeen new signatures have been added, which would raise the 115 to 132, and it was admitted that although certain persons who originally signed had since ceased to be members, yet if these seventeen were added the change produced would make the new deed a good one in point of numbers. The question is whether these new signatures can be allowed. I do not think that there is any other instrument of dissolution than that which has been registered. If that was to be altered in any way, it might be altered under section 32 by the same proceeding which the Act requires for the original deed, but it does not appear that anything of that sort has actually taken place. Then as regards the instrument itself. The Act says the instrument shall be registered, and shall be binding upon the members of the society. It was said that the provision for registration did not make registration a condition precedent. It can only be binding upon the members if it is an instrument complete and capable of being registered. How does it stand at present? Originally the instrument was perfectly regular in that respect—it was prepared in duplicate and was registered in the manner provided by the Treasury regulations. One of these duplicates was sent back to the trustees, and has had the additional signatures placed on it. That is a document which cannot be registered at present, because the parties are not in a position to do so. It is not executed in duplicate. As regards the fresh signatures, they appear on that copy only, and there is no second deed upon which they appear. It seems to me it is not an instrument of dissolution which the society is capable of registering at the present time and in the present form. In my opinion they cannot register it at all now. The trustees, who seem to me to have acted very fairly and properly in the matter, subject only to the mistake of having acted on a deed which has not been properly executed, would find themselves in a very difficult position if I were to hold that the deed was good, because they would have laid themselves open to serious penalties under the Act of 1894 for not registering within the proper time. In my opinion, however, they are free from any such penalties, because the instrument is one that is not capable of being registered by them as it now stands. I do not say there is anything to prevent the society from appyling to its present members and proceeding to pass and approve a new deed of dissolution, if they can get the proper persons to consent to it. As far as this instrument goes in my opinion it is not valid.

Then the question is as to the relief to be given. The plaintiff asks for an account of all the dealings of the three trustees with the assets of the society since the date of the dissolution. In my opinion that is not a relief which the present plaintiff is entitled to. At present there is no dissolution, and it is for the society to take proper steps to settle accounts with these persons who turn out not effectually to be appointed trustees. The society are the persons to whom they must account, and it is for them to consider what steps ought to be taken. If the plaintiff, as one of the members of the society, wishes the society to move, she may take such steps as the rules allow; but I cannot at her instance direct such an account as this. The next claim is for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling or offering for sale the property comprised in the plaintiff's mortgages. I think it follows from the deed not being valid that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction restraining these trustees from offering her property for sale, but it must be qualified in this way. It must be to restrain them as trustees under the instrument of the 20th of April, 1894, from proceeding to do so. I cannot do anything that would have the effect of preventing their selling the property if they should be appointed trustees under a valid instrument of dissolution that may hereafter be executed. Therefore, holding that the deed must be set aside, I hold that the defendants cannot proceed to sell the plaintiff's property by any authority derived from that deed.

The plaintiff then claims an injunction to restrain the defendants from intermeddling with the society's assets, and I propose to grant that.

SMITH v. HAMMOND. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Defendant's address—Mistake in writ—Ord. 2, r. 3.

The defendant resided and carried on business in Ireland. He was served in England with a writ of summons in which he was described as "of L., in the county of Lancaster."

Held, that the mistake as to the defendant's address did not invalidate the writ.

Application to set aside the service of a writ.

The defendant was incorrectly described in the writ as "of Lytham, in the county of Lancaster," whereas, in fact, he resided and carried on business at Londonderry, in Ireland.

The writ was served upon the defendant in this country, and he entered an appearance under protest.

Loehnis, for the defendant, in support of the application.—Ord. 2, r, 3, requires that "the writ of summons for the commencement of any action" shall be in one of the forms in Appendix A, Part I. The form given is as follows: "To C. D., of in the county of ." If the defendant's address is wrongly given, the writ does not comply with the rules, and is invalid. In The W. A. Sholton, 36 W. R. 559, 13 P. D. 8, Butt, J., held that the omission of the address of the defendant invalidated a writ. In Sedgwick v. Yedras Mininy Co., 35 W. R. 780, the defendant company, which had no place of business in this country, was described as of an address in the city of London, and the court, on that ground, set aside the writ.

He also referred to The Helenslea, 30 W. R. 616, 7 P. D. 57, and Zuccato v. Young, 38 W. R. 474.

Carver, for the plaintiff.—Ord. 4, r. 1, expressly provides that the address of the plaintiff shall be given in the writ, but there is no such rule in the case of a defendant; and Fry v. Moore, 37 W. R. 565, 23 Q. B. D. 395, The Helenslea, and Zuccato v. Young are decisive that an incorrect address given for the defendant is immaterial. In Fry v. Moore the writ was issued in the ordinary form applicable to a defendant within the jurisdiction, the defendant being out of the jurisdiction; and Lindley, L.J., said: "In the form in which it was issued it cannot be said that the writ was irregular, because the plaintiff might have kept it with the view of serving it on the defendant if he should come within the jurisdiction. The writ therefore cannot be set aside for irregularity." Fry v. Moore was followed in Wilding v. Bean, 39 W. R. 40, [1891] 1 Q. B. 100.

Loehnis, in reply.—In Wilding v. Bean the only question was as to substituted service. In Fry v. Moore the irregularity was waived by asking for a statement of claim.

POLLOCK, B.—I think that Mr. Carver's contention is the right one in this case. I have no doubt that this is a good writ. There is nothing in the rules to show that the words in the form in the appendix to the rules, "To C. D., of in the county of ," are anything more than a description of the defendant, and therefore, if the address is wrongly given, it is, in the words of North, J., in Zuccato v. Young, the same as if a defendant named John had been sued as James. The mistake is not one which substantially affects the defendant, and, in my opinion, this application fails.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is no express provision in the rules requiring a defendant's address to be stated in the writ, whereas in the case of a plaintiff the rules explicitly direct that the address shall be given. I think the distinction was made purposely; and in my opinion we ought not, unless bound to do so, add to the very elaborate formalities required by the rules with regard to the issuing of writs. It is true that, according to the forms, the address of the defendant is to be given; but it is really only part of the identification of the defendant, and a mistake as to that does not, in my opinion, invalidate the writ.

Application dismissed.

REYNOLDS v. PRESTEIGN URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Highway—Encroachment on—Obstruction—Right to abate nuisance—No previous conviction—Urban district council—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 149—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 26 (1).

An urban district council may remove any obstruction to or encroachment on any highway vested in them by section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, without previously taking any proceedings, either by indictment or summarily, against the person who is alleged to have caused the obstruction or encroachment, but they do so at their own risk, and the onus is on them of showing that an obstruction or encroachment did in fact exist.

Appeal by the defendants from the decision of his Honour Judge Lewis, sitting in the county court of Radnorshire, holden at Presteign.

The plaintiff was the owner in fee simple of a cottage and garden called Paradise Cottage, Green End, in the parish of Presteign, within the district of the defendants, the Presteign Urban District Council. The action was for damages for trespass alleged to have been committed by the defendants in grubbing up a hedge bounding the side of the cottage, and by cutting the hedges round the garden, and by removing a post and wire railings round the garden, and posts erected for the support of walls round the garden, and also by grubbing up a flower border growing under the projecting roof of the cottage, all of which said hedges, posts, railings, and flowers were the property of the plaintiff. The property consisted of a cottage and garden bounded on three sides admittedly by three highway roads. In front of the cottage was a small garden, and beyond that a triangular piece of open land bounded on two sides by two of the said highways, and ending at a point.

The defendants contended that across this piece of land was a highway road, upon part of which the plaintiff had placed a hedge. On the 5th of January, 1896, they gave the plaintiff notice of encroachments upon, and obstructions to, the highway under section 65 of the Highway Act, 1835, and on the 4th of March they gave him notice to remove projections under section 160 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and section 69 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847. On the 9th of April, the plaintiff not having complied with the last notice, the defendants did the acts complained of. The plaintiff brought an action to recover damages for the alleged trespass. The jury found, as facts, that the hedges did encroach upon the highway when the defendants cut them, that the rails removed were encroachments, that there was a highway by the original fence across the triangular piece of land, and that the fences removed from the triangular piece were upon the highway. The learned county court judge, however, held that the defendants had no authority at common law to do what they had done, and that not having complied with ord. 10, r. 18 (a), of the County Court Rules, they were not in a position to rely upon any supposed statutory right under the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, and that even if they had such statutory right they were not protected by the statute, inasmuch as they had acted without having first obtained the conviction of the plaintiff, either by summary proceedings or by indictment, and he therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff.

From this judgment the District Council now appealed.

W. D. Benson, for the appellants.—The jury found that there were encroachments on the highway, but the judge held that the appellants had no power to abate except by summary proceedings or indictment. All the three highways were repairable by the defendants, the roads being vested in the District Council, and therefore the defendants were entitled to abate the nuisance without taking summary proceedings before justices: Keane v. Reynolds, 2 E. & B. 748, 2 W. R. Dig. 203; see remarks of Campbell, C.J., where he says that a surveyor of highways is not bound to wait for a conviction before he pulls down encroachments, but that if he acts without a conviction he acts at his peril: Turner v. Ringwood Highway Board, 18 W. R. 424, L. R. 9 Eq. 418; Bagshawe v. Buxton Local Board of Health, 24 W. R. 231, 1 Ch. D. 220. There is a common law right, independent of any right by statute, to protect the public way and remove encroachments. By section 26 of the Local Government Act, 1894, it is the duty of the District Council to remove all obstructions from the highways vested in them. The Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 69, does perhaps seem to imply that a conviction is necessary first; but section 69 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34, which is incorporated by section 160 of the Public Health Act, 1875, must mean that in default of the occupier removing the encroachment the commissioners may do so, and may recover the costs of doing so, as damages.

[The court stopped counsel.]

Corner (A. Bertram with him), for the respondent.—The District Council is a body created by statute, and it has no power except what is given it by statute. The statute does not give it the right of deciding what is or what is not an obstruction on a highway. Where there is an obstruction on the highway to a private individual he may, if special damage is done to him, remove it. The District Council has only the same right in regard to the public as the private individual has in regard to himself: Dimes v. Petley, 15 Q. B. 276; see judgment of Campbell, C.J., at p. 283; Bateman v. Bluck, 21 L. J. Q. B. 406. The District Council had no right to remove the alleged obstruction without giving the occupier the opportunity of proving that it was not an obstruction: Hopkins v. Smethwick Local Board, 38 W. R. 499, 24 Q. B. D. 713; Cooper v. Wandsworth District Board, 11 W. R. 646, 32 L. J. C. P. 185. Section 69 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act, 1847, does not apply.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—This appeal must be allowed. I wish to make clear the data on which our judgment rests. The plaintiff complained of certain acts of trespass on the part of the defendants. They answered: "We did not commit any trespass, all we did was to remove certain encroachments on our property which you placed thereon." The questions left to the jury exclude the supposition that the defendants did any unnecessary or excessive acts in removing the alleged encroachments, and the jury, in answer, found that the hedges were encroaching upon the highway when the board cut them, that the posts and wires taken away were encroachments, and that the fences removed from the triangular piece of land were upon the highway.

The first fact of importance to note is that each one of these highways was a public highway repairable by the inhabitants at large within the urban district. It would appear that up to the year 1875 there was no Act vesting the highways in any local board, but no doubt they were under the control of a highway board or some other authority. The soil was vested in the adjoining owners. However, by section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, it was provided that all streets being, or which at any time become, highways repairable by the inhabitants at large within any urban district shall vest in, and be under the control of, the urban authority. Under the Local Government Act, 1894, the defendants as district council succeeded the urban authority. By section 26 (1) it is provided that it shall be the duty of every district council to protect all public rights of way, and to prevent as far as possible the stopping or obstruction of any such right of way, where the stoppage or obstruction thereof would in their opinion be prejudicial to the interests of their district, and to prevent any unlawful encroachment on any roadside waste within their district.

I do not at all mean to say that there is not something in the contention of the learned counsel for plaintiff as to the nature of the right of the District Council to abate. The authorities ought not to act act in a high-handed manner, especially in cases where there is an element of doubt. In such cases they should be circumspect, and obtain a judicial decision in their favour before taking the law into their own hands. If they do not do so, they run the same risk that a private person runs who removes such an obstruction; and the burden would be upon them to show that there was an obstruction. If they, however, are able to show that an obstruction did exist on property vested in them under the Public Health Act of 1875 they would have the same right to abate as is possessed by a private owner under similar circumstances.

A private owner has the right, if any special damage is done to him, to remove the obstruction, and in the case of trees it is not necessary, as was decided in the case of Lemon v. Webb, [1895] A. C. 1, 43 W. R. Dig. 125, to give the owner notice before cutting away any branches overhanging his property. These highways were vested in the defendants, and the right to remove obstructions follows in consequence. I therefore come to the conclusion that the defendants did no more in this case than they were justified in doing.

It seems to me that the sections which apply to this case are section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and section 26 of the Local Government Act, 1894.

I do not base my judgment in any way upon section 69 of the Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), and therefore it is not necessary for me to touch upon that section.

WRIGHT, J.—I entirely agree, and for the same reasons. I will only add that, while I agree that as a general rule it is not desirable that a district council should take the law into their own hands, I think it is doubtful whether under the special circumstances of this case any other remedy was open to the defendants, for I am not at all sure that all these obstructions could have been the subject of an indictment or summary proceedings, and therefore I think the defendants were entitled to take the law into their own hands.

KIRKWOOD v. SMITH AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Promissory note—Unnecessary provisions—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 83, subsection 3.

A document provided for the payment of a certain sum by instalments with interest, the whole to become due on default of one instalment, and that "no time given to, or security taken from, or composition arrangements entered into, with either party hereto shall prejudice the rights of the holder to proceed against any other party."

Held, that the document was not a promissory note.

Appeal of the plaintiff from the county court of Hampshire.

The action was brought on a document, as a promissory note, under the provisions of the Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 1855 (which Act is by section 7 of the Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act, 1883, in force as to county courts).

The document in question provided for the payment of certain money by instalments with interest, the whole to become due on default in payment of one instalment. The document contained the following proviso: "No time given to, or security taken from, or composition arrangements entered into, with either party hereto shall prejudice the rights of the holder to proceed against any other party."

The county court judge held that the document was not a promissory note, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 83 (1): "A promissory note is an unconditional promise in writing made by one person to another and signed by the maker, engaging to pay on demand, or at a fixed or determinable future time, a sum certain in money to, or to the order of, a specified person or to bearer." (3) "A note is not invalid by reason only that it contains also a pledge of collateral security with authority to sell or dispose thereof."

Daldy, for the plaintiff.

J. E. Bankes, for the defendant.

Davies v. Wilkinson, 10 A. & E. 98, was cited.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In this case the point is a small one. It is not alleged that this document was not an agreement upon which the plaintiff had a right to sue. The sole point is whether the instrument was one of a certain character, and one which entitled the plaintiff to the benefit of the summary procedure. That procedure is restricted to bills of exchange and promissory notes, including cheques. On the whole, though with some doubt, I come to the conclusion that the county court judge was right in his view that this instrument is not a promissory note. The Act of 1882 is undoubtedly in its main character a codification of the existing law, and when we find that the Act introduces into the definition of a promissory note additions which may be made to a note without destroying its negotiable character, I think the prudent view is, to take the Act as saying definitely what additions may and what may not be introduced into a promissory note. Having regard to the provisions of section 81 (3) of the Act, I come to the conclusion that this instrument is not a promissory note, and therefore is not within the Act under which these summary proceedings were taken.

The respondent did not appear.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HERSCHELL.—In this case a Mrs. Loftus obtained judgment, on the 15th of November, 1892, for £39 9s. debt and £4 12s. costs, for goods sold and delivered to the respondent, a married woman. Upon the respondent's marriage certain property was transferred to trustees in trust to pay the annual income to her for life for her separate use, and without power for her to anticipate the same.

Before the date of the judgment there were arrears of annual income, to which the respondent was entitled, which had not been paid to her by the trustees. On the 10th of May, 1894, Lawrance, J., made an order appointing the plaintiff in the action receiver, to receive so much of the accrued interest as would satisfy the debt and costs, and further ordered that the receiver should receive so much of the property only, as was the separate property of the defendant, not subject to any restriction against anticipation, unless by reason of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the property should be liable to execution notwithstanding such restriction. On the 1st of April, 1895, Day, J., ordered that the receivership order just referred to should be discharged and set aside, except as to the income of the defendant accrued due and payable at or before the date of the judgment sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's debt and costs. On the same day he continued an interim injunction of Wright, J., restraining the defendant from receiving such income.

The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal by the defendant from these orders and discharged the orders of Day, J. (see the report of Loftus v. Heriot, [1895] 2 Q. B. 212).

The present appellant, having paid the debt and costs of the plaintiff, and obtained an assignment from her, was, prior to the hearing of the appeal, substituted for her in all future proceedings.

The ground of decision in the Court of Appeal in Loftus v. Heriot was that the appellant was not entitled to enforce payment of his judgment out of the arrears of income which were due to the respondent at the date of the judgment, inasmuch as, not having come into her hands, they were within the restraint upon anticipation. In arriving at this conclusion they followed the views expressed in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (No. 2). The question in that case arose with regard to rents of property to which the defendant was entitled, subject to a restraint upon anticipation, which had accrued due after the date of judgment. But the reasoning of Kay, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the court (42 W. R. 631, [1894] 2 Q. B. 567), applied also to a case where the income had become due to a married woman before the date of the judgment, but had not yet reached her hands. In the subsequent case of Pillers v. Edwards the decision was treated as governing a case of that description, though Lindley, L.J., said: "I confess that, but for the decision referred to of Hood Barrs v. Cathcart, I should have thought that the restraint on anticipation was over the moment that the money settled to the married woman's separate use had become due and payable to her. That was my impression, founded on what one may call tradition. Moreover, on looking into the cases, I think that there is considerable authority in support of that view."

The introduction of a restraint on anticipation in settlements of property to the separate use of a married woman is of comparatively modern origin. It was decided in Pybus v. Smith, in 1791, and other cases that, though property was settled upon trust to pay the income to a married woman for her separate use, free from the control of her husband, this did not prevent her from assigning her interest in such income, or charging it with the payment of her husband's debts. The object of settling it to her separate use became thus defeated. It is stated in a note to Pybus v. Smith that these decisions suggested to Lord Thurlow, in a case where he was trustee, the introduction of a clause in restraint of anticipation. As far as I have been able to ascertain, the earliest form of the clause against anticipation provided that the trustees should, from time to time, pay the income to such person or persons, and for such intents and purposes, as the married woman, by writing signed with her own hand, should, notwithstanding her coverture (but so as the same was not by way of anticipation), direct or appoint, and in default of appointment, and in the meantime, pay the same into her proper hands—see Chassaing v. Parsonage, where it is stated that a clause of this nature had been introduced into these settlements, in consequence of the decision in Pybus v. Smith. A clause in substantially the same form certainly continued in use for a considerable time. It will be observed that it expressly empowered the married woman to alienate the income after it became due, and authorized the trustees to pay it to her appointee. It was only when the appointment was by way of anticipation that it was prohibited. Such a provision was regarded as a sufficient protection for the wife by those who devised the restraint on anticipation. At all events, it is clear that they did not regard an assignment after the income became due as made by way of anticipation, I am therefore unable to agree with the view entertained by Kay, L.J., that a restraint on anticipation by its nature forbids an alienation before the fund reaches the wife's hands, although the income be due to her when the alienation is attempted. In more recent times the clause restraining anticipation has assumed different forms, but its purpose and effect have, I think, always been the same. That effect was well expressed by Lord Cottenham in Rennie v. Ritchie, where he said that it prevents the person entitled to the income for her separate use "having the dominion till it becomes due." The restraint on anticipation does not, in my opinion, prevent her disposing of it as she pleases after that date. However she may then deal with it, she does not, I think, do so by way of anticipation any the more when it is in the hands of a trustee, than if it were in her own hands. In considering whether there is anticipation, this circumstance appears to me wholly immaterial. If she persuaded the trustee to pay the income to herself before it became due, she would be anticipating it, and the trustee would be guilty of a breach of trust, just as much as if she then gave a charge upon it, and the trustee recognized the charge, and paid the money accordingly. So, too, after the money becomes due, I think she is not anticipating it, whether she receives it herself or transfers her right to it to another. Such an act does not, in my opinion, fall, on any reasonable construction of them, within the words of the prohibition. I should have arrived at this conclusion had there been no authority on the point one way or the other, but there is, I think, ample authority to support it.

In Harnett v. M'Dougall, 8 Beav. 187, the very question arose before Lord Langdale. In that case the trust of a settlement was to pay the dividends of the settled property during the life of Mrs. A. to such person and for such interests and purposes as she by any writing should "from time to time when, and as the same became due, and not by way of assignment, charge, or other anticipation," direct or appoint, and in default of appointment, into her proper hands, for her sole and separate benefit. Mrs. A. purported to charge the dividends then and thenceforth to accrue, with certain debts. A petition was presented for the purpose of giving effect to this charge upon a fund in court. The Master of the Rolls said that to give effect to such a charge would be in direct contradiction to the language and intention of the settlement, and he must therefore refuse the petition "except so far as it seeks to dispose of dividends already accrued due."

In Pemberton v. M'Gill, 8 W. R. 290, 1 Dr. & Sm. 268, a testatrix bequeathed the residue of her estate to trustees on trust to pay an annuity of £300 to a married woman, for her separate use without power of anticipation, and appointed her executrix. She misappropriated assets of the testatrix. The question was whether her annuity could be applied to making good these misappropriations. The arrears of the annuity due amounted to a considerable sum. Kindersley, V.C., said that he has no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the arrears of the annuity, "which, of course, were not affected by the restraint on anticipation," must be applied in making good the misappropriations. Kay, L.J., in his judgment in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (No. 2), observed that the restriction in that and other cases must have been peculiarly worded. Your lordships have been furnished with an extract from the will which created the annuity, the arrears of which were in question, in Pemberton v. M'Gill. In that case, at all events, there was nothing peculiar in the wording of the restriction. The trustees were directed to pay the annuity by four equal quarterly payments into the hands of S. M., or empower her to receive the same during her life for her own sole and separate use, free from the control of her present or any future husband, but so that she shall not have any power to alienate or anticipate the same. There is certainly no distinction between those words and the language used in the settlement upon the present respondent's marriage.

In the case of In re Brettle 12 W. R. 562, 33 L. J. Ch. 471, the trust was to pay the income of the trust moneys from time to time, when and as the same should be due and received, but not by way of anticipation, into the proper hands of the beneficiary for her sole and separate use and benefit, and it was declared that her receipts in writing should alone be effectual discharges for the same. The beneficiary having executed an assignment by way of charge, it was held by Knight-Bruce and Turner, L.JJ., that it was only operative "as to any arrears which had accrued due" at the date of the assignment.

In Fitzgibbon v. Blake the Lord Chancellor of Ireland held that a married woman could dispose of and charge the arrears of income settled to her separate use without power of anticipation, on the ground that the clause against anticipation did not apply to such arrears.

Other cases might be cited, and notably Rowley v. Unwin before Wood, V.C., in which the same view of the law has been acted upon. And I am not aware of any decision until a quite recent date which is in conflict with it. It was assumed to be correct in Cox v. Bennett in the Court of Appeal. And, indeed, that court, previous to the decision in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (No. 2), and when it was differently constituted, appears to me, in Hulbert v. Cathcart, to have laid down the law in complete accordance with the view which I am asking your lordships to adopt. Unfortunately, that case was not reported, and it does not appear to have been brought to the notice of the learned judges before whom the case of Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (No. 2) came for decision.

If the restriction against anticipation be, as I think it is, inapplicable to the arrears of income now in question, the 19th section of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, obviously does not affect them.

I move your lordships that the judgment appealed from be reversed. The effect of this will be to restore the orders thereby discharged. They have, however, become quite ineffectual, inasmuch as the arrears to which they applied have been received by the respondent, there having been, unfortunately, no stay pending this appeal. The respondent must be ordered to repay to the appellant all costs paid by him, and to pay the costs of this appeal.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The order under appeal depends upon the proposition that it is not competent for a married woman, entitled for her separate use without power of anticipation, to dispose of income accrued due unless and until it reaches her own hands or the hands of her agent. This proposition was laid down for the first time in 1894 by the Court of Appeal in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (No. 2). There is nothing to suggest it in the circumstances which orginally gave rise to the restraint on anticipation. Nor can it, I think, be supported on principle or on any grounds of convenience, or on authority.

In early days, when the effect of placing a married woman in the position of a feme sole with regard to her separate property came to be understood, there was an inclination to treat separate income as a purely personal provision intended for maintenance. Arguments more or less plausible were founded on the various expressions employed in the copious style of conveyancing to limit or develop "separate use." Where the direction was that the income was to be paid "from time to time," it was argued that the prescribed mode of payment was inconsistent with an absolute power of disposition. But the authorities the other way were too strong, and that attempt failed. The usual direction that the income was to be paid "into the proper hands" of the married woman, and that "her receipts alone were to be a good discharge" was not more efficacious. The court always said that a married woman might dispose of her separate estate, "and her assignee," to use Lord Eldon's words in Brandon v. Robinson, 18 Ves. 429, "would take it; as if there was a contract entitling the assignee, this court would compel her to give her own receipt, if that was necessary to enable him to receive it." Nor did words requiring payment to be made on "personal appearance and receipt" carry the matter any further, for no payment, as Lord Cranworth observed in In re Ross's Trusts, 1 Sim. N. S. 199, could be made into her proper hands without her personal appearance. In fact, these and such like expressions, however stringent they appear at first sight, were regarded as "only an unfolding of all that is implied in a gift to the separate use."

It is important, as it seems to me, to bear this in mind, because the error into which the Court of Appeal appears to have fallen comes, I think, from treating words which are no more than the unfolding of the separate use, and which were known and well understood before the clause in restraint of anticipation was invented, as belonging to and forming part of that clause, or, at any rate, as having acquired some new force or efficacy by reason of their connection with it.

The clause which Lord Thurlow introduced into Miss Watson's settlement, and which soon came into general use, was intended to prevent married women dealing with their income in advance. It was designed to prevent the mischief which happened in Pybus v. Smith, where a lady who was a ward of court and had the protection of a settlement framed in the master's office, made away with all her property in less than three months. The clause has no application to arrears of income actually accrued due. Indeed, if it had the effect which the Court of Appeal attributed to it, it seems to me that the result would be mischievous. Everybody, I suppose, would concede that in limiting income to the separate use of a married woman without power of anticipation the primary intention is that if things go wrong she may have a sure and certain provision for her maintenance. But what is to happen if things do go wrong, and her income is in arrear? Tenants are sometimes behindhand; mortgagors are not always prompt. If the Court of Appeal is right, it might well happen that a married woman with an ample provision, and striving honestly to live within her income, would be brought into great straits. If her income fell into arrear, she would be unable to procure an advance; she could make no contract even for the necessaries of life. It is all very well to prevent a married woman from gathering the fruit, which will be hers in time, before it becomes ripe. When it is ripe, why should she be forbidden to touch it? Why should she have to wait until it falls into her lap? Why should the court, in its zeal for the security of her property, place it out of her reach when it ought to be in her pocket, and when, perhaps, she wants it most, and all for fear it should come into her husband's hands? So long as things go well, there is no reason why a married woman should not let her husband have her income if she knows what she is about. If things go amiss, there is the restraint on anticipation ready for use, and as useful for all practical purposes as if it had the effect attributed to it by the Court of Appeal, and without the disadvantage of bringing with it liability to a most inconvenient embargo.

Take another case. There is no doctrine, I suppose, better settled than this, that when husband and wife are living together the wife's separate income, received by the husband with her permission, to be inferred merely from conduct and circumstances, cannot be recalled. The rule, according to Lord Cottenham in Caton v. Ridout, 1 Mac. & G. 599, is founded on broad grounds of convenience, and is necessary for the peace of families. Now, a clause restraining anticipation is a usual clause. In marriage settlements it is rarely omitted. And it is not an uncommon thing to pay the wife's income to the husband, or to his account with his bankers. The practice prevails equally, whether there is a restraint against anticipation or not, and rightly too, as the law stood before the decision in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (No. 2). But if the Court of Appeal is right, every payment where there is a clause restraining anticipation would be open to question, and it would be "impossible," if I may use Lord Cottenham's words, "to tell what confusion might not be introduced into a family." Your lordships may remember that this doctrine was lately considered and approved in this House in the case of Edward v. Cheyne, 13 App. Cas. 385, 36 W. R. Dig. 173, and applied to a case of a Scotch alimentary provision, where a claim was made by the representatives of the deceased wife against the representatives of her deceased husband.

So the case stands apart from authority. Is there any authority to be found for the proposition which has commended itself to the Court of Appeal? I have read all the cases referred to by Kay, L.J., but I cannot find in any one of those cases, or in any text-book of authority, even a casual expression supporting the view of the Court of Appeal, or tending to show that the question has ever been regarded as an open question. In most of the cases which were cited the point was noticed incidentally and arose without argument. But the stream of authority when uniform and unbroken is not less weighty and powerful on that account. There are, however, at least two reported cases, one in England and one in Ireland, where the point was raised directly, argued, and decided. Those two cases have stood unchallenged and undoubted for forty years. Neither the one or the other seems to have been referred to in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (No. 2).

In Rowley v. Unwin, which was decided by Wood, V.C., in 1855, the plaintiff, a married woman, was entitled to the income of £1,000 for her separate use without power of anticipation. In January, 1845, the trustees allowed the husband to receive the principal, on the understanding that it should be secured by a mortgage of some real estate which he had contracted to buy. The mortgage was not actually executed until February, 1849. The lady separated from her husband in the following September. Soon afterwards she filed a bill against the trustees and her husband, claiming, among other things, interest on the £1,000 from the time when the sum was received by the husband to the date of the execution of the mortgage, and claiming also a lien on the mortgaged property in respect of such interest. The case was argued for the plaintiff by Mr. W. M. James and Mr. G. M. Giffard. Everything was disposed of at the conclusion of the argument, except the claim to interest on the £1,000. "If that point is to be pressed," said his honour, "I must look into the authorities." In his judgment on a later day the Vice-Chancellor pointed out that the wife could not beforehand consent to the husband receiving the interest, and that during the period in question the husband had had the use of the money, for which he was bound to pay interest. The case, he said, was the same as if the husband had given a mortgage for it; he would then have been indebted for interest to the wife de anno in annum, and if the wife's trustees had appointed a receiver who had paid the rents of the mortgaged property to the husband, it would fall within the ordinary rule which precludes a wife from recovering the past income of her separate estate upon the ground of a supposed gift by her of such income to her husband. He could, he added, draw no distinction between moneys in the hands of the husband, the interest of which the wife might have claimed, and moneys out on mortgage. His honour therefore declared that the plaintiff was not entitled to the arrears of interest which she claimed. I cannot imagine a case raising the question more directly, or in a manner more favourable to the claimant.

In Ireland, Blackburne, L.C., came to a similar decision, after argument, in the case of Blake v. Fitzgibbon.

I have not said anything about the form or extent of the order which was discharged by the Court of Appeal. The point was touched upon in the course of the argument. But, as it is immaterial for the present purpose, it seems better to leave it for future consideration.

I cannot help expressing my regret that, under the circumstances, the Court of Appeal did not think it proper to hold the fund in medio pending the appeal to your lordships' House, and to put the respondent's solicitors on terms to repay the costs in the event of the appeal being successful.

The appeal, in my opinion, ought to succeed, but I am afraid success will be only a barren victory.

Lord MORRIS and Lord SHAND concurred.

Judgment appealed from reversed. The respondent to pay the appellant all costs paid by him, and to pay the costs of the appeal.

Solicitor — Costs — Taxation — Several bills — Order of course to tax one only.

A solicitor to whom a balance of £101 15*s. was due upon seven bills gave up the client's documents upon payment of* £50, undertaking to return any sum found due from him upon taxation. He afterwards wrote accepting the £50 in full discharge of all claims. No answer was given to this letter, but a common order of course to tax one only of the bills was obtained by the client.

Held, that the order of course was right under the circumstances.

Appeal from North, J.

In the month of March, 1895, R. H. Ward was instructed by the Hand-in-Hand Investment and Mortgage Co. (Limited) to act as their solicitor, and he acted as their solicitor accordingly up to the 16th of November, 1895, when he received notice of change of solicitor in a pending action and a retainer of another solicitor. Seven bills, amounting to £261 15s. in all, were due to Mr. Ward, and payments on account of £160 had been made. A balance of £101 15s. was due, and the papers were handed over on payment of £50 more on the 31st of December. On the 1st of January, 1896, Mr. Ward wrote offering to accept the £50 instead of the £101 15s. The letter is set out in the judgment.

On the 27th of January, 1896, an order of course to tax only one of the seven bills was obtained, and it was now sought to set this order aside.

Cordery, for the motion.—The order is irregular, being a common order to tax part only of one large bill, or at all events one only of the bills delivered by Mr. Ward. The other bills have not been paid or settled, Mr. Ward's offer to accept £50 in full settlement has not been accepted, and a balance may be found due to him. On payment of one bill the solicitor is ordered to give up papers upon which he has a lien for unpaid bills.

He cited Holland v. Gwynne, In re Byrch, 8 Beav. 124; Law v. Gould, 21 Beav. 481; In re Wavell, 22 Beav. 634; In re Yetts, 33 Beav. 412, 12 W. R. Ch. Dig. 101.

Beddall, for the client.—The other bills have all, in fact, been paid, and the common order is right. The cases cited have no application to the present case.

Cordery replied.

NORTH, J.—In my opinion this order was properly obtained. There are two objections made to it. First, that it is one large bill of costs, and that the client who applied to tax has got an order that part of that only is to be taxed. I do not think that that is a correct statement of the facts. If there were seven bills delivered by the solicitor to the client, all relating to totally different matters, they might possibly have been all included in one bill, but as a matter of fact they were not. They were kept quite distinct, and, although to a considerable extent they were treated as one, they were in fact at the time kept separate because they were different bills. In my opinion it is impossible to say that these seven bills are one bill, or are merely chapters or leaflets forming part of a bill. They are seven bills, and therefore, that being so, it is open to the client to proceed by order of course to tax one of them; unless, indeed, the second objection is well founded, and that is this.

It is assumed that there were seven bills due from the client to the solicitor, and it is said it is not open to the client to proceed to tax one of these bills without taxing the others, especially when the order of course obtained contains at the end of it an order that "upon payment by the petitioners to the said solicitor of what may be certified to be due to him as aforesaid, or in case it shall appear that there is nothing due to him, he, the said solicitor, shall deliver to the petitioners upon oath all deeds, books, papers, and writings in his custody or power belonging to the petitioners." A certain sum is found due upon it, and upon payment of that certain sum the solicitor, it is said, is ordered to deliver up all deeds, books, papers, and writings, although he has a lien upon many of them which are held by him in respect of other bills he has against the client.

It is said there is authority on the point. I think it right to say that there are authorities showing that when there are several bills open and unsettled between a solicitor and client you could not by an order of course get one taxed without the others. But in the present case the circumstances are very peculiar. The seven bills amounted together to the sum of £261 15*s*. There were three payments on account, amounting altogether to £160, and the cash account shows a balance due of £101 15*s*. The client wanted to have the papers, and got them from the solicitor on the terms of paying him £50 more, and he handed them over to the client, and gave this note: "In consideration of your handing to me a cheque for the £50 deposited with you, I hereby undertake to return to you any sum that may be found due from me on taxation of my bills delivered.—Dated this 31st day of December, 1895." So that we have it contemplated that there was a possible taxation of the bills, and this was an undertaking to hand back any excess, that might turn out on such taxation to have been received by the solicitor. Then the next day the solicitor writes this: "Referring to my clerk's interview with you yesterday, it is not my intention to take any further trouble to obtain payment of any balance that might be found to be due to me in the event of a taxation of my bills of costs, and I therefore accept the £50 in full discharge of all claims by me against the company so far as I am concerned, and you will therefore please treat the £50 as the balance due on the cash account, and not the £101 15*s*. as appears by the said account." So that then he said: "I accept £50 in full. I shall then have received £210, and I accept that in full satisfaction of all these bills." That, of course, did not prevent the client taxing the bills if he liked; but the client proceeded to tax one and not the rest—that is to say, the client accepted the offer that had been made, subject to the taxation of the bill which the client did not choose to accept at the amount at which it was delivered; so if acceptance were necessary it is acceptance enough of the offer made there.

The result is this—that one bill only is being taxed; but all the bills have been paid in full, subject to the solicitor repaying to the clients any sum which he has received in excess of his claim, and upon the solicitor being paid in full the right of the client to have the deeds handed up is a matter of course, and I see no impropriety therefore under the present circumstances in the order being made in that shape when, in point of fact, the client is to say which bill shall be taxed, and the only one selected is taxed.

It cannot be said, and the solicitor cannot complain, that he is ordered to deliver up the deeds when there is something due to him, when the only question between the parties is whether he has been exactly paid or overpaid. If anything might happen to be found the other way as due to him, then I would agree that it would be wrong to obtain an order of course containing terms that on the taxation of one bill all documents should be given up. Having regard to the question between the parties, it seems to me that the order of course was right in this case. The cases referred to by Mr. Cordery clearly establish the propositions there contended for, but this case is outside them altogether.

From this decision the solicitor appealed. The appeal was heard on the 8th of May, 1896.

Cordery, for the appellant, relied on the same authorities as in the court below, and on In re Johnson and Weatherley, 36 W. R. 374, 37 Ch. D. 433.

Beddall, for the respondent, was not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think that, after that explanation as to the letter of the 1st of January, 1896, there is anything whatever in this application. There were several bills, and not one only, and there is no difficulty about the matter except possibly the suggestion that the other bills might be taxed. But after that letter it is plain that none of them could be taxed on the application of the solicitor, and that no injustice is done by this common order to tax. I think North, J., was quite right in refusing the motion to discharge that order. There is really nothing more in it. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree.

KAY, L.J.—I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF LONDON. (a.)

Poor law — Rating — Appeal — Assessment committee appearing by their clerk—Right of clerk to be heard—Order of the County of London Quarter Sessions, 1890, r. 10—Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), ss. 27, 62.

Under section 62 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, which provides that "an assessment committee may appear on any appeal by their clerk," the clerk is not entitled to be heard in court for the purpose of signifying his consent to an agreed order.

Rule nisi directed to the justices of the county of London to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to allow the assessment committee of the parish of St. Mary, Islington, to appear by their clerk upon the hearing of an appeal against an assessment of certain premises, and to give the necessary consent to the alterations in the valuation list according to agreed terms.

A notice of appeal to the County of London

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID and W. F. BARRY, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

Quarter Sessions had been served under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, by Messrs. T. R. Roberts (Limited) against an assessment of their premises in the parish, and the assessment committee appeared by their clerk as respondents to the appeal.

Before the date fixed for the hearing of the appeal terms had been arranged between Messrs. Roberts and the assessment committee, by which it was agreed that a reduction in the assessment should be allowed, and that the necessary alterations should be made in the list.

In pursuance of instructions from the assessment committee their clerk, who was not a solicitor or a barrister, appeared before the Court of Quarter Sessions to give consent on their behalf to the alterations in the valuation list, when the chairman refused to hear him or to accept his consent on behalf of the committee, upon the ground that by rule 10 of the Orders of the County of London Quarter Sessions, 1890, consents must be signified by counsel.

On the application of the assessment committee the court granted a rule nisi for a mandamus as above.

By section 62 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869: "An assessment committee may appear on any appeal by their clerk."

By section 27: "The justices in assessment sessions" (now the Quarter Sessions for the County of London under the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 42, sub-section 10) "may, with the approval of one of her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, make orders from time to time for the purpose of regulating the proceedings on appeals to them under this Act."

By rule 10 of the Orders of the County of London Quarter Sessions, 1890, made and approved under section 27: "Consents shall be signified by counsel in open court."

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C. (H. Avory with him), showed cause against the rule.—The clerk to the assessment committee has no right under section 62 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, to be heard on an appeal. That section merely gives the assessment committee the right to "appear," that is, enter an appearance, by their clerk, but it gives the clerk no right to be heard in court. Rule 10 of the Orders of the County of London Quarter Sessions, 1890, regulates the proceedings on an appeal where consent to an agreed order must be given. That rule is therefore authorized by section 27. If the clerk were permitted to appear in this case he would also be entitled to claim the right to appear and be heard upon the argument of any case. Reg. v. The Assessment Committee of St. Mary Abbott, Kensington, 39 W. R. 278, [1891] 1 Q. B. 378, is not an authority in support of the right of the clerk to be heard at quarter sessions, because in that case it was only held that there was nothing in the Act of 1869 to prevent a ratepayer being heard by his agent before an assessment committee. In Collier v. Hicks, 2 B. & Ad. 663, it was decided that no person had by law a right to act as an advocate on the trial of an information before the justices of the peace without their permission. In The London Engineering Co. v. Cowan, 16 L. T. N. S. 573, it was ruled at nisi prius that an attorney could not consent to a verdict on the part of his client, and that counsel must be instructed. The giving of consents is not a mere formality, for it does not follow as a matter of course that the court will make the consent order, for a party might consent to something contrary to the provisions of the Act. Further, independently of any statute, there is an inherent jurisdiction vested in all courts by common law to determine whom they shall give audience to. There is ample authority for saying that the courts have power to regulate their own procedure.

The following Acts were also referred to: County Courts Act, 1888, s. 72; Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 123; Poor Law Act, 1844, s. 68.

T. W. Chitty, in support of the rule.—Section 62 of the Act of 1869 gives the clerk to the assessment committee the right to be heard upon an appeal to signify their consent. All the cases cited are cases in which someone has claimed the right to appear as advocate or otherwise for somebody else. The clerk does not claim to appear for the committee as either counsel or advocate; he claims simply that he is entitled to give formal consent to an action which has been settled, as representing the assessment committee. Rule 10 is ultra vires, because no court can have a right to say that a litigant may not appear before them in person. The assessment committee is a public body, and can appear before any court (as other public bodies) individually or collectively by representation. The clerk to the committee is, under the circumstances, in the position of an ordinary individual who desires to appear in person. There are similar provisions to be found in the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 123; Local Government Act, 1894, Schedule I., Part II., rule 16. The consent to an order on appeal, agreed to out of court, is a mere formality, and it would be unreasonable to require the committee to incur the expense of instructing counsel merely to consent.

DAY, J.—This rule must be discharged. Independently of the authorities cited, the justices have a right to say whether they will give audience to the clerk of the assessment committee or not. The right to decide that question is an inherent right vested in all courts by common law, and it has not been shown that the right has been taken away from the court of quarter sessions by any statute.

It was contended that section 62 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, limited the power of the Court of Quarter Sessions by providing that the assessment committee could appear by their clerk, but that section is satisfied by saying that the assessment committee need not attend individually, but may be brought before the court by their clerk, who is also empowered to receive service on their behalf. The statute provides, for the convenience of all parties, that the clerk should represent them and act on their behalf. For the same reason he may appoint a solicitor or counsel, but he has no power to appear himself in court as their counsel or advocate. He is not the assessment committee, he is not a suitor in person; and cannot claim, as he might otherwise, the right of arguing in open court his appeal in person.

Rule 10, it was contended, was ultra vires and unreasonable because it directed that counsel must be instructed to give consent—that the consent being merely a formality, the cost of counsel is a waste of the ratepayers' money. In my opinion the rule is a very wise one, and calculated to benefit all parties. It is most important that consents should be given by persons who know what they are consenting to; otherwise litigation would constantly arise. Counsel are responsible for the consents they give in open court, and therefore mistakes are less likely to occur, and expenses, instead of being increased, are in fact probably greatly reduced by the wise provision of this rule.

LAWRANCE, J., concurred.

May 6th.—T. W. Chitty, for the appellants, argued as in the court below.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., and H. Avory, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The language of section 62 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, which is obviously technical, is applied to the everyday circumstances of litigation. Litigants must appear before the court which has to deal with their case. After the parties have appeared there are always several proceedings to be taken before the court can determine the matter brought before it. The language of section 62 is perfectly clear. When are the assessment committee to give the security mentioned in that section? Clearly after they are in court. When are they in court? Clearly after they have appeared. They may appear by their clerk. Whether or not the clerk can instruct counsel is not now before us, and I express no opinion upon it. Instead of calling upon each member of the assessment committee to appear, that is, to do what is ordinarily covered by the word "appear," their clerk may appear for them. Then there are proceedings to be taken after the assessment committee have appeared. Section 27 of the Act of 1869 gives the justices power to make orders for the purpose of regulating the proceedings on appeals. Those proceedings take place after appearance. Rule 10 was made under that section for regulating the proceedings on appeal. One of the proceedings on an appeal would be, where necessary, to signify consent to an agreed order in court. The rule says that consents shall be signified by counsel in open court. That rule therefore deals with a proceeding on an appeal, and is not ultra vires. The consent, therefore, can only be given by counsel. The judgment of the court below was therefore right.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The quarter sessions have made rules under section 27 of the Act of 1869 for regulating the proceedings on appeals, and the rule in question, rule 10, comes within the very words of the section. It is contended that that rule is ultra vires because, it is said, under section 62 the assessment committee may appear on any appeal and be heard by their clerk. That is not my reading of section 62. It provides how the assessment committee may get into court on an appeal. There was a difficulty about their getting into court, as they might all have to be served and to appear. Section 62 provides a mode in which this numerous body may get into court—they may appear by their clerk. Section 27 deals with what is to be done after they have appeared by their clerk, and rule 10 is made under the powers of that section. Rule 10 is therefore not ultra vires, and under it the assessment committee, after they have appeared by their clerk, must be represented by counsel to signify their consent on an appeal.

Practice—Commercial cause—Entering cause in commercial list—Appearance of defendant—Power to deal with costs.

After the writ in an action has been served the plaintiff may, before the defendant has entered an appearance, apply to the judge to whom commercial causes are assigned to enter the cause in the commercial list, and the judge may direct the costs of the application to be costs in the cause.

The defendant can, after entering an appearance, apply to have the order rescinded, but only on the ground that the cause is not a commercial cause.

Application by the defendants for leave to appeal from chambers.

The writ was issued in the Queen's Bench Division, the claim being for demurrage. With the service of the writ the plaintiff gave the defendants notice that he was going to apply to Mathew, J., who was hearing summonses in commercial causes at chambers, that the cause should be entered in the commercial list. The plaintiff applied accordingly, and Mathew, J., granted the application, and ordered the costs to be costs in the cause, the defendants to have liberty to apply. The application was heard before the defendants had entered an appearance, and they were therefore not heard upon it. The defendants subsequently entered an appearance, and applied to the learned judge to rehear the plaintiff's application, which was refused.

The defendants thereupon applied for leave to appeal from this refusal, and also from the order entering the cause in the commercial list.

Lauriston Batten for the defendants.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—We have to state what is the rule of practice in such questions as this, and for that purpose we have consulted the Lord Chief Justice and Mathew, J. A cause in the Queen's Bench Division is not attached to any particular judge, and the judges of that division, and not the parties to the cause, can direct by what judge the action shall be tried. A cause entered in the commercial list still remains in the Queen's Bench Division. The judge to whom commercial causes are assigned has power to place any commercial cause in the Queen's Bench Division in the list of commercial causes, and in our opinion he can do this the moment the writ has been served. He has also power to order the costs to be costs in the cause. The defendant need not be heard upon that application. But if the cause is not a commercial cause, the defendant will be entitled to object to the order upon that ground, and that is the only ground upon which he can object to the order. The present cause is admittedly a commercial cause, and the order of Mathew, J., was right.

Application by the plaintiff for an order that Messrs. Crossman & Prichard, the London agents for John Dunlop, Berwick-on-Tweed, the defendant's solicitor, should repay to the plaintiff £66 4s. 2d., being the taxed costs of the defendant's appeal against an order made at chambers.

On the 15th of November, 1892, Mrs. Loftus recovered judgment for £44 1s., debt and costs, against the defendant, a married woman.

Upon the defendant's marriage certain property was transferred to trustees upon trust to pay the annual income to her for life for her separate use without power of anticipation. At the date of the judgment there were arrears of income accrued due which had not been paid to her by the trustees. On the 1st of April, 1895, the judge at chambers made an order appointing a receiver of the income of the defendant accrued due and payable at or before the date of the judgment sufficient to satisfy the debt and costs. The defendant appealed from this order, and while the appeal was pending Mr. Hood Barrs, to whom Mrs. Loftus had assigned the judgment debt, obtained an order that he should be substituted for her in all future proceedings. The Court of Appeal discharged the order made at chambers, with costs, holding that the income was protected by the restraint on anticipation until it actually reached the hands of the married woman: see Loftus v. Heriot, [1895] 2 Q. B. 212, 43 W. R. Dig. 112.

On the 5th of July, 1895, a petition of appeal to the House of Lords was lodged, and an application to stay proceedings pending the appeal was refused by the Court of Appeal. On the 29th of July the plaintiff paid to Messrs. Crossman & Prichard, the London agents for the defendant's solicitor, the taxed costs of the appeal, amounting to £66 4s. 2d., under a threat of execution.

The House of Lords subsequently reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal in Loftus v. Heriot, with costs, and restored the order made at chambers, holding that the arrears of income which had accrued due, though not actually paid to the married woman, could be made available to satisfy the judgment: see the report of Hood Barrs v. Heriot (No. 1), ante, p. 481.

The plaintiff thereupon applied for an order for the repayment of the costs as above.

According to the affidavit of Dunlop, the defendant's country solicitor, his London agents applied the £66 4s. 2d., with his consent, towards payment of the amount which he owed them in their cash account with him, and on the 29th of July, 1895, the defendant was indebted to him in a sum in excess of the £66 4s. 2d., and he thereupon, with her consent, applied such sum to the credit of her account with him, and delivered to her a bill of costs showing a balance due to him of over £30.

Oswald, Q.C. (Bartley Denniss with him), for the plaintiff.—An order similar to that asked for here was made by the Court of Appeal in Ireland in Fitzmaurice v. Jordan, 32 L. R. Ir. 112, 41 W. R. Dig. 189. The effect of that decision is that where, after notice of appeal has been served, there being a fair ground for the appeal, the solicitor obtains payment of the costs from the unsuccessful party under a threat of execution, the court will order him to repay the costs if the appeal succeeds, in default of his client repaying him. The plaintiff is content to take a similar order here. The London agents have these costs in their possession, as they have applied the money in liquidation of their costs against the country solicitor.

Sylvain Mayer, for the solicitors.—This court has no jurisdiction to entertain this application, as there has been an appeal to the House of Lords. The House of Lords alone could have entertained the application. Next, assuming that this court has jurisdiction, the practice is not to make an order on the solicitors to repay the costs. Lydney and Wigpool Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, 34 W. R. 749, 33 Ch. D. 85, shows that in such circumstances the solicitors receive the costs as the agents of their client, and not for their own benefit, and that the client alone is liable to refund the money.

Oswald, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an application for an order against certain solicitors to repay the costs of an appeal to this court which had been paid to them by the plaintiff. The case was carried to the House of Lords, who reversed the decision of this court, with costs. I very much doubt whether, after that, this court has any jurisdiction at all to entertain this application. But it is not necessary to base our judgment upon that ground. We will deal with this case apart from any such consideration, and will assume that this court has jurisdiction. The case stands thus. This court gave judgment for the defendant, with costs. The costs were paid by the plaintiff to the London agents, who were the solicitors on the record for the defendant's country solicitor. The costs were paid to them as solicitors for the defendant. Therefore the costs were paid to the defendant through the hands of the solicitors. They were not paid to the solicitors in their own right, but simply to them as agents for the client. The application is now made that the solicitors should be ordered personally to repay to the plaintiff the costs so received by them. No such order has ever been made by any court in England. In Lydney and Wigpool Iron Ore Co. v. Bird the registrars reported to the court that there was no precedent for such an order. In that case Cotton, L.J., thought such an application could not succeed, and he gave strong reasons to show that such an order would be wrong. There is, on the other hand, a decision of great authority in Ireland—Fitzmaurice v. Jordan—which seems to me to be in point. But I must decline to follow that decision. I have carefully read the judgment of the court as delivered by Fitzgibbon, L.J., and I cannot find that he gave any reasons for the order which was made.

I agree with the reasons given by Cotton, L.J., in the Lydney case, and in my opinion this application must be refused.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is a perfectly novel application. It is for an order that the solicitors should repay out of their own pockets the costs paid to them, though they have been guilty of no impropriety, and have not given any undertaking to repay the costs. I have grave doubts whether this court can entertain this application after the case has gone to the House of Lords, and that House has not remitted the case to this court. But I pass that point by, and I assume that this court has jurisdiction. I cannot remember having ever heard of such an application. There is, however, a case in the Court of Appeal in Ireland which seems to me to be in point, and which is an authority in support of the order now asked for, and we must take it that that case lays down the practice in Ireland. On the other hand, the case of Lydney and Wigpool Iron Ore Co. v. Bird goes to show that where the solicitor has properly obtained the costs, the court, apart from an undertaking given by him to return them if the appeal succeeds, will not order him to repay the costs. That seems to me to be the true view. The application therefore fails.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This application is altogether novel. I can see no ground upon which it can be said that we have any jurisdiction to deal with this application, the House of Lords not having remitted the cause to this court. I agree that on every ground the application fails.

Testator, who died after the Finance Act, 1894, came into operation, gave a pecuniary legacy to persons by way of succession, and bequeathed his residuary personal estate in shares, some of which were given absolutely and others to persons in succession.

Held, that under the Finance Act, 1894, settlement estate duty as well as estate duty in respect of both classes of the settled legacies should be borne by, and was payable by the executors out of, the general residuary estate.

Adjourned summons.

By his will, dated the 27th of February, 1890, Thomas Webber gave and bequeathed the sum of £2,000, free of legacy duty, unto his executors and trustees upon trust to permit Matilda Ann Webber to receive the income thereof during her life for her sole and separate use, and after her death the testator directed his trustees to hold the said sum or the investments representing the same "in trust for such one or more of the children of the said Matilda Ann Webber by Thomas Richard William Webber as being sons or a son shall at my death have attained or shall thereafter attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters shall at my death have attained that age or married or shall thereafter attain that age or marry; and if more than one in equal shares." The testator also gave a legacy of £800 to Emily Leach Kersley and her issue upon similar trusts; and, after giving certain legacies absolutely, the will proceeded: "And I direct that the residue shall be considered as divided into thirty equal parts," and held by the trustees upon trust as to six parts for the children of R. J. Webber; as to five parts for Matilda Ann Webber for life or widowhood, with remainder to her children; and the testator gave the remaining shares in some cases absolutely, and in some cases directed them to be settled.

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator died on the 7th of March, 1895.

This summons was taken out to decide whether (1) estate duty, and (2) settlement estate duty, on the respective legacies of £2,000 and £800 to Matilda Ann Webber and Emily Leach Kersley, and their respective children, ought to be paid out of the legacies or out of the residue.

A. Adams, for the executors.

J. G. Butcher and A. Read, for persons interested in the settled legacies and settled shares of residue.

Austen Cartmell, for the persons interested in the unsettled shares of residue.

NORTH, J.—In this case the testator's will was made before, but he died after, the coming into operation of the Finance Act, 1894. By it, two pecuniary legacies are given, and the residuary estate is divided into thirty shares, which are given to different persons, some being given absolutely and some shares being settled. The question is how estate duty and settlement estate duty should be borne. As regards the shares given absolutely—and, indeed, all the shares—it is clear that estate duty must be paid.

The legacies of £2,000 and £800 would before the Finance Act have to pay 1 per cent. duty, which they now escape. The testator intended that the legacies should be free from duty, although this does not affect the construction of the Act. The Act imposes duty on the personal estate the executor receives, and the executor has to pay this duty. I find nothing in the Act to allow him to recoup himself in any way. By section 1 of the Act estate duty is imposed; and section 5, sub-section (1) (a) deals with settlement estate duty. [His lordship read sections 1, 2, 4, and 6.] The executor is bound to pay the estate duty in respect of all personal property of which the deceased was competent to dispose at his death; and the executor is at liberty to pay the estate duty in respect of any other property passing on the testator's death which by virtue of deceased's will is under the control of the executor. The Act does not ignore the fact that the executor often cannot tell exactly what the property is at the time the affidavit is carried in; section 6 (4) provides for the case of a person accountable for duty who is not the executor. Section 8 (3) provides that the executor is to state everything on which duty is payable, not because he has to pay it, but because such a course is convenient.

Section 6 deals with the recovery of estate duty. Is settlement estate duty included in estate duty? It seems to me that it is: (see section 5, sub-section (1) (a)). If not, there is no provision in the Act as to settlement estate duty being paid by any person at all. Turning to the interpretation clause (section 22, sub-section (1) (e)), the expression "estate duty means estate duty under this Act." This seems absurd, but Mr. Cartmell points out that the expression "estate duty" is also used in other Acts. Settlement estate duty is part of the burden the executor has thrown upon him. Is there anything to show that he can throw it upon any particular share? Section 9, sub-sections (1) and (4), do not apply where the whole property has passed to the executor as such. The duty devolving upon the executor, it has to be borne out of the general residuary estate. It is said that it is unfair that the duty caused by the settlement of a share has to be borne by a share which is not settled; but that is a matter for the Legislature, and not for me. In my opinion the executor cannot get back the duty paid.

Summons.

This was an application by the trustee of the estate of the late Mr. Lyne Stephens for liberty, out of funds in his hands representing income of the testator's residuary estate, to pay to the legal personal representative of Mrs. Lyne Stephens, deceased, the late tenant for life of such residuary estate, a proportionate part of certain dividends in a sum of £130,000 Bank Stock, and upon a sum of £12,000 Royal Exchange Corporation Stock.

As to the Bank Stock, it was admitted that the said proportionate part of the dividends was payable to Mrs. Lyne Stephens' estate.

The facts as regards the Royal Exchange Corporation Stock were these.

The testator, who died in 1860, by his will dated 1851, gave his residuary estate to trustees upon trust for his wife for life, and after her death to pay, transfer, and assign his residuary estate, and the stocks, funds, and securities upon which the same should be invested, unto and among such of the issue of four of the testator's uncles therein named as should be living at his decease.

Mrs. Lyne Stephens died on the 2nd of September, 1894, and the £12,000 Royal Exchange Corporation Stock was, in pursuance of an order of court dated the 12th of November, 1894, sold on the 29th of January, 1895.

On the 31st of December, 1894, an interim dividend of 4 per cent. was declared on this stock, and in June, 1895, a 10 per cent. dividend was declared for the year ending the 31st of December, 1894.

The question now arose whether the legal personal representative of the tenant for life was entitled to participate in these dividends.

Hastings, Q.C., and Methold, for the summons.—The legal personal representative of Mrs. Lyne Stephens is apparently entitled to share in the dividends. The Apportionment Act of 1870 is applicable to such a case, as the word "dividends" occurs in section 5. They ought to be divided between the tenant for life and the remainderman in the usual way. The Royal Exchange Stock rose and fell considerably in 1894-95.

They referred to Freeman v. Whitbread, 14 W. R. 188, L. R. 1 Eq. 266; Bulkeley v. Stephens, 3 N. R. 105, 10 L. T. N. S. 225, 12 W. R. Dig. 3; Bostock v. Blakeney, 2 Bro. C. C. 653.

Buckley, Q.C., and Baines, for the remaindermen.—The Apportionment Act does not apply: In re Clarke, Barker v. Perowne, 29 W. R. 730, 18 Ch. D. 160. The words of the Act are not exhaustive, and only apply to dividend-paying investments. The Act does not apply to a case where a dividend is paid in the purchase money, and the trustee never receives it, in fact, at all. Lord Londesborough v. Somerville, was a very special case. [STIRLING, J.—The Act introduces the difference that it deals with these things on the principle of interest for money lent. That is what the Vice-Chancellor called the abstract principle.]

They referred also to Scholefield v. Redfern, 11 W. R. 453, 2 Dr. & Sm. 173.

Hastings, in reply.—[STIRLING, J.—It is clear from Scholefield v. Redfern that in case of a mortgage there would be apportionment, but not on a change of investments. It was to meet that, that the Act was passed. Freeman v. Whitbread is exhaustive, and during the twenty-five years the Act has been in operation has never been departed from.] The Act now gives me a right which before was only an equity.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 28.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts as above set out, continued:—As regards the Bank Stock the dividends came to the hands of the trustees, and it is not disputed that the legal personal representative of Mrs. Lyne Stephens is entitled to a proportionate part of what came to the hands of the trustees. Neither is it disputed that the Royal Exchange Corporation is a public company within section 5 of the Apportionment Act of 1870, and that the interim dividend actually came to the hands of the trustees, so as to make it apportionable under the Act, and therefore that a proper share ought to be paid to the legal personal representative of the tenant for life.

Then as regards the dividend which was declared in June, 1895, it is contended on behalf of such legal personal representative that the price received by the trustees includes that dividend, and that as much thereof as represents that dividend down to the death of the tenant for life ought to be paid to him. From an abstract point of view there is much to be said in favour of this contention; but there is considerable difficulty in its practical application. This is not the first time the point has been considered by the court: at least, a similar one as to apportionment of income on change of investment has been twice considered, first in Scholefield v. Redfern, and secondly in Freeman v. Whitbread. In the former case the Vice-Chancellor says (2 Dr. & Sm., at p. 182): "There is another question of a peculiar kind, and one which is novel to me. The point will be best explained by putting an example. Suppose part of the testator's property to consist of certain American stock, bearing interest or dividends payable at half-yearly periods, say January and July, and the trustees sell it in order to invest the proceeds in Consols. If they sell it at any other time than precisely the period at which a dividend had just accrued, the money realized by the sale is so much more in proportion to the time which has elapsed since the last dividend day. Therefore the amount realized by the sale is compounded partly of the value of the stock itself and partly of the value of that proportionate part of the current half-year's dividend which may be considered to have accrued since the last dividend day. It is contended that the tenant for life ought to have this latter portion as income. Now, it is certain that in the multitude of cases of administration of estates in modern times, when similar directions have been given by testators, the court has never been in the habit of administrating any such equity. When we consider a little further it is obvious that if the tenant for life is to have something out of the sale money as representing income when the trustees invest the money, unless they invest it on the very day on which the dividend has just accrued due, the same equity ought to be administered the other way and we ought to take from the tenant for life something of his next dividend on the Consols and add that to the capital, in order to make things equal as between him and the remainderman. It is clear that if there is an equity one way, there is an equity the other way. It is obvious that the reason why such equity on either side has never been administered habitually by this court is that by attempting it a grievous burthen would be imposed upon the estates of testators by reason of the complicated investigation which it would lead to. The gain to either party would be far more than counterbalanced by the expense which might be incurred in a complicated case, and for that reason, no doubt, the thing has never been done. I will not be the first to introduce the practice."

In the second case of Freman v. Whitbread the Vice-Chancellor delivered a long and elaborate judgment in which the subject may be said to be exhausted. I simply refer to it because it amplifies the reasoning contained in the first case. Both these decisions were before the Apportionment Act, 1870, and it is necessary therefore to consider the effects of that Act.

Section 2 provides, among other things, that dividends "shall, like interest on money lent, be considered as accruing from day to day and shall be apportionable in respect of time accordingly." So far as that is concerned, I think the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor is not affected, because at the conclusion of Scholefield v. Redfern he says: "But it was suggested that, though this may be so with regard to stock the dividends of which are payable at the end of each successive half-year, a different rule is applicable to the case of railway debentures and other property of that description, yielding interest de die in diem. If anything is received as interest, that interest will belong to the tenant for life; but if the debenture is sold for a given sum, that sum must be treated as capital." But the matter does not stop there. The Act not merely declares that they shall be apportionable, but provides for the time of payment and the remedies for their recovery. Section 3 runs: "The apportioned part of any such rent, annuity, dividend, or other payment shall be payable or recoverable in the case of a continuing rent, annuity, or other such payment when the entire portion of which such apportioned part shall form part shall become due and payable, and not before;" and in the case of a rent, annuity, or other such payment determined by re-entry, death, or otherwise when the next entire portion of the same would have been payable if the same had not so determined, and not before," Section 4: "All persons and their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and also the executors, administrators, and assigns respectively of persons whose interests determine with their own deaths, shall have such or the same remedies at law and in equity for recovering such apportioned parts as aforesaid when payable (allowing proportionate parts of all just allowances) as they respectively would have had for recovering such entire portions as aforesaid if entitled thereto respectively . . ."

Now, it is said that the trustees have received the dividends within the meaning of those sections, so that they are liable to account to the legal personal representative of the tenant for life for a proportionate part. But in point of fact they were received by the purchaser, and it is admitted by the applicant that the stock having been sold with the dividend the legal personal representative has no rights against the purchaser. What the trustees have received is purchase money. The stock was sold cum dividend. This is not an actual dividend. These sections therefore do not apply directly, and therefore the legal personal representative is entitled to insist as against the trustees on an equity merely, which is what the Vice-Chancellor declined to enforce in the cases before him. The reasons given by him were, first, the absence of any practical scheme for giving effect to it, and, second, the great burden it would put on trust properties. The first applies here, and no case has been cited in which the effect has been so given. I have inquired as to the practice in the registrar's office, and I am informed by Mr. Lavie that no such practice is recognised in dealing with ordinary funds directed to be sold on the death of the tenant for life. As to the second reason, the burden is not so great as it would be on a change of investment, because, first, the alleged right would arise on re-investment and both as to the original investment and the re-investment, and, secondly, because a change of investment is different from the distribution of the trust fund. Still the burden would be considerable. If the legal personal representative were to receive so much of the purchase money as represents the value of the proportionate part of the dividend, it would mean that the dividend would have to be treated as if it were actually paid. This might in many cases entail considerable labour, and the evidence of stockbrokers and other experts would be necessary in order to ascertain the price at which the stock would be sold ex dividend, and the difference between that and the actual price would represent the dividend. It would become necessary to obtain and to preserve such evidence. And if, as in this case, the tenant for life were dead and had a legal personal representative, other difficulties might possibly arise. The consequence is that in many cases they would have to come to the court for protection. Again, in cases of companies payment would almost always be delayed or the amounts might not in certain circumstances be payable for a long time.

Looking at all these circumstances, I am not prepared to introduce any novel practice on the sale of shares consequent on the death of the tenant for life. It is, however, upon the whole clear that in some cases, such as those dealt with by the Vice-Chancellor, effect has been given to such a scheme under special circumstances—e.g., as in Lord Londesborough v. Somerville, and Bulkeley v. Stephens. I think here that it is a material circumstance that the trust is on the death of the tenant for life "to pay, transfer, and assign my ordinary residuary estate, and the stocks, funds, and securities upon which the same shall be invested unto and amongst" a particular class of beneficiaries. There is also a trust for sale, but that is varied by a power to retain in existing investments for so long as his trustees in their absolute discretion shall think fit.

But it occurs to me that the trust or power for sale is not exerciseable at the death of the tenant for life, but that the proper mode then for exercising the trust is to transfer in specie the stocks, funds, and securities to the beneficiaries. The Apportionment Act would have applied directly if that had been done on the death of the tenant for life, and the legal personal representative would have been entitled to a proportionate part. But it so happened in this case that the beneficiaries were very numerous, the estate being divided into ninety-thirds, and consequently the trust cannot be carried out in that way. If, however, it had been so carried out, the duty of the trustees was to transfer, so that the legal personal representative of the tenant for life should be able either directly or through the intervention of the trustees to obtain payment of the proportionate part of the dividend to which he is entitled.

Now, the order of the 12th of November, 1894, was made, and I doubt not properly made, for the sale and division of the proceeds of the estate. It was made in the interest and for the benefit of the persons who then became entitled to receive that estate. But it was made in the absence of the legal personal representative of Mrs. Lyne Stephens. If he had been present, it seems to me it would have been urged by him that her estate ought not to be placed in a worse position than if the trust had been carried out in the proper mode by transfer. That being so, I do not see why, as the estate is not finally wound up, he may not still assume the same right; and under these circumstances I have come to the conclusion that the application ought to be acceded to, assuming that the parties are all satisfied that the proper sum which would have been allowed on such an application is that which is mentioned in the summons.

Order accordingly.

K., a Rutlandshire farmer, contracted to sell milk to a dairy company whose premises were situate at Finchley-road, London, but not within the district of the C. metropolitan police court. K. consigned a churn of milk with a written warranty attached to the churn, at Oakham to the dairy company in the Finchley-road. The dairy company resold the churn of milk to a London hospital whose premises were situate within the district of the C. police court. An inspector of that district procured (under section 3 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1879) at the premises of the hospital, a sample of the milk, and obtained an analysis of it by the analyst of that district, who certified that it was adulterated with water. Proceedings were instituted by the inspector in the C. police court against K. for an offence under section 27 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, by reason of his having given a false warranty as to the milk.

Held, that the magistrate of the C. police court had no jurisdiction, as the offence alleged against K. had not been committed within the district of that court.

This was a rule nisi for a mandamus calling upon Horace Smith, Esquire, one of the metropolitan police magistrates, sitting at Clerkenwell Police Court, to show cause why he should not hear and determine the matter of two summonses taken out by Patrick Meruagh, an inspector of nuisances for the parish of St. Mary, Islington, against David Kerr, for giving a false warranty on the 14th and 26th of June, 1895, in respect of two churns of milk sold by him to the Manor Farm Dairy Co. (Limited), contrary to the provisions of section 27 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875.

The facts were these. The prosecutor on two occasions procured, under section 3 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act, 1879, samples for the purpose of analysis of milk in course of delivery by the Manor Farm Dairy Co. (Limited) to the Great Northern Central Hospital, at their premises in the Holloway-road, in the parish of St. Mary, Islington. The samples were taken at the premises of the hospital in the Clerkenwell police district, and the analyses were made by the analyst for that district. On analysis it was found that the two samples were adulterated with 5 per cent. and 14 per cent. respectively, of added water; and the analyst so certified.

Upon this certificate proceedings were instituted at the Clerkenwell Police Court, under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, against the Farm Dairy Co.

At the trial the company proved that the milk was as received by them at East Finchley-road Station from their vendor, Kerr, a farmer living at Oakham, Rutlandshire, who supplied it to them under a contract with a written warranty attached to each churn as to the purity of the milk. The magistrate (Mr. Bros) dismissed the summons against the Dairy company, and granted one against their vendor, Kerr, for selling milk with a false warranty, contrary to the provisions of section 27 of the Act of 1875, which provides that "every person who shall give a false warranty in writing to any purchaser in respect of an article of food, shall be guilty of an offence and be liable to a penalty." This summons came on for hearing before Horace Smith, Esquire, the sitting magistrate at Clerkenwell Police Court, on the 20th of July, and he refused to hear and determine the charge, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to do so, because (1) the warranty was attached to the churn at the farm in Rutlandshire, and the milk delivered by the farmer Kerr to the company at East Finchley-road Station, both being places out of the jurisdiction of that court; and (2) the person prosecuting was not a person competent to take out a summons under section 20 of the Act of 1875, which provides that "when the analyst, having analyzed any article, shall have given his certificate of the result, . . . the person causing the analysis to be made may take proceedings for the recovery of the penalty . . . before any justices having jurisdiction in the place where the article was actually delivered to the purchaser."

A rule nisi to compel the learned magistrate to hear and determine the matter having been obtained:

Toller, in showing cause against the rule being made absolute, submitted that the certificate of the analyst was no evidence against Kerr. To decide who was the "purchaser," sections 20 and 21 of the Act of 1875 must be read together.

He cited Reg. v. Titterton, 43 W. R. 603, [1895] 2 Q. B. 61, and Buckler v. Wilson, [1896] 1 Q. B. 83.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

HAWKINS, J., who, after stating the facts, said:—It is beyond doubt that, in fact, neither the sale nor warranty nor the delivery to the dairy company was made within the limits of the Clerkenwell Police Court's district, and it was not suggested that any sample was taken of the milk at the place or during the course of delivery to the dairy company. Unless some enactment can be found altering the general rule of law that an offence must be prosecuted before a tribunal having jurisdiction to entertain it within the county or place in which it has been committed, the magistrate at the Clerkenwell Police Court had no jurisdiction over it. It is said, however, that such an enactment is to be found in section 20 of the Act of 1875. We are not of that opinion.

Before I discuss that enactment I desire to point out one or two matters essential to be borne in mind—namely, the offence charged against the dairy company was of a totally different character from that preferred against Kerr; that against the dairy company was framed under section 6 of the Act of 1875 for selling to the prejudice of the hospital committee, milk which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchasers. Under the circumstances stated, no such offence could possibly be charged against Kerr, for he neither sold nor delivered any milk to the hospital committee. The information against Kerr was framed under section 27 of the same Act, for giving a false warranty in writing to his purchasers, the dairy company, in respect of the milk sold by him to them.

Let me now call attention to the words of section 20 of the Act of 1875: "When the analyst, having analyzed any article, shall have given his certificate of the result, from which it may appear that an offence against some one of the provisions of this Act"—I think this section must be read as if the words "or of section 3 of the Act of 1879" were inserted here—"has been committed, the person causing the analysis to be made may take proceedings for the recovery of the penalty herein imposed for such offence before any justices in petty sessions assembled having jurisdiction in the place where an article or drug sold was actually delivered to the purchasers"—I think that this part of the Act must be read as if the words "or the sample of milk was procured as mentioned in section 3 of the Act of 1879" were inserted here—"in a summary manner." It has been held that the certificate of the analyst is a condition precedent to a prosecution under this section (see Peart v. Barstow, 44 J. P. 699, and Smart v. Watts, 43 W. R. 379, [1895] 1 Q. B. 219), and it seems to me not open to question that the words "When the analyst, having analyzed any article," at the commencement of the section, must be interpreted to mean the official analyst appointed under section 10 as analyst of all food and drugs sold within the district for which he is appointed; and the inspector of nuisances appointed for any district or place can only require the analyst (if there be one) for that district, to analyze the suspected samples and give his certificate under section 13. We take it, therefore, that an inspector of nuisances could neither insist upon procuring a sample in a district for which he is not appointed, nor could an analyst not appointed to act for such district give any valid and effectual certificate of the result of his analysis under section 13. Section 18, which, with reference to the schedule to the Act, prescribes the form of the certificate, evidently contemplates an analysis by the local analyst, of the article analyzed as it is at the time it is delivered to him. Then comes section 20, the section under discussion, and, immediately following it, section 21, which enacts that at the hearing of the information in such proceeding (i.e., the proceedings mentioned in section 20) the production of the certificate of the analysis shall be sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated, unless the defendant shall require that the analyst shall be called as a witness.

All these provisions point, in our opinion, to the intention of the Legislature to provide local inspectors with power to obtain by local analysts analyses of questionable samples of articles of food or drugs sold within their districts, and to provide for the prosecution of offenders against the Act before justices of the peace having jurisdiction in the place where adulterated articles are actually delivered to the purchasers; but it never could have been in the contemplation of the Legislature to give justices jurisdiction to deal with persons offending against the Acts in other parts of the United Kingdom out of their jurisdiction. There are certainly no words expressive of such an intention to be found in section 20 or in any other section of the Acts either of 1875 or 1879. In this case no act tending to establish a violation by Kerr of the statutes I have discussed occurred within the jurisdiction of the Clerkenwell Police Court. The warranty was made at Oakham, the delivery by Kerr to the dairy company at Finchley. There was no sample of the milk taken by any inspector in the course of its delivery to the dairy company, and therefore there could be no such sample to analyze, and, even had there been, no analysis was made by any analyst appointed for the district of Finchley, and the analysis of a sample taken after the milk had been actually delivered to and received by the dairy company in a district where Kerr never had any control over the milk, and of which he had no knowledge, could not affect him, and the certificate given as the result of the analysis of such a sample could not, in our opinion, be any evidence as against Kerr. Moreover, though the certificate may have been evidence as against the dairy company that the sample taken at St. Mary's, Islington, while in the course of delivery by them to the hospital was adulterated, there was nothing on it from which it appeared that the offence of giving a false warranty was committed by the defendant Kerr at Oakham or anywhere else.

Under all the circumstances, we are at a loss to see any ground for the contention that the Clerkenwell magistrate had any jurisdiction over the charge against Kerr. It is only for such offence as appears by the certificate that any prosecution can be instituted under section 20. The rule, therefore, must be discharged.

I wish before concluding to observe, with regard to the form of the certificate, that the analyst's duty is merely to analyze and report the result of the analysis, and he has no right, as I think, to report extraneous facts unconnected with the analysis, and if he does so his certificate would, in my judgment, be inadmissible as evidence of such facts. In so far as it states in due form the result of the analysis the certificate is sufficient for the justices to act upon, unless the defendant requires the analyst to be called as a witness, or unless other evidence is adduced before the justices which induces them to come to the conclusion that it is incorrect. The expression used by me in my judgment in Fortune v. Harson, ante, p. 431, [1896] 1 Q. B. 205, that the certificate is "practically conclusive" was intended only to convey the impression I entertained that in the vast majority of cases brought before justices no other evidence was offered of the impurity of the article, and to point out the great importance of insisting upon its containing all the material details of the analysis to enable the justices themselves to form a judgment on the question before them. Had I intended to do more I should have qualified my expression by what I have now stated.

Rule discharged.

Landlord and tenant — Compensation — Allotments — Cottage garden—Holding used by seedsman for trade purposes—Allotments and Cottage Gardens Compensation for Crops Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 26), ss. 4, 5.

A plot of land occupied by a seedsman and used by him for the business of a seedsman is not an allotment or holding within the meaning of section 4 of 50 & 51 Vict. c. 26, and the occupier is not entitled to compensation under section 5. The Act only applies to poor persons who cultivate their gardens for food or pleasure.

Case stated.

This was an appeal on a case stated from a decision of the justices for the borough of Bedford.

At a petty sessions held at Bedford on the 6th of May, 1895, an application was made by the appellant, G. Cooper, against Mary Pearse, the respondent, under the provisions of the Allotments and Cottage Gardens Compensation for Crops Act, 1887, for the appointment of an arbitrator in respect of a claim which he had made for compensation in respect of crops growing upon land which he held of the respondent as tenant, the tenancy of which expired on the 25th of March, 1895, and for labour expended upon and for manure applied to the holding since the taking of the last crop therefrom.

The following are the facts as found in the case stated.

The appellant was a seed merchant, carrying on business in the borongh of Bedford, and up to the 25th of March, 1895, was tenant of some land, being less than an acre in extent, of which the respondent was the owner. The tenancy expired by notice to quit on that date. In the agreement between the parties the land let by the respondent to the appellant was described as "garden land," and the tenancy was stated to be "from half-year to half-year, commencing on the 29th of September, 1893." The land was occupied by the tenant as a garden. At the expiration of the tenancy there was a quantity of flower roots, vegetables, and bulbs upon the ground. Since taking the last crop the appellant had expended certain labour upon and applied certain manure to the land.

The claim was for £159 2s. 9d., and the particulars showed that the crops consisted principally of narcissus bulbs and crocus bulbs, there being also some vegetables. The bulbs were grown by the appellant for sale. They were put in in the autumn of 1893, and would not be fit to take up until July, 1895.

The magistrates refused the application. They were of opinion that the holding was not an allotment within the meaning of the Act, on the ground that the appellant did not cultivate it as a garden, but used it for trade purposes. They further held that the bulbs for which compensation was claimed were not crops grown in the ordinary course of cultivation, on the ground that they were not an ordinary crop grown in the neighbourhood.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Was the holding in law a holding within the Act of 1887? (2) Could the bulbs claimed for be held in law, under the circumstances, to be crops growing on the holding in the ordinary course of cultivation within the meaning of section 5 of the said Act?

By section 4 it is provided that "'allotment' means any parcel of land of not more than two acres in extent held by a tenant under a landlord and cultivated as a garden or as a farm, or partly as a garden and partly as a farm. 'Cottage garden' means an allotment attached to a cottage. 'Holding' means an allotment or cottage garden."

Section 5 provides as follows: "Upon the determination of the tenancy of a holding after the commencement of this Act the tenant shall be entitled, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, to obtain from the landlord compensation in money for the following matters and things, that is to say—(a) for crops, including fruit, growing upon the holding in the ordinary course of cultivation. . . . (b) for labour expended upon and for manure applied to the holding since the taking of the last crop therefrom in anticipation of a future crop."

W. Mackenzie, for the appellant.—This is an allotment within the meaning of the Act, and the bulbs are crops grown upon the holding in the ordinary course of cultivation within the meaning of section 5. Crops are not confined to fruit and flowers: Hood v. Kendall, 4 W. R. 123, 17 C. B. 260. "Crops growing in the ordinary course of cultivation" means grown in the usual manner. If grown under glass the tenant would not be entitled to compensation.

Reginald Brown, for the respondent.—This is the first case arising under the Allotments Act of 1887. This plot of land is not a garden within the Act. The Act was intended to apply to small cottagers, and not to a nurseryman or seedsman. A "cottage garden" is a garden used by a cottager for growing vegetables, &c., for his own use, and not for the market. The land in this case is used as a nursery ground or market garden as defined by section 6 of the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 27). A garden is a plot, either attached or not to a cottage, and used for personal use. A garden is defined by Latham as a "piece of ground enclosed and cultivated for herbs or fruits for food, or laid out for pleasure." These bulbs are not "crops." The Act was never intended to apply to bulbs in the ground. A crop is something which can be cut or gathered off a tree or plant.

Mackenzie, in reply.—This land is not the less a garden within the Act because the produce is cultivated for market: Meux v. Cobley, [1892] 2 Ch. 253, 40 W. R. Dig. 111.

LAWRANCE, J.—In this case there are two questions raised for us to decide. Firstly, whether the holding was in law a holding within the Act of 1887; and, secondly, whether the bulbs claimed for can be held to be crops growing on the holding in the ordinary course of cultivation within the meaning of section 5 of that Act. It seems to me that it is only necessary for us to deal with the first question, and that we need not decide as to whether the bulbs come within section 5. The Act of 1887 provides compensation to the occupiers of allotments and cottage gardens for crops left in the ground at the end of their tenancies. By section 4 "allotment" is defined as a parcel of land of not more than two acres in extent held by a tenant under a landlord and cultivated as a garden or as a farm, or partly as a garden and partly as a farm. "Cottage garden" means an allotment attached to a cottage, and "holding" means an allotment or cottage garden. Section 5 provides that upon the determination of the tenancy of a holding the tenant shall be entitled to compensation "for crops, including fruit, growing upon the holding in the ordinary course of cultivation, and for fruit trees and fruit bushes growing thereon, which have been planted by the tenant." The facts as found in the stated case show that Cooper, the appellant, was a seed merchant, and was tenant of some garden land of less than one acre in extent, but it appears that he did not cultivate this piece of land in the ordinary sense of a garden. A garden is a place where flowers or fruit are grown for food or pleasure. The appellant, however, did not occupy this plot of land for that purpose, but as a place of business. I am therefore of opinion that this is not an allotment within the meaning of the Act, and the appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. "Allotment" means land of not more than two acres in extent cultivated as a garden or as a farm, and a cottage garden is an allotment attached to a cottage, and a holding is an allotment or a cottage garden, therefore we see that this Act deals with cottage gardens. It deals with a small class of persons, small cottagers, who may have the benefit of the Act although the plots of land they hold may not be attached to the cottage they occupy. Section 5 of the Act says that the tenant of a "holding" shall be entitled to obtain compensation from his landlord upon the determination of his tenancy for crops, including fruit, growing upon his holding in the ordinary course of cultivation. A "garden" means a place where flowers or fruit are grown for pleasure. The facts found show that Cooper did not occupy this piece of ground in that sense, but that he used it for the purpose of carrying on the business of a seedsman. I think that if the land is used for the cultivation of seeds or similar purposes it does not come within the Act. The Act was intended only to provide compensation to the class of poor persons who cultivate their gardens for food or pleasure. It is therefore not necessary for us to decide the other question as to whether the bulbs are a crop growing upon the holding within the meaning of the Act. This appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div.
Vaughan Williams, J. } Feb. 3, 11, 17.

In re GRAYDON.
Ex parte THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—After-acquired property—Personal earnings—Estoppel by record of county court—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 44, 53.

A bankrupt is only entitled to retain so much of his personal earnings as are reasonably necessary for the maintenance of himself and his family, the remainder passes to his trustee.

The decision of a county court upon an issue between the bankrupt and the trustee, that certain weekly payments due to the bankrupt under an agreement are in the nature of personal earnings, estops the trustee from subsequently arguing in the High Court, when further weekly payments become due under the same agreement, that they are not in the nature of personal earnings.

Motion by the official receiver, as trustee in the bankruptcy, for a declaration that he was entitled to certain money payable to the bankrupt by the Great Wheel Co. (Limited).

A receiving order was made against Graydon in August, 1892.

In September, 1893, he obtained a patent for the construction of great wheels, and upon the 14th of April, 1894, he entered into a written agreement with the company, by which he granted them a licence to construct a great wheel at the Earl's Court Exhibition in consideration of their paying him a sum of £10 per week for so long as the great wheel should be open to the public.

Upon the 17th of April, 1894, the official receiver gave notice to the company of his claim to any money payable by them to the bankrupt, and in March, 1895, he gave a similar notice to the bankrupt's solicitor.

Upon the 20th of March, 1895, the bankrupt gave a charge upon these payments to his solicitor to secure his costs, including the costs of obtaining the patent.

When the first two instalments became due the official receiver brought an action for that amount (£20) against the company.

The company interpleaded, and the issue was remitted to the Brompton County Court, where the judge decided that the £20 in question was in the nature of personal earnings, and did not pass to the official receiver.

He refused leave to appeal, observing that the sum of £20 was not more than was reasonably necessary for the maintenance of the bankrupt.

The official receiver thereupon waited until £80 became payable to the bankrupt, when he launched the present motion.

Herbert Reed, Q.C. (Muir Mackenzie with him), for the official receiver, stated the facts, and was stopped by the court.

J. G. Butcher, for the bankrupt.—These payments are in the nature of personal earnings, and the official receiver is estopped from arguing that they are not personal earnings by the decision of the county court judge: Flitters v. Allfrey, 23 W. R. 442, L. R. 10 C. P. 29. Further, the bankrupt's solicitor has a valid charge upon them. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—It is conceded that if the official receiver takes the benefit of this contract he must pay the charges of making the contract, and also of obtaining and keeping up the patent.]

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, on the point of estoppel.—If there is any estoppel here it must be estoppel by record, and all that appears upon the record of the county court is that the right to a sum of £20 was in issue. The court was only competent to decide the rights of the parties so far as they were before it, that was the right to the £20. Generally, estoppels apply only to the past and not to the future. At the time of the decision in the county court these earnings now in question were future, and no estoppel avails.

J. G. Butcher replied on the point of estoppel, and further argued that these earnings were personal, because they were the product of the brain and skill of the bankrupt.

Reed, Q.C., and Mackenzie were not called upon to argue on the point of personal earnings.

Hansell, for the company, took no part in the argument.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 17.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., delivered the following written judgment.—The question in this case is whether the trustee is entitled to a declaration that he is entitled to certain payments in the nature of royalties for a licence to use a patented article; that is to say, a great wheel, for the carriage of passengers erected at the Earl's Court Exhibition, under letters patent taken out by the bankrupt since the making of the receiving order, and payable to the bankrupt under an agreement also made since the date of the receiving order between him and the Great Wheel Co. (Limited).

The bankrupt says that the trustee is not entitled to this declaration: first, because the sums payable are in the nature of personal earnings, and as such do not pass to the trustee; secondly, the bankrupt says that in prior litigation between him and the trustee—viz., on the trial of an interpleader issue remitted from the High Court to the county court—it was decided that the sums thus payable to the bankrupt were in the nature of personal earnings, and did not pass to the trustee, and that the trustee is estopped by that decision from asserting the contrary.

I will deal first with the point of estoppel. In my judgment, if this question was in issue between the bankrupt and the trustee in the county court, and was decided between the parties, the trustee would be estopped by the decision; but I do not think that it is proved that the point was in issue in the county court. The sum of money as to which the interpleader issue was raised was a sum of £20, two early instalments of the sums payable to the bankrupt.

Now, it seems to me on the authorities that it is not true to say that no personal earnings of the bankrupt after his bankruptcy pass to the trustee. The authorities are not very clear, but I think on the balance of the authorities (see Wadling v. Oliphant, 24 W. R. 246, 1 Q. B. D. 145, and the cases there cited) that it is only the personal earnings reasonably necessary for the maintenance of the bankrupt and his family which do not pass to the trustee. This is in accordance with the principles which underlie section 53 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, with regard to the appropriation of a portion of salary.

Now, this being so, it seems to me that the county court judge did not decide anything more than that the £20 then in question was not more than was necessary for the reasonable maintenance of the bankrupt—that is to say, that, even assuming the county court judge to have decided that the sums payable were in the nature of personal earnings, no estoppel arises as to the quantum of future earnings necessary for the maintenance of the bankrupt. That the decision of the county court judge was given in reference only to the amount in issue seems to me the fair inference from his observations when asked for leave to appeal. I also think that the fair inference from his judgment is that he did decide that the sums in question were in the nature of personal earnings, and that the trustee is estopped from denying this to be the nature of the payments when made. I shall not, therefore, go into this question, but merely consider the question of quantum.

I think that £5 per week is a fitting sum for the bankrupt to retain as a reasonable maintenance for himself and family.

There must, however, be first deducted from the sums payable the amounts due to Mr. Kimber for costs of creation of the fund. Then will come the bankrupt's £5, and the residue will pass to the trustee. The charge of Mr. Kimber for his general costs seems to me to be a charge given after the trustee had intervened and after Mr. Kimber had knowledge of his intervention; but, as I said in the course of the argument, Mr. Kimber shall have an inquiry in chambers as to this if he chooses.

I think the bankrupt ought to have the costs of this motion out of the fund, as the trustee asked for more than he was entitled to.

Bankruptcy—Protected transaction—Mortgage of chose in action—Notice of act of bankruptcy—Order and disposition—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 44, 49.

The bankrupt had assigned a debt coming due to him to secure an advance of £30 in October, 1890. The mortgagee failed to give notice of this assignment. In June, 1892, after an act of bankruptcy, but without notice thereof, the mortgagee advanced a further sum to the bankrupt and took a fresh assignment of the same debt to cover both the loans of 1890 and 1892. Of this assignment the mortgagee gave due notice.

Held, that the notice given of the second assignment was equivalent to a taking possession of the subject matter thereof, and, coupled with the deed of June, 1892, was a dealing for valuable consideration and protected by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that the mortgagee having taken possession by this notice could then set up both the deeds of 1890 and 1892.

Motion by the Furness Finance Co. (Limited) for a declaration that the company was entitled, as against the trustee in the bankruptcy, to the sum of £74 13s. 6d., part of certain money received by the trustee from the War Office for work done by the bankrupt.

On October 29, 1890, the bankrupt borrowed £30 from the company, and by way of security gave them an assignment charging any money he should receive from the War Office in payment for certain work he was then carrying out. The company never gave notice of this assignment to the War Office.

The bankrupt continued to obtain further advances from the company, and on May 31, 1892, he owed them £59 13s. 6d., for which they obtained judgment. The bankrupt did not satisfy the judgment, but, upon June 16, 1892, he obtained a further loan of £15, and executed a fresh assignment charging the money due to him from the War Office with the repayment of the total sum of £74 13s. 6d. due from him to the company. The company gave notice of this assignment to the War Office, and received a letter acknowledging receipt of the notice, but stating that the Department paid no attention to assignments.

Prior to this assignment, on the 20th of May, 1892, a petition had been presented against the bankrupt, founded upon an act of bankruptcy committed on the 19th of May. The hearing of the petition was adjourned several times, but a receiving order was eventually made upon it on the 11th of August. In the bankrupt's statement of affairs he returned the company as unsecured creditors for £35. The company wrote on the 5th of November, 1892, and informed the trustee that they held the assignment of the 16th of June, and on the 10th of January, 1893, the company's solicitor called upon the trustee, who refused to admit their claim, on the ground that the assignment had been taken with notice of an act of bankruptcy. The trustee proceeded to get in the money from the War Office, and incurred considerable expense in obtaining it. He received it from the War Office on the 27th of December, 1893, and gave notice to the company that he had received it on the 29th of December. This letter miscarried, and it was not until the trustee made out his statement of accounts on applying for his release in 1895 that the company became aware that the money had ever been obtained from the War Office. The whole estate only realized about £183, all of which went in trustee's costs and remuneration.

Upon the hearing of the motion, evidence was taken as to whether, in fact, the company had notice of an act of bankruptcy at the time when they took the assignment of the 16th of June, 1892.

Muir Mackenzie, for the company.—On the evidence the company had no notice of an act of bankruptcy when they took the assignment of the 16th of June, 1892. Further, their notice to the War Office was equivalent to taking possession, and took the debt out of the order and disposition of the bankrupt: Re Styan, 2 Mont. D. & D. 219; Re Wright, 24 W. R. 977, 3 Ch. D. 70; Graham v. Furber, 2 W. R. 39, 14 C. B. 134.

Carrington, for the trustee.—Even if the company had no notice of the act of bankruptcy, they are not protected as to the £30 assigned by the deed of the 29th of October, 1890. The company never gave notice of that assignment to the War Office, therefore the chose in action assigned by it was in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner upon the 19th of May, 1892, the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy. From that date onwards it was the property of the trustee, and the bankrupt could not assign it to anyone by the deed of the 16th of June, for he had lost all property in it at that date: Smale v. Burr, 21 W. R. 193, L. R. 8 C. P. 64; Ramsden v. Lupton, 22 W. R. 129, L. R. 9 Q. B. 17; Cooper v. Zeffert, 32 W. R. 402.

Muir Mackenzie replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This is a difficult case, both on the facts and on the law. On the facts I am of opinion that the company had not notice of any act of bankruptcy when they took the assignment.

As to the law, that, to my mind, is accurately stated by Maule, J., in Graham v. Furber, where he says: "It was the intention of the Legislature by this statute to relieve such a person, and to place him in as good a position where he got back his goods before notice of an act of bankruptcy as if he got them back before the commission of an act of bankruptcy. When he got his goods back they were taken to have been got back before an act of bankruptcy, if got back without notice of an act of bankruptcy." I think the law as stated is perfectly right. If a person, by a dealing which is a protected transaction under section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, takes possession of goods, the doctrine of relation back ceases to have any application, and the creditor must be treated as getting possession before an act of bankruptcy is committed; or, in other words, as if no act of bankruptcy had been committed. That being so, the subject matter of the assignment is immaterial. It makes no difference whether the subject matter is goods or choses in action. Then what is the position of the trustee in bankruptcy here? He says the whole debt was assigned by the deed of October, 1890, and all that was left was an equity of redemption, and that the assignment of the 16th of June, 1892, was only a dealing with the equity of redemption; and that the second deed was not intended to cancel, and did not cancel, the first deed, and that you must treat them as both standing together; and he relies on Cooper v. Zeffert. Assume that to be so without deciding it absolutely—namely, that the second deed was not intended as a cancellation of the first deed if the second should go to the wall—what does it come to? He says that as the notice here was a notice under the second deed it only operates on the equity of redemption—that is, is only good for the amount actually advanced on the second deed. But if the notice is, as I hold, a taking possession of the fund, then the fact of taking possession, even under a wrong title, does take the fund out of the order and disposition of the bankrupt. It does determine the possession of the bankrupt.

But it is said that if the claim is made under the wrong contract the notice is not a dealing or transaction for valuable consideration within the meaning of section 49 of the Act. I do not agree to that. In my judgment a claim for valuable consideration means a claim under which consideration moved from the bankrupt—that is, a claim not based on a mere gift by the bankrupt. If that is so, here the true owner was relying on a claim based on valuable consideration, and that not the less so because in his notice he mentioned the wrong assignment. Under the circumstances I think this book debt was not in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, and that the company are entitled to be paid out of the moneys received from the War Office the sums actually due to them under both their deeds; but they must recoup the trustee the expenses which he has incurred in recovering the amount, which under the circumstances are not to be limited to mere law costs. He must have a reasonable allowance for his time and work; and if by the delay he has been placed in a worse position than he would have been if the claim had been made earlier, he must not suffer by it, but must be allowed as against the company any payments properly made out of the estate since December, 1893.

UNIVERSAL STOCK EXCHANGE v. STRACHAN. (a.)

Gaming—Stock Exchange—Transactions in stocks and shares—Deposit of securities as cover—Right to recover securities—Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 18.

On certain written terms, which amounted to speculation in differences, S. opened an account and deposited with the appellants, who were outside brokers, certain securities as cover for any balance which might be found due to them. The result was a loss to S. above the value of the securities. In an action by S. to recover his securities the jury found on what was considered sufficient evidence that the transactions between the parties were gaming transactions.

Held, that the deposit was not made "to bide the event" of a wager, but as security against a debt which might arise from a gambling transaction, and therefore not within the 18th section of the Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), and consequently the securities might be recovered.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.) dated the 23rd of May, 1895 (43 W. R. 611, [1895] 2 Q. B. 329).

The action was brought by the present respondent to recover certain securities, valued at £2,500, which he had deposited with the appellants as security or cover in respect of transactions in stocks and shares.

In September, 1893, the respondent opened an account with the appellants, who were dealers in stocks and shares, not being members of the Stock Exchange, and the total transactions in a few months amounted to £3,500,000. The appellants dealt with their customers, including the respondent, on certain printed "terms of business." These were signed by the respondent, and contained, among others, the following:—

"2. Every purchase or sale contracted by the company is a bonâ fide transaction for delivery on a specified settling day, and the company is always prepared, and by means of its capital able, to deliver or take up any stock it may at any time have bought or sold, and the contracts entered into by the company are not contracts of gaming or wagering. All bargains are to be completed on the settling day named in the contract; but any customer willing to postpone completion of a purchase or sale may arrange with the company (upon terms) for postponement of completion until a future date (carry over), but the company, being always prepared to complete on the settling day originally fixed, may decline to postpone completion at its option.

"3. The company charges no commission or fees of any kind, but charges a fixed rate of interest of 5 per cent. per annum on the purchase money of all stocks, computed from the day of purchase until completion. The buyer to receive from the seller all dividends falling due while the account is ensuing, and the buyer paying all expenses of transfer of stocks.

"6. The completion of all purchases and sales shall take place at the company's office at noon on the day specified in the contract or otherwise as may be mutually agreed upon. . . .

"8. The company shall have a lien, until the account is closed and properly settled, upon all the stocks, shares, moneys, or other valuables in its possession belonging to customers for the due performance of any contract or engagement which they may have entered into."

It was found at the trial that no stocks or shares ever were or were ever intended to be, delivered. In April, 1894, the appellants telegraphed to the respondent that unless he deposited further cover the account would be closed, and the appellants, before the usual account day, closed the account, when it appeared that a balance was due to the appellants of larger amount than the securities in their hands, which they now sought to retain.

This action was accordingly brought for their recovery, and at the trial the jury found that the transactions were gaming transactions, and Cave, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff (the present respondent).

The appellants, the defendants in the action, moved to set aside the verdict and judgment, and to enter judgment for the appellants, on the grounds that there was no evidence to go to the jury and that the judge misdirected the jury; or for a new trial.

The Court of Appeal dismissed the application (see 43 W. R. 611, [1895] 2 Q. B. 329).

From this decision the appellants now appealed.

Section 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, c. 109, is as follows: "All contracts or agreements, whether by parol or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void; and no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made. . . ."

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., and E. H. Pollard, for the appellants.—There being no sale and no purchase makes no difference to these transactions. The terms are stated, and are like ordinary bargains between broker and jobber. Either party was entitled to require actual delivery: Universal Stock Exchange v. Stevens, 40 W. R. 494; Lowenfeld v. Howat, 19 Court of Sess. Cas., 4th series, 128; Shaw v. Caledonian Railway, 17 Court of Sess. Cas., 4th series, 467; Thacker v. Hardy, 27 W. R. 158, 4 Q. B. D. 685; Forget v. Ostigny, 43 W. R. 590, [1895] A. C. 318. If these were gambling transactions, the plaintiff is precluded by section 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, from bringing the action, as the securities were deposited to abide the event of a wager. The plaintiff had not revoked the authority given, and this must be done before action brought, the bringing of which is not sufficient revocation: Grizewood v. Blane, 11 C. B. 538; Manning v. Purcell, 3 W. R. 273, 7 De G. M. & G. 55; Hampden v. Walsh, 24 W. R. 607, 1 Q. B. D. 189.

Bigham, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the respondent, were not called upon.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—This case comes before your lordships under circumstances which render it unnecessary to deal with it very elaborately or as if it established any very important principle of law. The question of law intended to be argued originally was whether Cave, J., misdirected the jury. I have been looking with care to see what Cave, J., said on the subject, and I find that in summing up to the jury he said this: "Now, I have no doubt that most, if not all, of you are perfectly familiar with transactions on the Stock Exchange; but I may make use of that as an illustration of my meaning. A man goes to a broker and directs him to buy and sell so much stock, as the case may be. That may be, in the eye of the purchaser, a gambling transaction, or it may not; if he means to invest his money in the purchase of the stock which he orders to be bought, that undoubtedly is a perfectly legitimate and real business transaction. If he does not mean to take up his stock, if he means to sell again before the settling day arrives, that may be a gambling transaction so far as he is concerned, but it is not necessarily a gambling transaction so far as the broker is concerned; and in order to be a gambling transaction such as the law points at it must be a gambling transaction in the intention of both the parties to it." I am wholly unable to understand, after that direction to the jury, what possible misdirection could have been suggested. That was a most accurate direction to the jury of what they were to find upon the facts before them; and although there is a direction at the close of his summing-up to the jury which I think it is possible might have been objected to on the other side as being too favourable to the appellants, yet, so far as the appellants are concerned, it appears to me that it is impossible to say that the learned judge did not put before the jury the true question which they had to determine.

Therefore the case resolves itself into an entirely different question, the only question of law I need refer to—namely, whether or not there was any evidence to go to the jury. I cannot doubt that there was a very considerable amount of evidence to go to the jury, and I agree with the courts below in saying that one does not adequately discuss that question by taking each part of the case by itself and dissecting the case, and disposing of this or that piece of the evidence as if it were to be looked at alone. The whole transaction has to be looked at, and the whole nature of this institution, whatever it is. Speaking upon the evidence before us, it appears to me as if it were a concern expressly designed for the purpose of enabling people to gamble in such a way as to evade the provisions of the law. It may or may not be that—I do not undertake to say whether it is or not, it is not before us at the moment—but I am saying now, as justifying the finding of the jury, that that is what it seems to me to be, looking at the whole nature of the agreement. When I say the agreement, I mean the "terms of business" which they call upon a customer to sign, which is to constitute the contractual relation between the parties. I will not rely too much upon the circumstances of suspicion in it—namely, that they say that it is not to be a gambling transaction, but that it is to be a real bonâ fide transaction. When I look at the terms themselves, the whole scheme appears to me to be intended, with great ingenuity, to pretend that there is to be a real transaction, and yet there is to be a payment in respect of the relations between the parties which is only reconcilable, in my mind, with its being an unreal transaction. The appellants are to get 5 per cent. Each of the counsel in turn has been asked what that was for, inasmuch as it was admitted that there was no purchase and no sale. In all these transactions not one single purchase or sale is proved to have existed, and I gather that it was practically admitted that there was not to be any real purchase during the whole period in which this business was carried on. It would have been very important and very relevant evidence if a witness could have said: "On such and such an occasion I was asked to buy Brighton 'A's' to such an extent, and went and entered into a contract to do it"; but by the answers to the interrogatories, as I gather from one of the judgments, though they have not been read here to-day, and by the whole course of the argument, it was practically admitted that there was not to be, and was not in fact, any real purchase in any case. If the real meaning of the parties is this, that there is to be only a payment of differences, what is it but a gaming and wagering transaction between the two as to what shall be the payment on the one side or on the other? If I were on the jury, I should come to that conclusion; but I am not under the necessity of trying this question as if I were upon the jury, because the jury have found that it was a gambling transaction, and upon evidence which seems to me extremely satisfactory.

The only question for your lordships is whether there was evidence to go to the jury, because, under the circumstances of this case, it would be idle to contend that if there was evidence to go to the jury this is a case in which your lordships would say that it should be tried again by another jury. I am satisfied, as far as I am concerned, that the jury were right, and that there was ample evidence to go to them which would justify them in the conclusion at which they arrived. Under those circumstances, as there was no misdirection, and as the case was properly submitted to the jury, and as the jury have so found, it seems to me to be impossible to contend that the appellants should succeed in this case. I am therefore of opinion, and I move your lordships, that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Lord HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. So long as the finding of the jury that it was a gambling transaction stands, it is impossible for the appellants to object to the judgment against them which has been pronounced. They say that that finding ought not to stand; that either there ought to be a new trial because the learned judge misdirected the jury, or the verdict was against the weight of evidence, or that the verdict ought to be entered for them because there was no evidence to go to the jury in support of the respondent's case. As to misdirection I can see none. The learned judge appears to have laid down the law certainly not too favourably for the respondent. With regard to the verdict being against the weight of evidence, the learned judge who tried the question and the Court of Appeal have been satisfied with the verdict of the jury, and under those circumstances it would need a very overwhelming case to induce your lordships to interfere. So far from there being any such case, the verdict is one with which, in my opinion, no complaint can properly be made.

It remains to consider whether there was evidence to go to the jury. The case on behalf of the appellants is this: that when you look at the documents which contain the contract between the parties, you see that these were not upon the face of them gaming contracts, but, on the contrary, were shewn on the face of them not to be gaming contracts—that there was no evidence of anything passing between the parties to the effect that the real transaction should not be such as the documents represented, and, consequently, that there would be no evidence to go to the jury. I cannot accept that view. I think the character of the documents themselves, coupled with the nature of the transactions entered into, the position of the parties who entered into them, and other circumstances which I need not detail, raised a question for the jury whether these were real transactions of commerce, or whether they were a mere gambling for differences. I think it is impossible to say that there was no evidence to go to the jury upon the point.

It has been said that wherever a contract is entered into between two parties containing any obligation under any circumstances to cause property in goods to pass from one to another, whatever else there may be in the contract, and although neither of the parties contemplated that that provision should ever become operative, yet, if it ever may become operative, it cannot be a contract by way of gaming and wagering. I should require much consideration before I could assent to such a proposition as that. It would amount to this: that parties who intended to gamble with one another, but wanted to have the security against one another of being able in a court of justice to recover their bets, could compel a court of justice to adjudicate and secure to them their bets by a judgment, if only they inserted in their contract a provision which might in certain events become operative and compel the goods to be delivered and received, although neither of them anticipated such a contingency; the purpose of the insertion of such a provision, though inserted by way of creating an obligation, being only to cloak the fact that it was a gambling transaction that they were entering into, and that being done merely to enable the law to be evaded, and to enable them to sue one another for gambling debts. The proposition contended for by the learned counsel for the appellants would really lead to that result, and I need hardly say one would require to consider it for a long time before giving one's assent to a proposition involving such consequences.

I ought to observe upon one other point, though probably it was sufficiently disposed of in the course of the argument. It is said that, although it may not be a gambling contract, yet, nevertheless, the very provisions of the sections against gaming and wagering prevent the respondent recovering the security which he deposited with the appellants, inasmuch as it is an "article of value" deposited with them to "abide the event" of a wager. That seems to me not to be the case. It was deposited as security against a debt which might arise from a gambling transaction. What the appellants are really seeking is to avail themselves of that security by virtue of a void contract; and it is impossible to say that that was an "article of value" deposited with the defendants to abide the event of a wager. That was not really the nature of the transaction at all.

Lord MACNAGHTEN and Lord MORRIS concurred.

NOURSE v. LIVERPOOL SAILING-SHIP OWNERS' MUTUAL PROTECTION AND INDEMNITY ASSOCIATION. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Policy on ship—Life salvage—Liability of underwriter—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 544.

Life salvage is not a loss for which under a Lloyd's policy on ship in the usual form an underwriter is liable.

Appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the owner of the sailing ship Arno, to recover from the defendant association a sum of money paid by the plaintiff for life salvage, and the costs of salvage proceedings.

The plaintiff entered the Arno in "Class I.—Protection," of the defendant association.

Article 13 of the defendants' articles of association provided (inter alia) as follows: "Class I.—Protection (available for all ships). The following risks are covered in this class: Loss of life or personal injury, howsoever and to whomsoever the same may be caused, and life salvage. . . . Costs and charges which a member may become liable to pay in respect of any of the above-mentioned risks."

Article 18 provided as follows: "No contribution or payment shall be made in respect of any loss which is capable of being insured against by the usual form of Lloyd's policy with the running-down clause attached, or in respect of which there exists a right to recover under any policy which may have been entered into; and in estimating and adjusting the claim of any member he shall be deemed to have effected such policy, and to be entitled to recover under the same."

On the 31st of March, 1895, the Arno was, in consequence of perils of the sea, in a position of danger in the mid-Atlantic, and on that day the master and crew of the Arno were rescued from her by the steamship Normannia. The circumstances were such as to justify the master and crew in abandoning the Arno. No attempt was made by those on board the Normannia to save the ship herself. On the 3rd of April the Arno was picked up by the steamship Merrimac, and was brought to Liverpool. On the 25th of April proceedings in rem were commenced by the life salvors against the Arno, and ultimately the Admiralty Court awarded the sum of £1,020 to the owner, master, and crew of the Normannia for life salvage. The present plaintiff paid the sum of £438, the proportion due from the ship in respect of the award, and £39 4s. 6d. costs, and also incurred a liability of £88 8s. 4d. in defending the salvage proceedings.

The plaintiff sought in this action to recover the loss so incurred by him from the defendants. The defendants denied their liability, on the ground that the loss was capable of being insured against by the usual form of Lloyd's policy within the meaning of article 18 of their articles of association.

Mathew, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Carver, for the defendants.—A Lloyd's policy in the usual form covers life salvage, though the instances in which life salvage pure and simple has been recovered from an underwriter may be very rare. Ordinary salvage has always been held to be a loss which falls on the underwriter; and the practice of underwriters to pay it is invariable. The reason why it is payable under a policy on ship is given in Aitchison v. Lohre, 28 W. R. 1, 4 App. Cas. 755. It is payable not under the suing and labouring clause, but as a loss on the ship brought about by perils of the sea. Life salvage is recoverable for the same reason. Before the year 1846 life salvage pure and simple was never awarded (see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 99, s. 19). The statute law now makes life salvage a loss on ship. Section 544 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, says that "where services are rendered wholly or in part within British waters in saving life from any British or foreign vessel, or elsewhere in saving life from any British vessel, there shall be payable to the salvor by the owner of the vessel, cargo, or apparel saved, a reasonable amount of salvage, to be determined in case of dispute in manner hereinafter mentioned." Section 552 provides for the detention of the ship in the case of life salvage. And section 565 confers on the High Court jurisdiction to decide upon all claims whatsoever relating to salvage. Life salvage is now treated in exactly the same manner as other kinds of salvage, and the law makes it a loss on ship, for it is a payment which must be satisfied in order to get possession of the ship. It is therefore a loss which is covered by a Lloyd's policy, for a Lloyd's policy has always covered, and still covers, everything which is a loss in consequence of perils of the sea and which is a loss on ship.

They also cited Dent v. Smith, 17 W. R. 646, L. R. 4 Q. B. 414.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Batten, for the plaintiff.—Life salvage is not a loss for which an underwriter is liable under a policy on ship. It is not like other kinds of salvage, in which the salvor has a lien on the thing saved,

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They cited De Vaux v. Salvador, 4 Ad. & E. 420; Power v. Whitmore, 4 Mau. & Sel. 141; Robertson v. Ewer, 1 T. R. 127.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff's ship was in danger of being lost through perils of the sea, when a steamer went to her assistance. It appeared impossible that the ship herself could be saved, but the steamer took off the captain and the crew and saved their lives. The ship thus became derelict. Then another steamer came to the rescue and saved the ship herself and her cargo. Those on board the first steamer were salvors of life and nothing more; those on board the second steamer were salvors of ship and cargo. The salvors of life made a claim in the Admiralty Court against the owners of the ship and cargo in respect of the services rendered by them. Such a claim was not maintainable by maritime law or by the common law of England, but it can now be maintained by statute. The Merchant Shipping Act says that where services are rendered to a ship which result in saving life, then, if the ship is saved, the salvors shall be entitled to receive from the owner of the ship for so saving life a reasonable amount of salvage. The statute itself speaks of the sum so payable as salvage, and it makes provision for seizing the ship in order to enable the salvors to enforce their claim. Where this is done the Admiralty Court will award to the salvors a sum to be paid in satisfaction of this statutory liability imposed on the owner. In this case the ship was so seized, and the Admiralty Court awarded a sum of salvage to be paid by the owner. The owner now brings this action against a mutual insurance club to which he belongs, and seeks to recover from them the sum which he has thus paid. The relationship existing between the plaintiff and the defendants is established by the articles of association and rules of the club. By article 13 if he has to pay salvage for saving life, he may recover it from the club. That taken alone is perfectly distinct. But then article 18 says that he cannot recover for any loss which could be insured against by a Lloyd's policy in the usual form. Therefore, so far as article 18 modifies article 13, if the loss which the plaintiff has suffered in this case could be recovered under a Lloyd's policy in the usual form, the plaintiff ought not to succeed.

The sole point is whether the loss could have been recovered under a Lloyd's policy in the ordinary form. This form of policy has been in existence more than a hundred years. How has it during all that time been construed with regard to such a loss as has happened in this case? The loss is this: that the plaintiff has by statute been made liable to pay a sum of money for services rendered in saving life when his ship was in peril. It is not suggested that before 1846, when this statutory liability was first imposed, a sum paid for life salvage only could be recovered under a policy on ship. It is true that if there was salvage of a ship and at the same time, and by the same people, there was salvage of life, it was the practice of the Court of Admiralty to increase the salvage award on that account. But if there was no salvage of a ship, the court never made an award of salvage for saving life only. Therefore the question whether money paid for life salvage could be recovered under a policy on ship never then arose. Now, what is the effect of the statutory enactment? It gives a reward for saving life under particular circumstances, and it applies to the recovery of such reward the procedure which is generally applicable to salvage of ship or cargo. Although the statute calls this reward by the name of salvage, it is not the same as other kinds of salvage, but is an entirely different head. It is a new head of salvage, which when this form of Lloyd's policy was first agreed upon could not have been within the contemplation of the parties. In my opinion the statute does not assume to alter the effect of the policy at all; and therefore the new head of salvage is not covered by a Lloyd's policy in the ordinary form. Consequently article 18 does not do away with the effect of article 13, and there is nothing to prevent the plaintiff from recovering under article 13. I think that the judgment of Mathew, J., is right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

REG. (ON THE PROSECUTION OF THE DARTFORD RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL) v. BEXLEY HEATH RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Footway—Highway—Railway carried across public footpath—Duty to build bridge—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 46.

Where a railway crosses a public footway there is no obligation imposed upon the railway company by section 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to build a bridge so as to carry the railway over the footway, or the footway over the railway. Such an obligation, if any, can only be imposed by the company's special Act.

Appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division making absolute a rule for a mandamus directed to the Bexley Heath Railway Co. commanding them to carry the railway over a public footpath or the public footpath over the railway by means of a bridge.

The Bexley Heath Railway Co. was incorporated by a special Act for the purpose of constructing a railway in the county of Kent, the special Act incorporating the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

The railway crossed a public footpath in the parish of Crayford, the line being constructed at this point upon an embankment, and the footpath being carried up the embankment by means of wooden steps, across the line on the level, and down the other side of the embankment by means of similar steps.

The railway company's special Act did not contain any reference to or clause dealing with this footpath.

The Parish Council for Crayford having represented to the District Council, under section 26 of the Local Government Act, 1894, that the public footpath had been unlawfully obstructed, the District Council applied for and obtained a mandamus as above.

The railway company appealed.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 46: "If the line of the railway cross any turnpike road or public highway, then (except where otherwise provided by the special Act) either such road shall be carried over the railway or the railway shall be carried over such road by means of a bridge, of the height and width and with the ascent or descent by this or the special Act in that behalf provided . . . provided always, that, with the consent of two or more justices in petty sessions as after mentioned, it shall be lawful for the company to carry the railway across any highway other than a public road on the level."

Farwell, Q.C., and E. Boyle, for the appellants.—Section 46 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, does not apply to a public footpath. Though the words "public highway" might, if standing by themselves, be wide enough to include a public footpath, yet when the class of bridge referred to is looked at it is clear that they cannot include a footpath. The character and dimensions of the bridge are specified in sections 49 and 50, and show that a bridge over a carriage road alone is contemplated. The word "road" in those sections does not include a footpath. Section 46 and the following sections deal with turnpike roads, public carriage roads, and private carriage roads, and the first time a footway is mentioned is in section 61, which provides for a railway crossing a footway on the level. There is therefore no obligation imposed by that Act upon the railway company to carry the footpath by a bridge over or under the railway.

Macmorran, Q.C., and G. F. Hohler, for the respondents.—Section 46 is general in its terms, and applies to all highways. In the case of carriage-ways the dimensions of the bridge are specified in sections 49 and 50, but not in the case of other highways. All highways are included in section 46, but the proviso in that section deals with particular classes of highways—namely, bridle-ways and footways; and in these latter cases the order of two justices is necessary to enable a railway to be carried across such a highway on the level, and if an order of justices is not obtained under sections 59 and 61, there must be a bridge. Therefore, unless the special Act allows it, it is unlawful to carry a railway across the footway on the level.

Farwell, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The railway company against whom this application is made obtained an Act of Parliament authorizing them to make a railway in accordance with the deposited plans. The Act did not refer to this public footpath. The company built the railway on an embankment across the footpath, and the footpath was then carried up the embankment by means of steps, across the line on the level, and down the embankment on the other side by similar steps. A mandamus has been obtained directing the company to carry the footpath by a bridge over the railway, or to carry the railway by a bridge over the footpath, by which, I presume, is meant a tunnel under the railway. The question before us is whether that was an order that the court were justified in law in making. It is contended that the court has no power to order such a bridge to be built. The court can only order the company to build a bridge if there is a statutory duty imposed upon the company to build one. Such a duty can only be imposed by the company's special Act or by some public Act. In the company's special Act there is no such duty imposed. The question therefore resolves itself into this: Has any public Act imposed such a duty on the company? The duty, if there is one, can only be imposed by section 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The words at the beginning of that section, if taken by themselves, would be large enough to include a public footpath. But in order to see whether that is so we must inquire further, and see what kind of bridge is referred to. The duty is to make a particular kind of bridge. It is to be a bridge with an arch of a particular width and height, and with the road having a particular ascent and descent; and, without going into the details, it seems to me perfectly clear that the section can never have meant to include a bridge over or under a public footpath. It would be an utterly useless expense to build such a bridge in connection with a footpath. Therefore it seems to me that section 46, upon its true construction, does not include a bridge over or under a public footpath, and there is no duty imposed by that section to build such a bridge. Then does any other section impose such a duty? Section 61 deals explicitly with a public footpath, which shows that when the Legislature intended to deal with a public footpath they expressly referred to it by name. Section 61 deals with the case of a railway interfering with a public footpath by crossing it on the level. In the present case the railway crosses the footpath on the level. That section, however, does not impose the duty to build a bridge, but merely the duty of taking certain precautions against danger to persons crossing the line. Therefore there is no duty to build a bridge imposed on the railway company by either section 46 or section 61, and the court has no power to order a mandamus to issue. This point does not seem to have been taken in the Divisional Court, and therefore we are not overruling any expression of opinion on their part upon this point. For these reasons the appeal must be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question in the case is whether a duty is imposed upon the railway company by the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, to carry the footpath by a bridge over or under the railway. I cannot spell out of the statute any such obligation. Does section 46 apply to a public footpath? For myself I should have thought that a public footpath would be included in the word "highway." But can the subsequent words "such road" apply to a public footpath? In my opinion they cannot. If that is so, where do we get the obligation to build a bridge over or under the railway? But the case does not stop there, because the necessary dimensions of the bridge are specified, and that carries one on to sections 49 and 50, and it is obvious that the bridge there prescribed cannot be a bridge over a footpath. It is curious that a footpath is not mentioned by name until we come to section 61. That section deals with a railway crossing a bridle-way or footway on the level, but does not impose the duty of making a bridge. I cannot find in any section an obligation upon the company to build a bridge to carry a public footpath over or under a railway.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am also of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. It seems to me that this case depends on the true construction of section 46. The bridge there specified is not a bridge generally, but a bridge of a specified height and width and with a particular ascent and descent, as enacted in a subsequent section of the Act. If we read into the section everything in the subsequent part of the Act the case of a footpath would clearly be omitted. The special Act does not deal with the case of a footpath, and in my opinion there is no obligation to build a bridge over or under a public footpath unless the special Act imposes it. Public footpaths are so numerous and varied in character that the Legislature, when specifying a bridge of particular dimensions for a carriage road, has left the special Act in each case to deal with public footpaths, and if the special Act does not impose the obligation to build a bridge over or under a footpath, the public Act does not impose it. Therefore in the present case there is no jurisdiction to grant a mandamus to build a bridge over the railway or to carry the footpath under the railway.

In re HARDY.
HARDY v. FARMER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Composition—Secured creditor—Death of debtor—Administration action—Claim by mortgagees to prove—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 18, sub-section 11; s. 108—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 211.

A receiving order having been made against H. on his own petition, H. made a composition with his creditors under section 18 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provided for their being paid by instalments extending over a year, and died shortly after the expiration of the year. The instalments were not paid, and an action was commenced in the Chancery Division by a creditor to administer H.'s estate. Certain mortgagees of H., who had neither attended the creditors' meeting nor assented to the composition, took out a summons in the chancery action to be admitted as creditors in that action in respect of the balance of the mortgage debt after deducting the assessed value of their security.

Held, on the principle of Ex parte Sharp, 34 W. R. 550, that under sections 108 and 18, sub-section 11, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the Court of Bankruptcy would have jurisdiction to proceed notwithstanding H.'s death, and would apply its powers and exercise its jurisdiction in favour of the applicants; and the plaintiff in the chancery action having submitted to take the opinion of the Chancery Court as to what would be the result of the applicant's proceeding in bankruptcy, the application of the mortgagees was consequently allowed.

Summons.

The applicants were mortgagees of the testator Hardy, under indentures of mortgage and transfer, dated respectively in 1886 and 1889, for £2,000 and interest.

In May, 1890, a receiving order was made against the testator on his own petition. Shortly afterwards he made a composition with his creditors under section 18 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provided for their being paid by instalments extending over a year. The scheme was approved, and the receiving order was thereupon rescinded by the court. The mortgagees neither attended the creditors' meeting when the scheme was approved, nor assented to it. Default was made in payment of the instalments, and the testator died in October, 1891.

This action was instituted for the administration of his estate, when the usual order for accounts and inquiries was made. The estate proved to be insolvent.

The applicants, having valued their security at £1,500, carried in a claim for £500, being the balance of the £2,000, after deducting the £1,500.

The claim was disallowed by the judge in chambers, but without prejudice to any application which might be made in bankruptcy. An application was accordingly made in bankruptcy for a declaration that a proof for £500 ought to be allowed, but was dismissed on its appearing that the proof had been admitted by the trustee under the composition, there being no appeal from his decision before the court.

This was a summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate by allowing the claim. The question turned on the construction of sections 18 and 108 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and rule 211 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886. By section 18, sub-section 11, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, if default is made in payment of any instalment due under a composition or scheme, the court may adjudge the debtor bankrupt, and annul the composition or scheme; and where a debtor is so adjudged bankrupt, any debt provable in other respects, which has been contracted before the adjudication, shall be provable. Cf. Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), which repealed and in substance re-enacted this section: see section 3 (15). By rule 211 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, where a composition or scheme has been approved, and default is made in any payment thereunder, no action to enforce such payment shall lie; but the remedy of any person aggrieved shall be by application to the court. By section 108 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, if a debtor by or against whom a bankruptcy petition has been presented dies, the proceedings in the matter shall, unless the court otherwise orders, be continued as if he were alive.

Byrne, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the summons.—The applicants were entitled to abstain from taking part in the composition proceedings, and their claim is provable against the estate now: In re Bestwick, 24 W. R. 938, 2 Ch. D. 485. If the debtor were alive, the applicants would apply to the Court of Bankruptcy under section 18, sub-section 11, of the Act of 1883, to make the debtor bankrupt, and the effect of section 108 is that notwithstanding his death they can still pursue their remedy under section 18, sub-section 11: Ex parte Sharp, 34 W. R. 550; In re Easy, 35 W. R. 819, 19 Q. B. D. 538. That being the position in bankruptcy, there is no reason why our claim should not be admitted in the action.

Farwell, Q.C., and Solomon, contra.—In re Bestwick was a decision on the Act of 1869, and does not apply here. The debt is gone, and the applicants' remedy, if any, is in bankruptcy (rule 211 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886); but they are too late to avail themselves of that remedy, and are not entitled now to compete with creditors who relied on the old debts being wiped out by the composition. In order to save expense we consent to the question being decided on this application.

Byrne replied.

CHITTY, J.—The ground on which the court is asked to reject the proof is that fourteen months before the testator's death, and after he had presented a petition in bankruptcy, a composition scheme was approved of by the court in bankruptcy, and thereupon the receiving order that had been made against the debtor was discharged. For the general body of the creditors it is urged that the provisions of the 18th section apply and have this effect—namely, first, that by the 8th sub-section, the composition having been accepted and approved as it was, it is binding on all the creditors so far as relates to any debts provable in bankruptcy. This £500 would have been a debt provable in bankruptcy. The 11th sub-section provides, in substance, what is to happen in case default be made in payment of the composition. The composition was for payment by three instalments spread over a year, and there was a surety who guaranteed the payment. The applicants did not prove under the composition, but apparently relied upon their security, which they probably thought at the time was sufficient. Now, if the debtor had been alive, it is quite plain that the applicants could apply to the Court of Bankruptcy under this 11th sub-section. [His lordship stated the effect of sub-section 11, and continued:—] The opponents of the claim rely on the 211th rule in bankruptcy, which has the effect of a statute. [His lordship read the 211th rule, and continued:—] Putting the 211th rule by the side of the 18th section, the result appears to be that a creditor who is bound by the composition, though he has not given any consent, cannot pursue any other remedy except the remedy given by the 11th sub-section; and the result is that if the debtor had been alive, the applicants could not have sued for the balance of the security, supposing that they had realized the security and there was a deficiency of £500, which would have been an ordinary debt. The right, therefore, to sue for the debt or to enforce payment, as the result of what I have gone through, is that it can be enforced only under the provisions of the 11th sub-section.

The applicants, however, refer to the 108th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. [His lordship read the 108th section.] Under that section Cave and Grantham, JJ., sitting as a divisional court, held, in Ex parte Sharp, that where the petition is presented by the debtor himself the adjudication could be made, though after his death. Of course the section cannot be read as applying to a bankruptcy petition which has been dismissed. Again, it cannot be applied, as the Court of Appeal held in In re Easy, to the case where the petition has been presented by the creditor but there has been no service of the petition during the debtor's lifetime. Now that decision shows that the construction put upon the 108th section is a general construction, and I am not able to find any ground upon which it would be reasonable, in my opinion, to say that the provisions of the 108th section are not applicable to the 11th sub-section of the 18th section. To put a case which was adduced by Mr. Byrne in argument, the Legislature never could have intended that if there had been an order approving a composition, and the debtor had died the next day, the creditors who had not assented to the composition, but who were bound by it, should be told by the executors of the deceased that the effect of the enactment was that composition plus death the day after, amounted to a complete discharge, and that there would be no available means whatever open to any creditor to obtain payment of that which had been promised to him under the composition. For this purpose I adopt Mr. Solomon's argument, that this case presents no difference by reason of there being a surety against whom these creditors possibly could even now proceed. I think it is the simple case of the nature I have just described, with this difference, that, instead of dying the day after the composition, the debtor here lived till the end of the period of twelve months, and then died two months afterwards. I think, following the principle on which the Divisional Court acted, that there would be jurisdiction in the Court of Bankruptcy to proceed under the 108th section, and I have asked the counsel who opposed this claim whether they can find any reason for suggesting that, while that decision of the Divisional Court stands—and I see no reason for dissenting from it at all; but, on the contrary, I think it is right—the Bankruptcy Court would not act on the principle of the decision and make the adjudication against the dead man. There are no circumstances in this particular case which would make it unjust for the court, in the language of the 108th section, to order otherwise—that is, to stop the bankruptcy proceedings.

Then it was said by the opponents of the claim that there was no pending petition here; that the receiving order having been rescinded, it would be impossible to apply the 11th sub-section. Again, dealing with the case as if the debtor were alive, it appears to me that that observation is not justified; and that there is a petition on the file at the present moment is not denied.

Then it was suggested that the language of the 11th sub-section—namely, "on application by any creditor"—required a new petition. In my opinion it is quite plain that any creditor who has a ground of complaint by reason of default in the payment of the composition could make the application in the Bankruptcy Court without presenting any fresh petition.

This brings me to the conclusion that the Bankruptcy Court would apply its powers and exercise its jurisdiction in favour of the applicants.

[After referring to the facts and to the proceedings in the Chancery Division and in bankruptcy prior to this summons, his lordship said:] Now it appears to me that thus far the strict course would be to allow the applicants to take further proceedings in bankruptcy, with the view of obtaining an adjudication or some other order; and I put it to the counsel of the plaintiff, who opposed the claim, whether he desired that that course should be adopted, which of course would lead to delay and to expense, and that in the meantime, till there had been a decision in the Bankruptcy Court one way or the other, a sum should be set apart to answer the claim if it should succeed in bankruptcy. But very properly, and with a desire of dividing this estate, which I need hardly mention is insolvent, among the creditors, Mr. Farwell said that he should not ask that that should be done, but that he should be content to take my opinion as to what would be the result of the application to the Court of Bankruptcy. The result is that that which at the present day is always avoided where it can be properly done—that is, circuity of action, involving expense and delay—will not take place. I think upon that I ought to accede to the application.

But, in addition to the arguments I have gone through, many points were elaborately argued against the claim, which I propose to dispose of in a few words, without any want of respect to the counsel who urged them. A great point was made of Troughton v. Gitley, Ambler, 630, and the subsequent authorities that proceeded on the principle of that decision of Lord Camden; and it was said, as against the applicants, that they had stood by and allowed the deceased to go on incurring debts under such circumstances as would justify the court in saying that the applicants, who did not take the trouble to prove under the composition, were to be postponed to subsequent creditors. It will be sufficient for me to say that I think the counsel who urged the point had no materials on which to found it, and that the circumstances of the case do not give rise to any ground for applying the equitable rule of Lord Camden as against the applicants. I think that they might in strictness have been put to the expense and delay that I have mentioned; and probably that would be the only conclusion I could arrive at had it not been for the very proper submission of the plaintiffs' counsel.

Action.

Henry Jecks Dixon & Sons were incorporated as a joint stock company under the Companies Acts on the 13th of December, 1886.

The company had power of borrowing or raising money for all or any of its purposes upon mortgage of any property real or personal of the company or upon debenture bonds, bills, or notes, unpaid capital, or other security of the company, and for other purposes mentioned in the memorandum of association.

By an indenture dated the 13th of February, 1891, and made between Dixon & Sons, of the one part, and the plaintiff, Richards, called the trustee, of the other part, and after reciting that the directors of the company, in exercise of the powers vested in them by the regulations of the company, had determined to borrow for the purposes of the company the sum of £20,000 by the issue of mortgage debentures of £100, or of multiples of £25 each, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly in each year [such debentures to be in the form annexed], and to further secure the principal moneys and interest for the time being payable according to the tenor of the said debentures, and the performance of the stipulations and conditions therein contained in manner thereinafter appearing, the company as beneficial owner granted and assigned to the trustee the property, whatsoever and wheresoever situate, of or to which the company then was, or during the continuation of that security should become, possessed or entitled, except uncalled capital, upon and for the trusts and purposes therein expressed; and it was thereby provided (inter alia) that (3) the mortgaged premises (being the premises thereby assigned to the trustee) should be held by him upon trust to permit the company to hold the same and to carry on the business until the security thereby constituted became enforceable as thereinafter, and then upon trust that the trustee in his discretion might enter upon and take possession of the mortgaged premises; (4) provided that the security thereby constituted should become enforceable, amongst other events, if an effective resolution of the company should be passed for the winding up of the company. (5) At any time after the principal moneys thereby secured should have become payable according to the tenor of the debentures or after a notice should have been given of a meeting to consider a proposed extraordinary resolution for winding up the company, the trustee without further notice might appoint one or more persons to be a receiver or receivers of all or any part of the mortgaged premises, in like manner in every respect as if the trustee were a mortgagee within the meaning of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, and had become entitled under that Act to exercise the power of sale conferred, and every receiver so appointed should have and be entitled to exercise all powers conferred by the said Act as if such receiver or receivers had been duly appointed thereunder; and in particular by way of addition to but without thereby limiting any general powers thereinbefore referred to, every such receiver so appointed should have power (inter alia) (a) to take possession of the property thereby charged or any part thereof, and (b) carry on any business of the company; but if the extraordinary resolution referred to in any such notice before mentioned should not be passed by the necessary majority the company and the holders of the debentures should, subject as therein mentioned, be remitted to their original rights. (6) "The trustee shall not, nor shall any receiver or receivers appointed by him as aforesaid, by reason of the receiver or receivers entering into possession of the property hereby charged, or any part thereof, be liable to account as mortgagee in possession or be liable for any loss on realization or for any fault or omission for which a mortgagee in possession might be liable, but every receiver duly appointed by the trustee under the power in that behalf hereinbefore contained shall be deemed to be the agent of the company, and shall as such agent for all purposes be deemed to be in exactly the same position as a receiver duly appointed by the mortgagee under the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, and every such receiver and the trustee shall be entitled to all the rights, powers, privileges, and immunities by the said Act conferred on mortgagees and receivers when such receivers have been appointed under that Act." (15) The company would pay the principal moneys and interest secured by the debentures in accordance with the tenor thereof respectively; and (16) the principal moneys and moneys intended to be secured by the debentures should, subject to the provisions of clause 13 (as to the costs, charges, and expenses of the trustee being a first charge), be a first charge on the mortgaged premises, and the said principal moneys and interest should take precedence over all moneys which might thereafter be raised by the company by any means whatsoever; but without prejudice to the right of the company to treat the debentures as a floating security to the extent in the debentures in that behalf expressed, and as between the holders thereof the debentures should rank pari passu without any preference or priority by reason of date of issue or otherwise.

This indenture was not registered under the Bills of Sale Acts. On the same day there were issued by the company first mortgage debentures for £100 each, and it was provided by each such debenture that the company would, on the 16th of December, 1896, or on such earlier date as the principal money thereby secured should become payable in accordance with the conditions indorsed thereon, pay to the holder, his executors, or administrator, the sum of £100; and the company, as beneficial owner charged, with the payments thereby or by the conditions indorsed thereon provided for, its undertaking and all its property, whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future (except uncalled capital); and the conditions indorsed upon each of such debentures provided that the debentures of that series should rank pari passu as a first charge without any preference or priority one over another, and should be a floating security.

The plaintiff was also a debenture holder as well as trustee under the covering deed. With the consent of the trustee second debentures were issued subsequently. On the 5th of September, 1895, a notice was given of a meeting to consider a proposed extraordinary resolution for winding up the company, and such resolution was on the 16th of September passed by the necessary majority. On the 5th of September the plaintiff, as trustee, appointed Alfred Page to be the receiver of all the mortgaged premises comprised in the said indenture, with all the powers conferred on a receiver by the said indenture or by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881. The receiver entered into possession of the premises and carried on the business of the company. The receiver was on the 16th of September also appointed liquidator of the company.

The company was originally assessed to a poor rate made for the parish of Kidderminster on the 19th of April, 1895, to cover the period up to the 30th of September following, in the sum of £73 11s. 2d. in respect of the premises in their occupation, and to a similar amount for a general district rate due to the Corporation of Kidderminster. On the 26th of September the receiver had an interview with the defendants' collector and assistant overseer, when it was agreed that the rate should be apportioned between the receiver and the company in the following proportions—viz., £11 5s. 6d. from the receiver in respect of his occupation of the premises from the 5th of September, and £62 5s. 8d. from the company in respect of their occupation up to that date. The rate-book was altered in pursuance of section 16 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41), by the insertion of the name of the receiver and liquidator, and the date of commencement of his occupation was entered as the 5th of September. On the 27th of September the defendants served on the premises a demand note addressed to Dixon & Sons, Limited, Alfred Page, receiver and liquidator. The amount was stated to be £73,11s. 2d., and at the foot was set out "Dixon & Sons, £62 5s. 8d.; Page, £11 5s. 6d."

On the 3rd of October the receiver paid the £11 5s. 6d., and received a receipt for the same made out as follows: "Received of Dixon & Sons, Limited, per A. Page, receiver, £11 5s. 6d."

The company had not paid any part of the £62 5s. 8d., and on the overseers writing and demanding it the receiver answered, recognizing the right of the defendants to be paid the rates preferentially out of the funds coming to his hands as liquidator, but adding that he had no such funds in his hands at present and that the property of the company was vested in him as mortgagee on behalf of the debenture holders. The overseers, seven days having elapsed without payment, issued a summons against the company, which was served at the registered office of the company, and on the 25th of October a distress warrant on the goods of Dixon & Sons, Limited, was issued by the justices of the borough of Kidderminster under 43 Eliz., c. 2, and 12 Vict. c. 14. The company did not appear at the hearing of the summons, and the receiver was not made a party to it.

The plaintiff thereupon commenced this action, suing on behalf of himself and all other the holders of the issue of first mortgage debentures, and as trustee of the covering deed, to restrain the defendants from proceeding with the distress, and for damages for trespass and wrongful distress. At the hearing of the interlocutory application for an injunction it was agreed that the plaintiffs should pay the money claimed by the overseers into court, and that the case should be decided on argument of the points of law involved.

Clayton, for the debenture holders.—The rate is made upon the occupier, and the statute of Elizabeth provides for proceedings to be taken against the offender. The defendants are bound by the apportionment they made and the entry in the rate book. In any case the defendants could not distrain on our goods, even if the company had in fact remained in occupation; but there was a change of occupation.

Rowden, for the defendants.—(1) Rates are entitled to preferential payment under 51 & 52 Vict. c. 62, s. 1. Sub-section 4 creates a statutory first charge on the assets of the company. (2) Supposing the test of liability is change of occupation, there was no change here, because the occupation of the receiver was the occupation of the company, the mortgagor (Conveyancing Act, 1881, ss. 19 and 24). There was, in fact, no successive occupation, but only the occupation of the mortgagors by their own agent. (3) Any title derived by anyone to these goods is derived under clause 5 of the covering deed, which is not a debenture within section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, but is a bill of sale, and falls within section 14, and is no answer to the distress, even if it had been registered: Ross v. Army & Navy Hotel Co., 35 W. R. 40, 34 Ch. D. 43; Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co., 35 W. R. 798, 36 Ch. D. 215; Re Standard Manufacturing Co., 39 W. R. 369, [1891] 1 Ch. 627; Great Northern Railway Co. v. Coal Co-operative Society, ante, p. 252, [1896] 1 Ch. 187.

Clayton, in reply, relied on the covering deed being a debenture, and, in the alternative, that the debenture holders could make good their claim under the debentures themselves: Re Burdett, 36 W. R. 345, 20 Q. B. D. 310; Levy v. Abercorris Slate and Slab Co., 36 W. R. 411, 37 Ch. D. 260; In re Opera, 39 W. R. 398, [1891] 2 Ch. 154.

In the second action by the same plaintiff against the Mayor, &c., of Kidderminster, the same question arose in respect of the general district rate of the borough of Kidderminster. The arguments used were the same, except that for the plaintiffs sections 5, 6, 211, sub-section 3, of the Public Health Act, 1875, were referred to; and that the defendants contended that the general district rate was a tax or other parochial rate within the meaning of section 14 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. The learned judge, however, intimated that he was of opinion that a general district rate was not such a parochial rate. Local Board of Wimbledon v. Underwood, 40 W. R. 640, [1892] 1 Q. B. 836, was cited in argument for the plaintiffs.

NORTH, J., stated the facts, and continued:—Now, the defendants, the overseers, say they are entitled to this sum on several grounds. I think it is convenient to put their case first. The first ground is that by virtue of the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. c. 62), s. 1, the overseers of the poor are preferred creditors. I do not think that Act has anything to do with it. The Act is entitled "An Act to amend the law with respect to preferential payments in bankruptcy and in the winding up of companies," and then it provides that in the distribution of assets of any company being wound up under the Act there shall be paid in priority to all other debts all parochial or other local rates due from the company at the date of the commencement of the winding up. Now, that seems to deal simply with preferential payments to be made by the person who holds the funds—the official trustee, or whoever it may be—out of the assets in his hands, and it is a direction as to the mode in which the payment is to be made; and out of those sums he is to distribute what are treated in this section as the preferential debts to be paid first. Those creditors are to be paid out of the assets before any other creditors are; but, in my opinion, that does not in any way affect persons who are not claiming as creditors in the winding up at all, but who hold security upon property which the company has in some way charged in their favour. It was said that section 1, sub-section 4, goes further. It provides: "In the event of a landlord or other person distraining or having distrained on any goods or effects of a bankrupt or a company being wound up within three months next before the date of the receiving order or the winding-up order, respectively, the debts to which priority is given by this section shall be a first charge upon the goods so distrained on, or the proceeds of the sale thereof," followed by a proviso, "that in respect of any money paid under any such charge the landlord or other person shall have the same rights of priority as the person to whom such payment is made." No doubt that section does go rather further than to direct what is to be done with the assets in the hands of the trustee in bankruptcy; but it deals only with a particular case which has not happened, and does not, in my opinion, affect the present case in any way.

Then, the next point is with respect to the occupation of the property, and as to that I must refer to the two statutes bearing upon the subject. The first is the old Act for the Relief of the Poor, passed in the forty-third year of Elizabeth, providing for the appointment of overseers of the poor and their raising poor rates from the occupiers of property. Then, in the latter part of what is called the 2nd section of the Act in the revised edition of the statutes, it provides that it shall be lawful for the overseers by warrant from two justices to levy sums of money of everyone who shall refuse to contribute according as they shall be assessed, by distress and sale of the offender's goods. The other Act which is material is the Poor Rate Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict. c. 41), s. 16, which provides that "if the occupier assessed in the rate when made"—that is the poor rate—"shall cease to occupy before the rate shall have been wholly discharged, or if the hereditament being unoccupied at the time of the making of the rate become occupied during the period for which the rate is made, the overseers shall enter in the rate book the name of the person who succeeds or comes into the occupation, as the case may be, and the date when such occupation commences, so far as the same shall be known to them, and such occupier shall henceforth be deemed to have been actually rated from the date so entered by the overseers, and shall be liable to pay so much of the rate as shall be proportionate to the time between the commencement of his occupation and the expiration of the period for which the rate was made, in like manner, and with the like remedy of appeal, as if he had been rated when the rate was made; and an outgoing occupier shall remain liable in like manner for so much and no more of the rate as is proportionate to the time of his occupation within the period for which the rate was made."

I omitted to mention that the division of the amount of the rate into two sums of £62 and £11 was made upon the footing of this section applying to the case of there having been a change in the occupation when the receiver entered into possession; and it treats the company as having been occupiers down to that time, and the receiver as being the occupier from that time forward.

In the present case it is said there has not been any change of occupation; but in point of fact, as I mentioned, it is clear there was. The legal effect of what was done has to be considered. Now, as to that, the ground upon which it is put is that the receiver appointed on the 5th of October was the receiver appointed under the Conveyancing Act of 1881. Section 19 there provides: "A mortgagee, where the mortgage is made by deed, shall, by virtue of this Act, have the following powers, to the like extent as if they had been in terms conferred by the mortgage deed, but not further." One, by sub-section 3, is: "A power, when the mortgage money has become due, to appoint a receiver of the income of the mortgaged property, or of any part thereof." Then section 24 provides (2): "The receiver shall be deemed to be the agent of the mortgagor, and the mortgagor shall be solely responsible for the receiver's acts or defaults, unless the mortgage deed otherwise provides."

Now, the deed under which the receiver was appointed was the covering deed, and I must refer shortly to its provisions. [The learned judge read the provisions set out above, and continued:—] Therefore it treats substantially the debentures as the documents dealing with the claim as a debt, and this is by way of security for the debt; and there is a direct power to take possession and to carry on the business, with a proviso for undoing that, if the resolution had not been passed. Now, this power of appointing a receiver goes much further than anything contained in the 24th section of the Conveyancing Act; but the 19th section, which enabled the mortgagee to appoint a receiver, provided also, in sub-section 2: "The provisions of this Act relating to the foregoing powers, comprised either in this section or in any subsequent section regulating the exercise of those powers, may be varied or extended by the mortgage deed, and, as so varied or extended, shall, as far as may be, operate in the like manner, and with all the like incidents, effects, and consequences as if such variations or extensions were contained in this Act." Therefore the fact that it goes much further than the Act does not in any way affect its validity; but the result is that the 6th article of the deed which I have last read goes a great deal further than the provision in the Act that the receiver shall be deemed to be the agent of the mortgagor; and, in my opinion, that sub-section in the Act that the receiver shall be deemed to be the agent of the mortgagor does not apply here, because there is the express clause providing for the same thing and much more, in the arrangement actually made between the parties by the deed itself.

The question, then, is what the construction of the deed is; and it is said that under the deed, as under the Act, the receiver was merely the agent of the mortgagor, and therefore the mortgagor continued in possession, and there was no change in possession. But in my opinion that contention is not sound. It is quite clear that they do contemplate, in a particular event and at a particular time, that there either may or shall be a change of possession, in which a receiver shall enter into possession and shall carry on the business of the company; and, in my opinion, the provision that the receiver is to be the agent for the mortgagor is not so strong as to stultify every other provision in the deed, which says that the possession of the company shall cease, and shall become the possession of the receiver; and it also provides that if, when possession has been properly taken, the contemplated resolution should not be passed, then the parties are to be again in their old position—that is to say, the possession from that time forward is to be the possession of the company in this case; and under article 6 the possession of the mortgagor is to be under the general provisions of the Act.

In my opinion, therefore, it is impossible to say that the change of possession which was clearly contemplated and required by the deed did not take place, and therefore the circumstances referred to in the 16th section of the Poor Rate Act, 1869, did take place. It is not the fact to say that the company were in the occupation throughout; because the receiver on behalf of the trustee—the trustee, if you like to say so, on behalf of the debenture holders—was the person from that time forward in possession.

Then the question is, What right he had, and what his interest in the personal chattels that he seized under the deed was? It is said that the deed was not a debenture, and therefore the Bills of Sale Acts in some way affect its operation. The deed, I should say, never was registered under the Bills of Sale Act, and therefore it is said in some way that the debenture holders have no right as creditors under the deed.

Now, first of all, as regards this covering deed; is it a debenture or not? According to the decisions of Chitty, J., in Edmonds v. The Blaina Co. and Levy v. Abercorris Co., he I will not say defined what a debenture was, but he pointed out some of the qualities or attributes of a debenture, and if the deeds in those cases were debentures, I do not see why the covering deed in the present case should not be a debenture also. Then, on the other hand, Field, J., in a case cited of Brocklehurst v. The Railway Printing and Publishing Co., 28 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 358, [1884] W. N. 70, held that a covering deed was not a debenture; and in the case of Ross v. The Army and Navy Hotel Co. the Court of Appeal certainly did proceed on the admission of the parties that the covering deed was not a debenture, and they considered the further question as to whether what I may call the real debentures secured by the covering deed were debentures or not. As regards that question therefore, I do not think it necessary to decide, and I will not, in that conflict of authorities, say whether the covering deed is a debenture or not; but it does not seem to me material whether it is or not, because I think it is quite clear on the authorities the covering deed is not a bill of sale, and therefore that it did not require registration. No doubt in Ross's case, to which I have just referred, there was such a covering deed, and the court assumed, as the headnote says (and I think rightly), that the covering deed ought to have been registered, and was void because it was not. Cotton, L.J., says: "Although the covering deed is void under the Act, there is in the debenture itself a contract that the debenture holders shall have a charge upon what for present purposes I will call 'all the property of the company.' Undoubtedly, the covering deed being void, we cannot look at it as a contract to give security." He does not say "undoubtedly it is void," but on the assumption that it is void you cannot look at it as a contract. That is beyond doubt. Then he says: "The debt is altogether out of the way, because if not good as a bill of sale it cannot be good as a contract to give a bill of sale as security." Then Lindley, L.J., says at the beginning of his judgment: "It is admitted that what is called a 'covering deed' was a deed executed by way of security for money lent to the company. Debentures were also given for the money lent. It is said now that the debentures are void, because the deed"—that is, the covering deed—"is admitted on all hands to be void under the Bills of Sale Act." Then he proceeded to consider whether the debentures were void, and held they were not; but no doubt there is an assumption there by the court, as well as the parties, that the covering deed is void.

It seems to me, notwithstanding that case, that the case settling the matter at present, is the later decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of the Standard Manufacturing Co., where the matter was fully considered. It is sufficient, I think, for me to read the headnote in the Law Reports as bearing on this point, and it is fully borne out by the judgment, which I have carefully considered: "The mortgages or charges of any incorporated company for the registration of which statutory provision has already been made by the Companies Act, 1845, or the Companies Act, 1862, are not, upon the true construction of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, bills of sale within the scope of that Act." Now, this covering deed is beyond all question a deed for the registration of which provision is made by the Companies Act, 1862, and I think I was told it had actually been registered. If not, it ought to have been registered. That case seems to me to be exactly in poiut. I must hold that the covering deed, therefore, itself was not a bill of sale, looking at that authority. I should say this, that the headnote says: "Are not, upon the true construction of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, bills of sale within the scope of that Act." That was not the only point decided, because Bowen, L.J., who gave the judgment of the court, said at the beginning of his judgment: "The question we have to decide is whether both or either of the debentures before us, which are, in fact, debentures of a joint stock company limited, and which create a charge on the floating real and personal property of the company, are void for non-registration under the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882, or either of such Acts. So far as the Bills of Sale Act of 1882 is concerned, it seems to us that such debentures are expressly excepted from its operation by section 17." The rest of the judgment deals only with the Act of 1878, simply because the Act of 1882 had been disposed of in those words at the beginning of the judgment; but beyond that it seems to me that the decision as to the Act of 1878 covers the present case, because all bills of sale under the Act of 1882 are bills of sale under the Act of 1878; that is to say, it is not the case that all bills of sale under the Act of 1878 are within the Act of 1882; but, on the other hand, the converse is the case, and therefore, if this is not a bill of sale under the Act of 1878, it is not under the Act of 1882, which is a supplemental Act to the principal Act, and the two are to be read as one. In the 3rd section of the Act of 1882 the Act of 1878 is referred to as the principal Act: "And this Act shall, so far as it is consistent with the tenor thereof, be construed as one with the principal Act." Then it goes on to point out to what the Act of 1882 is not to apply.

There is one other case I want to refer to, and that is a case where the Standard case was followed. In the case of In re Opera, Limited, I read from the headnote in the Law Reports: "The sheriff, on seizing, on behalf of an execution creditor, goods belonging to a limited liability company, takes—at all events before the sale by him—subject to the rights of debenture holders under debentures charging all the property of the company as security for the debenture debt." There it was held that the charge created by debentures had priority over the rights of the sheriff in execution. It seems to me that the right created by the debentures is equally effective against a distress—not, indeed, by a landlord, because that is not the case we are dealing with—but a distress under a power to distrain which is to be exercised by the Act over the company's goods. It seems to me that, the debenture being a good charge upon the goods, no distress can be made upon them, except, as this case says, subject to the rights of the debenture holders.

Then, in addition to that, there is this point; that, even if the covering deed was a bill of sale which was invalid as not being registered, yet the debentures proper, to cover which the security is created, are beyond all question debentures; and they are here expressed in terms which give a charge. [The learned judge read the debenture form set out above, and continued:—] That being so, the argument that was founded upon section 14 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, has no application. That section provides: "A bill of sale to which this Act applies shall be no protection in respect of personal chattels included in such bill of sale which, but for such bill of sale, would have been liable to distress under a warrant for the recovery of taxes and poor and other parochial rates." That is to say, a bill of sale to which this Act applies shall be no such defence; but as, in my opinion, neither the debentures nor the covering deed are within the Act at all, the benefit conferred by the 14th section has no application. Under those circumstances, the money must be paid out of court to the receiver.

Then, as regards the second case in the paper for judgment, I was told that that was altogether the same as the one in which I have just given judgment, excepting that in one respect it was more favourable to the plaintiff. I need not go into that question, or consider whether it is, or not. The grounds on which I have decided the first case are quite sufficient for deciding the second, and the order in that case will be for payment of the agreed sum to the plaintiff also. Then the costs must follow the event.

Company—General meeting—Voting—Show of hands—Declaration of chairman—Evidence to contradict—Sufficiency of notice of meeting—Table A, clause 42—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 51.

The provision in section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, that the declaration of the chairman that a resolution has been carried shall be deemed conclusive evidence of the fact does not preclude the court from inquiring whether, in fact, the provisions of the Act have been complied with.

Motion.

The defendant company was registered as a company, with Table A as its articles of association, on the 7th of September, 1895. Notice of an extraordinary general meeting was given to the shareholders, at which it was stated a resolution would be submitted that the regulations contained in Table A should be rescinded, and that the regulations contained in the printed document submitted to the meeting, and for the purpose of identification subscribed by the chairman thereof, with the modifications approved by the meeting, should be adopted as the regulations of the company in lieu of the regulations thereby rescinded. Notice was also given that the shareholders might inspect the proposed new regulations at the office of the company's solicitors.

The meeting was held on the 9th of April, 1896, and the voting having been taken by show of hands the chairman declared the resolutions duly carried.

This was a motion to restrain a meeting called for confirming the resolutions, or in the alternative from acting upon them. It appeared from the evidence that nine voted for and three against the resolutions, and accordingly that if one vote was subtracted from the majority voting, the majority required by the Companies Act to pass a resolution had not been obtained; and it was admitted that in fact one of the voters counted in the majority was the vote of a person who was not a member of the company.

Warrington, Q.C., and Lavington, for the applicants.—Our evidence shows that the majority required by the Companies Act to pass this resolution was not in fact obtained. One person's vote was accepted by the chairman who was not a member. Without that vote the statutory majority did not pass the resolution. The declaration of the chairman is not conclusive where evidence to the contrary can be produced: Re Horbury Bridge Coal, &c., Co., 27 W. R. 433, 11 Ch. D. 109. No sufficient notice of the proposed alterations of the regulations was sent.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Wilkinson, for the defendants.—The declaration of the chairman is conclusive evidence that the resolution has been properly passed, without proof of the number or proportion of the votes, under the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, s. 51.

KEKEWICH, J.—In this case the company was regulated by the provisions of Table A, as it was registered without any articles of association, and in order to determine the question as to what is the result of this general meeting, clause 42 of Table A must be referred to. That clause provides that "at any general meeting, unless a poll is demanded by at least five members, a declaration by the chairman that a resolution has been carried and an entry to that effect in the book of proceedings of the company shall be sufficient evidence of the fact, without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against such resolution." The distinction between "sufficient" and "conclusive" evidence is pointed out by Jessel, M.R., in Re Horbury Bridge Coal, &c., Co. But the Companies Acts apply, and whether the company is governed by Table A or its own articles, either may be altered by a resolution passed in accordance with the provisions of section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, which provides that at any meeting mentioned in the section, unless a poll is demanded by at least five members, "a declaration of the chairman that the resolution has been carried shall be deemed to be conclusive evidence of the fact, without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against the same." No case decides what is meant by conclusive evidence in this section, but in Buckley on the Companies Acts a case is cited in which a declaration of a chairman that a resolution has been duly passed was held sufficient evidence that the resolution had been passed by a requisite majority, but it was not conclusive evidence where it was challenged by evidence to the contrary. What is meant is that primarily the declaration of the chairman is sufficient, without proof of number or proportion of votes. That is a reasonable construction, and does not mean that it is conclusive if the evidence shows that the number and proportion of votes was in fact not proper. To hold otherwise would enable a chairman to make a fraudulent declaration, if he so wished, without check. That could not be meant, and the wording of the 51st section of the Act helps this view, as it provides that the declaration should be "deemed conclusive," and not "conclusive" alone. The 18th section of the Act contains a similar declaration as to incorporation, upon which there are decisions which show that the court is at liberty to allow parties to dispute the conclusiveness of the evidence, as, for instance, Re Northumberland and Durham District Banking Co., 6 W. R. 527, 2 De. G. & J. 357. To what extent is another question. In my opinion the decision of the chairman does not prevent my inquiring how far the provisions of the Act have been complied with. In this case, the particular meeting was a most important one—namely, for the purpose of altering the regulations of the company. It was therefore highly desirable that all the members should be told what was about to be done at the meeting. The notice convening the meeting was in general terms. I think it would have been better if an explanatory circular had been sent, but the notice said that members were at liberty to inspect the proposed regulations at the office of the solicitors to the company. Practically, shareholders generally leave the management of the company in the hands of the executive, and take no particular interest in the company's meetings. It would probably be a waste of both time and expense to send copies of the proposed regulations to each member. I think, therefore, that the notice sent in this case was sufficient to bind the members. Then as to the question of the sufficiency of the majority to pass the resolution. It appears from the evidence that as a matter of fact unless one vote had been counted, which was the vote of a person who could not properly vote, the requisite majority did not vote for the resolutions, and therefore they were not duly passed. I must therefore grant the injunction asked for.

May 5.

SPIERS & POND (LIMITED) (Appellants) v. BENNETT (Respondent). (a.)

Adulteration—Milk—Abstraction of cream—Disclosure—Notice—Criminal intent—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 9, 25.

The appellants were charged under section 9 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, with having unlawfully sold milk from which the fat had been abstracted to the extent of 17 per cent. without disclosing such alteration. They were supplied with milk in a can under a contract which contained a warranty as to the purity of the milk. Part of this milk was poured into a churn, and in so doing a large proportion of the cream remained in the can. The prosecutor was served with a glass of milk from this churn, and on being submitted to analysis it was proved to be deficient in cream to the amount of 17 per cent. On the glass in which the milk was served it was stated that it was "not guaranteed as new or pure milk or with all its cream, see notice." The notice was to the effect that the milk was purchased by the appellants under a warranty, but that they were unable to guarantee it as with all its cream, and did not sell it as such.

Held, that the appellants had done all that was reasonable; that they had made a sufficient disclosure within the meaning of section 9, and had substantially complied with the statute. It is not necessary to establish a mens rea for the purpose of the offence under the section, and if the article is in fact altered and is sold without a disclosure, an offence under the section is committed.

This was a case stated by A. C. Plowden, Esq., police-court magistrate sitting at Clerkenwell.

On the 1st of November, 1895, a complaint was preferred by A. Bennett, the respondent, sanitary inspector to the Holborn District Board of Works, against Spiers & Pond, Limited, the appellants, under section 9 of the sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, charging them with having unlawfully sold milk from which the fat had been abstracted to the extent of 17 per cent. without disclosing to the purchaser such abstraction or alteration, contrary to the provisions of section 9 of the above Act.

The magistrate convicted the appellants. At the hearing of the complaint the following facts were proved.

The appellants were refreshment contractors carrying on business at Farringdon-street Station and other places. On the 25th of September, 1895, the respondent entered the said premises and purchased a glass of milk. The milk was poured out of a churn standing on the counter into a glass and handed to the respondent. The churn was so constructed that no milk would flow from the tap unless and until by pressing a knob at the top of the vessel a "dasher" descended to the bottom, the object of this arrangement being that the milk and cream therein should be kept properly mixed together. On the glass handed to the respondent were distinctly written the following words: "Not guaranteed as new or pure milk or with all its cream, see notice." On the counter was placed a framed notice in the following words: "Milk Notice. Spiers & Pond, Limited, purchase all milk sold by them under a warranty of its purity and genuine quality, and take all possible precautions to ensure its supply to their customers in proper condition, but they are unable to guarantee it as either new, pure, or with all its cream, and (to meet the requirements of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act) do not therefore sell it as such." The respondent saw the writing on the glass whilst in the act of dividing the milk for analysis, and the notice on the counter immediately afterwards. The milk on being submitted to analysis proved to be deficient in cream to the amount of 17 per cent.

It was proved that the only milk supplied to the appellants' said refreshment rooms was supplied to them by the London and Provincial Dairy Co.; that on the morning of the said 25th of September four quarts of milk were delivered in a can; that the appellants' assistant poured into the churn the contents of the can until the churn was full, the milk remaining in the can being sent down into the kitchen. The milk was supplied to the appellants under a contract which contained the following warranty by the said dairy company: "We, the undersigned, hereby warrant that all milk that shall be supplied by us to you shall be new milk, in good condition, pure, and unadulterated, in the same state as when taken from the cow, without the addition of water or any other substance and without the abstraction of cream or any other constituent part of the milk." The magistrate held, as a matter of fact, that the milk supplied to the respondent had been delivered to the appellants under the said contract and that they had no reason to believe it was otherwise than of the nature, substance, and quality demanded; but he was of opinion that the notices were only in the nature of a refusal to guarantee the quality of the milk, and did not therefore constitute a sufficient disclosure of the alteration within the meaning of the section. He was also of opinion that the warranty was too general to bring it within the protection of section 25, and that even if it were sufficiently specific the appellants had nevertheles failed to show that they sold the milk to the respondent in the same state as they had purchased it, as required by section 25, and he accordingly convicted the appellants.

The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, provides as follows:—

9. "No person shall, with the intent that the same may be sold in its altered state, without notice, abstract from an article of food any part of it so as to affect injuriously its quality, substance, or nature, and no person shall sell any article so altered without making disclosure of the alteration, under a penalty in each case not exceeding twenty pounds."

25. "If the defendant in any prosecution under this Act prove to the satisfaction of the justices or court that he had purchased the article in question as the same in nature, substance, and quality as that demanded of him by the prosecutor, and with a written warranty to that effect, that he had no reason to believe at the time when he sold it that the article was otherwise, and that he sold it in the same state as when he purchased it, he shall be discharged from the prosecution, but shall be liable to pay the costs incurred by the prosecutor unless he shall have given due notice to him that he will rely on the above defence."

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C. (Grain and Foa with him), for the appellants.—The appellants do not come within section 9. There is no evidence of their having abstracted anything from the milk, and it is not even suggested that they had any knowledge of an alteration. In consequence of the case of Dyke v. Gower, [1892] 1 Q. B. 220, 40 W. R. Dig. 6, the appellants have now adopted the course they have here taken as regards the notices they display. It is quite clear that the first part of the section requires a criminal intention to be shown. The section cannot be read as two sections; therefore a mens rea must be shown in the second half, which must read as if it ran "with the aforementioned intention." Disclosure means stating that which one knows. One cannot therefore disclose that which one does not know. There can, further, be no offence under section 9 unless the article be sold without notice. But a notice was given here, and a reasonable disclosure made within the meaning of the section.

[Counsel was stopped by the court.]

Channell, Q.C. (Courthorpe-Munroe, and J. R. Atkin with him), for the respondent.—The prosecution being under the latter part of section 9, it is not necessary to show a mens rea. Section 9 is rightly interpreted in Dyke v. Gower. The appellants did not disclose an alteration here; all they said was that they did not guarantee the article. That is not what the Act requires. In order to protect himself the retailer must disclose what the alteration is. It is not necessary to declare the exact percentage of the alteration, but it is necessary to declare that the milk is altered.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C.—As to what is sufficient notice and what is required, there have been decisions under sections 6 and 8: Gage v. Elsey, 31 W. R. 500, 10 Q. B D. 518; Pope v. Tearle, 22 W. R. 950, L. R. 9 C. P. 499.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—I should be very reluctant to say anything which will have the effect of in any way interfering with the enforcement in all proper cases of a very salutary Act, but I cannot help thinking that in this case the zeal of the inspector outran his discretion, and that, looking at the whole of the circumstances of this case, as they were perhaps not fully known to him or realized by him when the prosecution was begun, he certainly might well have been advised to abandon it when the circumstances did fully transpire; because I do not think it is possible to doubt that Messrs. Spiers & Pond did all that any reasonable trader dealing with such an article as this, and selling it under the circumstances in which they did sell it, could reasonably be expected to do, to comply with the provisions of this Act. That, however, does not dispose of the question, because we have still to determine whether, although they did all that they could to comply with the provisions of the Act, they have in fact complied with the Act. In other words, whether in this case there was evidence upon which the magistrate was justified in arriving at the conclusion to convict them of the offence. No precise point is reserved for us, but, after stating the facts and contentions on each side, the learned magistrate reserved for the opinion of the court the question whether the appellants were legally or properly convicted of the offence. It therefore becomes necessary in order to make intelligible my view of the case that I should shortly recapitulate the facts.

Messrs. Spiers & Pond have a contract with a dairy company for the supply of pure milk, which contract contains a very precise warranty on the part of the vendor that the milk shall be delivered in its pure and natural condition and without abstraction of any of its valuable properties. Under that contract a small quantity was delivered at one of their establishments in a vessel. One of their employees took the vessel and poured out of it enough to fill a churn, and poured the rest into a jug which was taken down into the kitchen and applied for other purposes. Customers who come to be supplied with milk are served from this churn, which is so constructed that, before milk can be poured into a glass or cup for the customer, automatically by pressing a knob at the top of the vessel the dasher is put into operation, the effect of which is that that dasher moves up and down, and so in that way there is a mechanical contrivance by which the milk can be made to be delivered all of about the same quality.

The magistrate in this case has come to the conclusion that there was an abstraction from this milk of some of its cream. I confess on that point of the case we are left rather to grope about in the dark. But what I can gather from the statement of the learned counsel and on reference to the shorthand notes of the evidence before the magistrate is this—that it is supposed that the person who poured part of the milk in the first instance from the vessel into the churn, and the residue subsequently into a jug, so that the residue might be brought down into the kitchen, so poured it out that the effect was that a larger proportion of the cream remained in the vessel and so was poured into the jug which went into the kitchen, than went into the churn for the purpose of supplying the customers. I confess that that seems to me to be a point of fact as to which I should, if I had had to decide the case as the magistrate did, have wanted fuller and more detailed evidence; because it is quite clear that if this milk was brought there fresh by the dairyman and was dealt with at once, no kind of manipulation would have affected the fatty proportions of the milk, and it could only be in the event of the milk having stood a long time that that could be accomplished.

I take it, in view of the statement referred to by the learned counsel for the respondents in this case, we must assume that it was admitted that in fact an abstraction had taken place, and that that abstraction amounted to an alteration of the milk within the meaning of the second part of section 9 of the Act. I do not feel called upon at all to express any opinion upon the cases which have been adverted to under the section; but I feel no doubt, that for the purpose of the offence under that section the mens rea is not necessary to be established, and I think that if the article which was in fact altered by abstraction was sold without disclosure, it would constitute an offence under the second part of that section. As to what constitutes an abstraction, I confess I feel very considerable difficulty in realizing that it is an abstraction within the meaning of that Act if, dealing with a commodity of this kind in the usual and ordinary way, and not omitting to observe any reasonable or customary method of equalizing the distribution of the fatty particles of the milk, it so happened that a portion of the milk sold in the evening contained a percentage less than that sold earlier, that that was an abstraction under the first or latter part of that section. However, that is not the point with which, as I have said, we have to deal.

I now come to the point which is, as I conceive, the real point in this case. Can it be said, because it is for the defendants on the information or complaint to establish that, and the onus is upon them, that they made adequate disclosure of the alteration within the meaning of the latter part of section 9. Now on the whole, not without some hesitation, because of the precision of the section itself, I have come to the conclusion that Messrs. Spiers & Pond made a disclosure of the alteration. It is conceded that they are not bound to disclose the precise character of the alteration. It is conceded that they are not bound to say: "This milk has had abstracted from it 10 per cent., 20 per cent., or 30 per cent. of the fatty particles," or they are not bound to say that this milk is so much below the normal standard—all that is conceded; but it is contended that they are bound to make a disclosure of the alteration. Now, what have they done, and does that or does not that amount to a disclosure of the alteration? In the first instance, on the vessel in which the customer gets the article which he demands these words are put, "Not guaranteed as new or pure milk, or with all its cream; see notice." I agree that that does not amount to much more than saying: Take notice, I am not guaranteeing this as new milk; I am not guaranteeing it as pure milk; and I am not guaranteeing it with all its cream. It is, however, saying: There may be an alteration in it; to what extent there is an alteration, or how caused, or if in fact there is an alteration, I cannot be quite certain; but if there is an alteration I am giving you notice to look out for it. The other notice seems to me to go further, although it is quite true, as the learned counsel for the respondent has said, that a part at least of this notice was probably framed with reference to another section of the Act. The notice says: "Messrs. Spiers & Pond (Limited) purchase all milk sold by them under a warranty of its purity and genuine quality, and take all possible precautions to ensure its supply to their customers in proper condition." There is no reason on the facts of this case to doubt that that is true and that they have done that. Then the notice says: "But they are unable to guarantee it as either new or pure, or with all its cream"—that seems to me to be significant—"and, to meet the requirements of the Food and Drugs Act, do not therefore sell it as such." Does not that in common sense mean: "We are dealing with an article as to the exact condition of which at the moment of the sale it is impossible to predicate what its exact condition is; but we give you notice that we deliver it to you as we get it, taking all precautions to ensure its supply to you in proper condition, and we do not sell it to you as milk which has not had subtracted from it some of its important properties." That may not be in express terms, or what the literal terms of the statute may seem to require, but I do think it would be a very slavish adherence to the letter and an utter disregard to the provisions of this statute if we were to say that under such circumstances a man who had acted in this way and who had given this notice was to be held to be liable to a penalty for doing the act complained of, as if he had made no disclosure and had given no notice. My hesitation which I have expressed proceeds solely from the words of the statute, and I do not think we are doing any violence to the operative object and spirit of the statute in holding in this case that it has been substantially complied with, and that therefore the magistrate was wrong in convicting.

My learned brother refers me to the section and to the expression which I have used as to the onus of proof resting upon the party complained of. That is by no means clear.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion in every respect.

Corporation—Bye-law—Validity of—Betting—Bye-law prohibiting betting in a street or public place—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 23.

A bye-law made by a borough council under section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, was in the following terms: "Any person who shall frequent and use any street or other public place within the borough of Wolverhampton, either on behalf of himself or of any other person, for the purposes of bookmaking and betting or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager, with any person shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5."

Held, that the bye-law was not unreasonable; and that a person who frequented and used a street in said borough for the purpose of carrying on the business of betting was liable to be convicted under such bye-law, even though he did not in fact thereby create any obstruction or nuisance.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for the borough of Wolverhampton, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33.

Under the powers conferred on them by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 23, the Borough Council of Wolverhampton made the following bye-law: "Any person who shall frequent and use any street or other public place within the borough of Wolverhampton, either on behalf of himself or of any other person, for the purpose of bookmaking and betting or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager, with any person shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5."

Two informations were filed against the respondent for unlawfully frequenting and using a certain street and a certain public place for the purpose of bookmaking and betting, contrary to the bye-law.

The magistrate dismissed both informations, upon the ground that the bye-law imposed a restriction, which was not consistent with the statute or common law, upon a legal calling, and upon the ground that the Corporation had no power to impose such a restriction, and that the bye-law was ultra vires and void. The magistrates found as a fact that the respondent did not cause any obstruction or nuisance.

Bosanquet, Q.C. (C. W. Mathews with him), for the appellant, was stopped by the Lord Chief Justice, who said that the court had recently decided in favour of a similar bye-law.

H. E. Richards (Jelf, Q.C., with him), for the respondent.—If the bye-law adjudicated upon were identical with the one in question, it would be useless to proceed with the argument. [Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The words were: "If any person or persons shall assemble with any other person or persons," &c.] That case could be distinguished, because an assembly of persons was likely to cause an obstruction; but mere walking in the streets would not cause an obstruction. Betting is not illegal—not even the business of betting. In Thwaites v. Coulthwaite, ante, p. 295, [1896] 1 Ch. 496, Chitty, J., made an order for an account in a bookmaking partnership on the ground that it was a business that might be conducted in a legal manner. In Partridge v. Mallandaine, 35 W. R. 276, 18 Q. B. D. 276, a betting business was assessed for income tax. In Strickland v. Hayes, ante, p. 398, [1896] 1 Q. B. 290, Lindley, L.J., held that under the Municipal Corporations Act the local authority had no power to create new offences by means of bye-laws. The bye-law was not necessary for the good rule and government of the borough, and was therefore not valid: Macdonald v. Lochrane, 51 J. P. 629.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—In my judgment the magistrate was wrong. Authorities dealing with other bye-laws have very little weight or use in assisting the court to adjudicate upon a particular bye-law. I will make this observation upon Strickland v. Hayes: when Lindley, L.J., is reported to have said in that case that a bye-law could not create a new offence, he cannot have meant that the scope of bye-laws should be restricted to acts which were already offences against the criminal law, because that would be to restrict bye-laws to merely providing some form of summary machinery for the punishment of offences which already existed.

This bye-law purports to be made under section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which provides that the local authority shall have power to make bye-laws "for the good rule and government of the borough, and for the suppression of nuisances." The learned counsel says that there must be some limitation to that power. It must be limited to bye-laws useful for the good rule and government of the borough. What, then, was the object of this bye-law? And was it necessary or useful for the good rule and government of the borough? One cannot for a moment doubt that it was not intended to apply to casual betting in the streets, but it was intended to prevent men who made betting their business, from using the streets for that purpose to the likely annoyance of passers-by. It would be impossible under this bye-law, as it was suggested by counsel, to convict a person who, while walking in a street for other purposes, happened to make a bet with another person.

PEEBLES v. OSWALDTWISTLE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Death of plaintiff—Survival of cause of action—Action of mandamus—Statutory duty—Right of executors to continue action—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 17, rr. 1, 4.

An action was brought by the owner of a mill against a local authority for a mandamus commanding the defendants to make proper sewers in accordance with section 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and to give facilities for carrying the plaintiff's liquid refuse into the sewers under their control in accordance with section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876. The plaintiff having died while the action was pending,

Held, that the cause of action survived, and that the executors of the plaintiff were entitled to an order allowing them to continue the action.

Appeal from an order of Kennedy, J., allowing the executors of the deceased plaintiff to continue the action.

The plaintiff, who was the owner of certain mills within the district of the defendants, brought the action for a mandamus commanding the defendants to cause to be made such sewers as might be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of the Public Health Act, 1875, and to give facilities for enabling the plaintiff to carry the liquids proceeding from his factories or manufacturing processes into the sewers under their control.

By section 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875, "Every local authority shall keep in repair all sewers belonging to them, and shall cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this Act."

By section 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, "Every sanitary or other local authority having sewers under their control shall give facilities for enabling manufacturers within their district to carry the liquids proceeding from their factories or manufacturing processes into such sewers."

The plaintiff having died after the commencement of the action, his executors applied under ord. 17, r. 4, for an order that they should be substituted for the original plaintiff, and that the proceedings should be carried on between them and the defendants. The plaintiff had by his will devised his mills to his executors, and directed them to carry on his business.

Kennedy, J., granted the application.

The defendants appealed.

C. C. Scott (Danckwerts with him), for the defendants.—There was no jurisdiction to make this order. Ord. 17, r. 1, says that a cause or matter shall not become abated by reason of the death of any of the parties, if the cause of action survive or continue, But this is not a case of a surviving cause of action, and the rule actio personalis moritur cum persona applies. That of which the plaintiff complained is not a breach of contract, but is an alleged wrongful act, and there is nothing to bring the case within the exception to the general rule which was laid down in Phillips v. Homfray, 32 W. R. 6, 24 Ch. D. 439.

C. A. Russell (Bigham, Q.C., with him), for the executors of the deceased plaintiff.—In a note to the case of Wheatley v. Lane, 1 Wms. Saunders, 216a, it is said that the rule actio personalis moritur cum persona "was never extended to such personal actions as were founded upon any obligation, contract, debt, covenant, or any other duty to be performed; for there the action survived." Here the action has been brought not to recover damages, but to enforce the performance of a duty. The learned judge rightly thought that this action ought not to be treated as a mere action of tort. In Jones v. Simes, 43 Ch. D. 607, 38 W. R. Dig. 158, an action for a mandatory injunction and damages for obstruction of light was held to survive on the death of the plaintiff.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiff brought this action to enforce a statutory duty which he alleged to be on the defendants. We need not now decide whether such duty existed. The plaintiff then died. The question is whether the duty died with him. If the duty existed, it was a duty which they owed to him in respect of property belonging to him. It seems to me that it is right for us to say that, if they owed him this duty, his property is just as much in want of the performance of the duty as it was before his death, and that therefore his executors are entitled to enforce the performance of it against the defendants just as the plaintiff himself could have done. I think that the order of the learned judge cannot be interfered with.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff alleged a duty on the part of the defendants under the Public Health Act and Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, and he brought an action of mandamus. While the action was pending he died. Can his executors be made parties to the action under order 17? The question is: Does this cause of action survive? In the note in Wms. Saunders, to which we have been referred, it is said that it was a principle of the common law that if an injury were done either to the person or property of another for which damages only could be recovered, the rule actio personalis moritur cum persona applied. But in the same note it is said that this rule was never extended to such personal actions as were founded upon any obligation, contract, debt, covenant, or any other duty to be performed. It is argued that this cause of action does not survive, because the duty to be performed here is a statutory duty, not a duty arising from contract. I think, however, that Kennedy, J., was right. The decision in Jones v. Simes seems to me to be applicable to this case.

Re THE LANDS SECURITIES CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Scheme of arrangement—Construction of scheme—Discount, Meaning of.

Expressions in a document addressed to commercial men should be construed in the sense in which ordinary men of business would understand them. Accordingly the words "discount at the rate of 4 per cent." in a scheme of arrangement and compromise with creditors were held to mean discount in the popular sense—viz., a rebate of interest on the amounts.

Appeal from Vaughan Williams, J.

The facts will be found fully set out in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., and it is only necessary to state here that under a scheme of arrangement or compromise with creditors sanctioned by the court, it was provided that, in addition to the calls already made by the liquidator in the winding up, the remainder of the uncalled capital should be called up by instalments spreading over four years, and an option was given to every shareholder to pay up calls in advance at a discount of 4 per cent.

A question was raised by a shareholder (Mr. Farquhar) as to whether the word "discount" meant discount at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum on the total amount of each instalment as it became due, or true discount—viz., such sum as would at 4 per cent. produce the amount of the instalments of the call when they became due.

Vaughan Williams, J., held that it meant true discount, and not discount in the popular sense.

The shareholder appealed from this decision.

Younger, for the appellant. — The word "discount" must be understood to have the meaning it would have under ordinary circumstances. The rate of 4 per cent. is so high that the present value cannot be meant.

He referred to the Century Dictionary; the Succession Duty Act, 1853, s. 4; the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, rule 21, schedule 2; and 7 Geo. 1, c. 1, s. 31.

Kirby, contra.—The definitions of true discount, as opposed to bankers' discount or rebate of interest, can be found in ordinary text-books like Colenso's Arithmetic. If discount be not taken in the sense of true discount, persons paying in advance will be unduly benefited.

He also referred to the definition of discount in Wharton's Law Dictionary, 3rd ed. [Younger pointed out that the words relied on were omitted in the latest edition.]

Younger was not called on to reply.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The point before us is a very simple one, but, like many other simple points, it is not so easy of solution as it is easy of statement. We have to consider a clause in a scheme of arrangement between the debenture-holders and the creditors of the Land Securities Co. It appears that the Land Securities Co. was in such a state of indebtedness that very heavy calls had to be made, and a scheme of arrangement was come to, the important portions of which I will read. Clause 1 is that in addition to the call of £1 per share already made, a call be made on the remainder of the uncalled capital of £25 per share. That, of course, is a heavy call. Clause 2 says that the call of £25 per share may be paid by instalments of £2 per share payable at intervals of three months. That runs over a very considerable period—from the 2nd of August, 1894, to the 30th of September, 1898. It would take four years to pay that call of £25 per share by quarterly instalments of £2 per share. Then comes clause 3, on which everything turns—that an option be given to every shareholder to pay up the total calls or any portion thereof in the order of due date, under discount at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, the instalments being taken as payable at the above dates."

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now, a controversy has arisen as to what is meant by the expression "under discount at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum." The liquidator says that it means this: "If any shareholder desires to prepay his call, he must pay me such a sum as, at interest at 4 per cent., will amount to the total amount of the call which he will have to pay of £25 per share." In other words, he says: "I must calculate the present values of these instalments." He has done so; and the result is that a very considerable sum has become payable from Mr. Farquhar, the appellant, who had the misfortune to hold 3,500 shares; £25 per share comes to £87,500, and the present value of that, calculated as I have suggested, amounts to £80,790, and that sum the appellant has paid. Now the appellant says, "I have overpaid you £650; this clause 3 does not mean that I am to pay you such a sum as, if invested at 4 per cent., would produce the total amount of £87,500, but I am to be allowed a rebate of 4 per cent. upon the payments I should have made; and that sum, if you add it up, is £652 12s. less than the sum I have paid to the liquidator."

Now, it appears that this expression "under discount at the rate of 4 per cent." is open to some little ambiguity. It may mean either one thing or the other; and the question is, What would any ordinary business man understand by this scheme? I apprehend that whatever would be the meaning put upon this expression by ordinary business people is the meaning to be put upon it. Now, it strikes me, I confess, that any ordinary business man—any person accustomed to deal with companies or anything of that kind — would understand the expression "under discount at 4 per cent." in the ordinary commercial sense; that is to say, "I shall pay you the amount less 4 per cent. interest," and his mind would not run on the present value. On the other hand, I agree that an actuary of an insurance company would adopt the calculation which the liquidator has adopted here; but when you look at the form of this clause 3, and the rate of 4 per cent., and when you bear in mind that 4 per cent. cannot easily be made, at all events by investment, it strikes me that a person reading this would be led off the consideration of the present value, and would be led on to the ordinary business meaning of the phrase. Vaughan Williams, J., seems to admit that; but then he says he thinks that mode of calculation would produce an unfair inequality between those who can pay and avail themselves of this option, and those who cannot. But it is obvious that this option was held out to the shareholders as an inducement to them to pay earlier. The liquidator's position is this. He had debentures bearing interest, on an average, at 4 per cent., and I do not doubt that it would be better for the debenture-holders that this discount should be calculated on the present value theory rather than on the rebate theory. But we must come back to the question, What would an ordinary person understand by these words? I cannot think that the supposed inequality is a sufficient justification for departing from the meaning which anybody would put upon them. I must say I think that the rebate principle is the correct one. I think anybody reading this document, and coming to this arrangement upon these terms, would so understand it; and I think that is the true construction of the document and the one which we ought to abide by. I think, therefore, that Vaughan Williams, J., was wrong in this matter, and that his first impression was the right one.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, What is the meaning in clause 3 of the words "under discount at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum"? The liquidator says it is to be calculated on the present value. On the other hand, it is said by Mr. Farquhar, who is, no doubt, very much interested in the matter, that it must be taken on the commercial value.

Now, what would really be the understanding of ordinary persons in business who came into contact with this clause 3? In my judgment there is not one in a hundred who would come to any other conclusion than that it really meant a rebate of 4 per cent. for early payment. Of course, the early payment was the inducement held out, and the shareholders would understand by this that if they made this early payment they would have a rebate of 4 per cent. per annum. As was observed during the argument, if it was intended to be calculated on the present value, 4 per cent. could not be the rate of the present value, and there would be an inconsistency in the very terms of the clause. I am strongly of opinion that the proper mode of construing these words is to attribute to them the meaning of a rebate at the rate of 4 per cent., and I am unable therefore to agree with the conclusion at which Vaughan Williams, J., has arrived.

KAY, L.J.—This document embodying the scheme, which it seems the court approved, is essentially a commercial document, and the question is, What, in a commercial document of this kind, is the meaning of "under discount at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum"? The scheme provides for the payment of £25 per share by instalments which are to be paid every three months, and to extend over four years altogether. Then it provides that any shareholder may, if he likes, pay the amount due on his shares in advance, "under discount at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum."

Now, what is the ordinary commercial meaning of these words? I entirely agree that in a document of this kind the meaning of these words is that, and that only, which an ordinary commercial man, reading this document, would be likely to attribute to them. I confess I come to the conclusion, without a doubt, that the ordinary commercial meaning of these words is this: "If you pay me that which is due from you in advance, you shall have a rebate at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum for the payment in advance." The learned judge says at the commencement of his judgment: "I am bound to come to the conclusion that discount is an equivocal word." [His lordship read an extract from the judgment, and continued:—] I really cannot follow that. I cannot understand on what possible ground there should be any bias in favour of the creditors and against the shareholders. The question is, What is the meaning of the document? Why are we, if there be a case of ambiguity, to lean in favour of one side more than the other? I adopt entirely that which the learned judge says, that the primâ facie meaning of these words is a rebate such as I have described. This is a document addressed to commercial men, and that is the commercial meaning; and that which the persons to whom it is addressed would primâ facie understand to be the meaning of those words is, unless there is something to alter it in the context, the meaning the court ought to attribute to them.

So far, therefore, I venture to agree with the judgment of the learned judge; but then he goes on and gives his reason. If I understand the language which he used, both during the argument and in the judgment, the reason which is the convincing reason with the learned judge is that what was intended obviously was that each shareholder should pay the present value of his call, and that if you make him pay anything else you create an inequality between the shareholders who can pay in advance and those who cannot pay in advance. I understand that, and I should see the force of it if this document did provide for the present value on either construction. But it does not. It provides for the payment in advance "under discount at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum." This was in the year 1894, and 4 per cent. was not the value of money at that time. Therefore it did not contemplate paying the present value at that time of the calls which the shareholders had to pay; and there goes at once, the main reason upon which this judgment of the learned judge seems to be founded. I therefore, with great deference, dissent entirely. I do not think this is a case in which the construction ought to have any bias either in favour of the creditors or in favour of the shareholders. The question is, What is the real meaning of these words addressed to commercial men? I think the real meaning is that which I have indicated, a rebate of interest; and I think the other reason which the learned judge gives, when it is examined, does not exist at all, and an attempt to support the judgment on that ground would be, in my humble judgment, an utter fallacy. I think therefore, with great deference, that this decision must be reversed, and the appeal be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

THE COMMITTEE OF LONDON CLEARING BANKERS v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Commissioners of Customs—Transfer order to by merchant—Whether or not a bill of exchange—Sole purpose of remitting money—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 32, and schedule "Bill of Exchange," exemption (10).

The goods of A., a merchant, being subject to the payment of customs duty, A. gave to the revenue officer a document addressed to the cashier of the Bank of England, drawn and signed by B. & Co., his bankers, which was in the following terms: "Transfer from our account to the account of the Commissioners of Customs £225 16s. 7d." (the amount payable in respect of the duty payable in respect of A.'s goods). On the receipt of such document the revenue officer cleared the goods.

Held, that such document was a bill of exchange payable on demand within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 32, and that it did not fall within the exemption (10) as being drawn for the sole purpose of remitting money to be placed to an account of public revenue.

This was an appeal by the Committee of London Clearing Bankers against the decision of a divisional court, and raised the question whether certain transfer orders were bills of exchange within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 32, and, if so, whether they were liable to the payment of stamp duty either at the fixed rate of one penny or ad valorem. On the 25th of October, 1894, two instruments were presented on behalf of the Committee of London Clearing Bankers to the Commissioners for their opinion as to the duty with which they were chargeable. The following is a copy of one of such instruments:—

"046,713. "Public Revenue.

"London, Aug. 31, 1894.

"To the Cashiers of the Bank of England.

"Transfer from our account to the account of the Commissioners of Customs,

"Two hundred and twenty-five pounds sixteen shillings and sevenpence. (£225 16s. 7d.)

"On account of Barclay, Bevan, Tritton, Ransom, Bouverie, & Co. W. B. PEARMAN."

This instrument bore upon it two impressions of the words "duty paid" from a rubber stamp, being the official mark of an officer of Customs.

The other instrument was in the same form, but it was for a different amount, was not stamped "duty paid," and was crossed "Bank of England."

When the instruments were presented for adjudication the commissioners were informed by Messrs. Murray, Hutchins, Stirling, & Co., with respect to the first instrument, that it was a transfer order of Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, Tritton, Ransom, Bouverie, & Co. from their account with the Bank of England, to the account of the Commissioners of Customs with the Bank of England, and that this order was handed by Messrs. Barclay & Co. to a customer in exchange for his cheque on them for the amount of customs duty on goods requiring to be cleared at the Custom House, and was handed by the customer to the Commissioners of Customs, by whom it was delivered to the Bank of England; and, with respect to the second instrument, that it was a similar transfer order, which was delivered by Messrs. Barclay & Co. to an officer of Customs in exchange for their customer's cheque on them for the amount of customs duty on other goods requiring to be cleared, and that this order was delivered by the Commissioners of Customs to the Bank of England. On the 9th of August, 1894, the commissioners of Inland Revenue issued a circular to bankers, of which the following is a copy:—

"The attention of the Board of Inland Revenue has been drawn to the fact that certain bankers, when passing money to the account of that revenue by draft of transfer from an account at the Bank of England or by ordinary draft, omit to stamp the draft. The Board conceive that the omission arises from a misapprehension of the terms and effect of exemption 10, under the head 'Bill of Exchange,' in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, and desire to point out that that exemption is confined to the remittance of money which is money standing to a revenue account prior to remittance, and that they will not accept any such draft as above referred to when unstamped."

(a.) Reported by W. SCOTT THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The commissioners expressed their opinion that each of the instruments was a bill of exchange payable on demand within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, and was liable to be stamped with the duty of one penny.

The Committee of London Clearing Bankers declared themselves dissatisfied with the determination of the commissioners, on the grounds, first, that the instruments are not bills of exchange within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891; and, secondly, that, if they are, they fall within exemption No. 10, under the head "Bill of Exchange," in the first schedule to that Act, in favour of "bill drawn in the United Kingdom for the sole purpose of remitting money to be placed to any account of public revenue," and they required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the court, which was accordingly done.

By section 32 of the Stamp Act, 1891: "For the purposes of this Act the expression 'bill of exchange' includes draft, order, cheque, and letter of credit, and any document or writing (except a banknote) entitling or purporting to entitle any person, whether named therein or not, to payment by any other person of, or to draw upon any other person for, any sum of money; and the expression 'bill of exchange payable on demand' includes (a) an order for the payment of any sum of money by a bill of exchange or promissory note in satisfaction of any sum of money, or for the payment of any sum of money out of any particular fund which may or may not be available, or upon any condition or contingency which may or not be performed or happen; and (b) an order for the payment of any sums of money weekly, monthly, or at any other stated periods, and also an order for the payment by any person at any time after the date thereof of any sum of money, and sent or delivered by the person making the same to the person by whom the payment is to be made, and not to the person to whom the payment is to be made, or to any person on his behalf."

By the schedule to the said Act, under the heading "Bill of Exchange payable on demand or at sight or on presentation" a fixed duty of one penny is imposed; and under the heading "Bill of Exchange of any other kind whatsoever (except a banknote) and promissory note of any kind whatsoever (except a banknote), drawn or expressed to be payable, or actually paid, or endorsed, or in any manner actually negotiated in the United Kingdom" certain ad valorem duties are imposed. There then follow certain exemptions, of which the tenth is in the following terms:—

"(10) Bill drawn in the United Kingdom for the sole purpose of remitting money to be placed to any account of public revenue."

The Divisional Court held that the documents in question were bills of exchange payable on demand, and that they did not fall within exemption 10.

The committee appealed.

Cohen, Q.C., and Tindal Atkinson, for the committee.—It must be shown by clear and unambiguous language that these transfer orders are subject to duty: Oriental Bank Corporation v. Wright, 5 App. Cas., at p. 856, 29 W. R. Dig. 35; Partington v. Attorney-General, L. R. 4 E. & I. App., at p. 122 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 1. These orders are not bills of exchange within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891. A transfer from one account to another is not a payment of money: Buck v. Robson, 26 W. R. 804, 3 Q. B. D. 686. The words "entitling or purporting to entitle" any person to payment in section 32 solely refer to documents which will be honoured—that is to say, as to which there is an undertaking to honour them. Here there is no warranty that these orders will be honoured at all. If it should be held that these documents are bills of exchange payable on demand, then we say that they fall within exemption (10) contained in the schedule to the Act. The money in question is clearly intended to be and is in fact remitted to the account of public revenue.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Danckwerts, for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.—On the question whether these documents are bills of exchange within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, we submit that section 32 is merely an interpretation clause. Section 1 is the charging section; section 32 merely describes two classes of documents. The words are wider than they are in section 3 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, defining what, for the purposes of that Act, are bills of exchange. Sub-section (a) of section 32 was intended to meet cases like Buck v. Robson. Looking to the object of this statute, it is idle to contend that these documents are not cheques: Thorne v. Smith, 10 C. B. 659; British Linen Co. v. Caledonian Insurance Co., 9 W. R. 581, 4 Macq. H. of L. 107, at p. 113. On the second point, as the real purpose for which the document is drawn is to clear the goods, how can it be said that it is drawn for the sole purpose of remitting money. The exemption refers to the remittance of money by a revenue officer to headquarters, it does not apply at all until the money is in the control of an officer on behalf of the Crown.

Cohen, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think we should gain anything by taking further time to look into the case. We have had it drawn to our attention, and are prepared, I think, to deal with it. I must say that after some little fluctuation of opinion I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the court below is right. One approaches it in this way. We are dealing with a stamp Act which says that bills of exchange are to be stamped. It divides bills of exchange into two classes, bills of exchange which are to be stamped with a penny stamp, and bills of exchange which are to be stamped with ad valorem stamps. The first are in the Act called bills of exchange payable on demand, and the second are called other bills of exchange.

Now, in order to apply that to practice, one must know what is meant, within the meaning of this Act, by the expression "bills of exchange"; one must know further what particular classes of documents which fall within that expression are to be stamped with a penny—i.e., are to be deemed payable on demand. That is the problem to be solved.

Now, in order to solve it you must look to section 32, which is the interpretation section, and it is divided into three sub-clauses. The first is a general one applicable as I understand it to the first question, What is a bill of exchange for the purposes of the Act? Then the second and third of the sub-clauses answer the other question, What is included in the term a bill of exchange payable on demand?

Now the first part of section 32 says: [His lordship read it down to the words "any sum of money."] Now stop there. It is obvious when you come to look at these words with a little attention that the words include documents which would not be called bills of exchange either at common law or under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. That answers the first question. All the documents mentioned are to be stamped. Now, the schedule to the Act shows a little more information is wanted. It is necessary to know what is to have the penny stamp and what is not. Therefore section 32 says "the expression 'bill of exchange payable on demand' (which I will convert into this—documents to bear a penny stamp—for that is what it means) includes" certain other things. Then there are directions for the penny stamp as distinguished from the ad valorem duties. I need not read clauses (a) and (b).

Now we have got to apply that construction, which I do not doubt is the true construction of this Act of Parliament, to the documents which are before us in this case. I will read the documents from the statement of the case. There are two documents, and the necessity for their use and the mode of using them has been explained. I will state it shortly as I understand it. A merchant has got some goods on which customs duties are payable. Well, it is against the rules for the Custom House officials to take cheques, and of course merchants do not carry cash in their pockets; so what they do is this (there are two ways of doing it). The merchant gives to the Custom House officer a cheque, and asks him to take it to the banker and get for it the transfer order No. 2, which I will read presently. The Custom House officer having got that document is in a position to release the goods. He treats that—and he is authorized to treat that document, although he is not authorized to so treat the cheque—as payment, and in that way no cash actually passes up to that point. The other way of doing it is this. The merchant takes his own cheque to his bankers, and asks them not to give him cash for the cheque but to give him transfer order No. 1. Having got that, the merchant goes to the Custom House officer and gets it stamped "duty paid." Then he gets his goods.

Now let us look at the documents, I do not think it is necessary to dwell upon the two different forms. The form is this: [His lordship read the transfer orders.] Now, what does that mean? It means this: Barclay, Bevan, & Co., say, "You, the Bank of England, have got in your books an account to the credit of us, Barclay, Bevan, that is to say you are our debtors; you have other customers (the Custom House Commissioners), and we ask you to transfer from our account to the account of the Commissioners £225."

Then they send that document, which within the terms of section 32 entitles a person (the Custom House Commissioners) to payment, or purports to entitle them to payment, or to draw upon the Bank of England for that sum of money. Whichever way you look at it, it strikes me that it is a document which falls within the description "Bill of exchange" within the Stamp Act; therefore, if I am right so far, it is taxable under the Act. I have not got so far yet as to say whether it is to be a penny or an ad valorem stamp. Now comes the next question—With what stamp is it to be stamped? If it is a bill of exchange at all, there can be no doubt that it is a bill payable on demand and is to be stamped with a penny, and not with an ad valorem stamp. So far I think it is tolerably plain, notwithstanding the very ingenious arguments which have been addressed to us, and the case of Buck v. Robson, which related to an equitable assignment.

Now we come to the next point, in which at first sight I confess that I thought—before I understood it—that there was more in it than I do now, namely, as to the exemptions. The exemptions in the schedule to the Act contain this: [His lordship read exemption 10.] Well, now, the word "sole," I confess, puts a difficulty in Mr. Cohen's way which I do not see an answer to now that I understand it, and I ask myself this—not as a lawyer, but as a business man, a person simply using business language—What is this thing drawn for? What is the real purpose with which it is drawn? Never mind the purposes to which it may be directed. The real purpose is to get the release of the goods upon which duty is payable. I cannot shut my eyes to that. The method of doing it is by obtaining a remission of money from one account to another; but when we are asked to say that this is a bill drawn "for the sole purpose of remitting" (even if it is remitting at all within the meaning of the Act) I cannot say that it is. It is not in point of fact (so far as I can understand it) "for the sole purpose" either in the first case or in the second. In the first case it is quite obviously not so, because it is the merchant who takes his own cheque and gets this document. What for? To enable him to get the goods. In the second case (which is more like the sole purpose) what does the Custom House officer take it for? He takes it as an authority to him to release the goods. He might take a cheque, no doubt, but he would get into a scrape if he did. He might take a cheque and get it cashed, but he does not want to do that. He wants to get an authority to release the goods, and that is what it is for. The bill in both cases is drawn for the purpose of obtaining the release of the goods; therefore I do not think that I can say that this is drawn for the sole purpose of remitting the money. Well, that settles that question.

There is another ground which the Attorney-General has pointed out for arriving at the same conclusion—that is, that if you look into the history of this exemption clause the real object of it is to allow an exemption from stamp duty when money has been collected by somebody whose duty it is to remit it to headquarters. I do not doubt that is the real truth of it, but, whichever way you look at it—whether you lay stress on the word "sole" (which to my mind makes it plain) or whether you lay stress on the word "remitting"—the conclusion is the same, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I will add my reasons very shortly. Mr. Cohen's very ingenious argument, first of all, was that section 32 has two branches—one which applies to a bill of exchange not payable on demand, and the other to bills of exchange payable on demand—and that the first part does not apply to a bill of exchange payable on demand at all. I confess I am not at all able to agree with that argument. The first part seems to me to be a definition for the purposes of the Act of bills of exchange quite generally, including both bills of exchange payable on demand and bills of exchange which are not payable on demand. Any one of the things in the first branch of that section includes bills of exchange payable on demand and bills of exchange not payable on demand. Then the second branch explains the words "on demand" to include certain cases as to which it might have been doubted, but for these words, whether they would come within the definition of "payable on demand." That, I think, is the function of the second part of the section; and unless that were so we should have this very odd result, that there is no definition in the Act at all of "bills of exchange payable on demand."

Well, then, in this case I quite agree that Mr. Cohen was right to lay principal stress upon the second of the two documents which are in contest before us now. The first of the two documents was obtained in this way. A merchant owes customs duty on goods which are in the hands of the Customs. He cannot get them freed without payment of duty. He goes to his bankers, draws a cheque for the amount, and gets from the bankers an order to transfer. He knows he cannot by merely handing a cheque to the Custom House people obtain a release of the goods, they are not entitled to take a cheque; but if he gets this order to transfer the amount of the duty from his account to the account of the Commissioners of Customs, then, when he puts that into the hands of the Custom House officer, he can get the release of his goods. That is the first step. The merchant goes himself to the bank, gets the transfer order, hands it to the Custom House officer, and thereupon obtains the release of the goods. The Custom House officer for his own purpose then hands that to the bank, and gets a transfer of the money from the account of the merchant to the account of the Commissioners.

The second case at first sight looks a little more favourable to Mr. Cohen's argument. The second case is where the merchant draws a cheque and takes the cheque to the Custom House officer; then the Custom House officer cannot release the goods on getting the cheque, but the Custom House officer takes the cheque to the bank and obtains a transfer order himself; and when he gets the transfer order, and not before, he treats himself as having been paid the duty, and then he gives the release of the goods. Those are the two transactions, and when they are examined, really, it seems to me, one of them is not the least more favourable to Mr. Cohen's contention than the other.

Now, looking at section 32, does this document, the transfer order, come within the words of it or not? The words include, amongst other things, "any document or writing, except a banknote, entitling or purporting to entitle any person, whether named therein or not, to payment by any other person of, or to draw upon any other person for, any sum of money." Now, why does not this entitle the Custom House officer who gets the transfer order to payment of the money therein mentioned? I think it does. If it does not, it certainly comes within the other branch, because the moment the transfer is effected the commissioners would have the right to draw upon their account increased by the amount of that transfer, and therefore it would entitle them to draw. Now, observe the words are only a document "entitling or purporting to entitle any person to draw." It may be (one can imagine such a case) that they never could draw by reason of their account being overdrawn for a larger amount before they got the transfer order; but that makes no difference whatever—the document would still be a document entitling them to draw if, according to the arrangement with their own particular bankers on their own account, they were able to draw. Therefore I have no doubt whatever that it comes within one or other branch of that part of section 32, and I, speaking for myself, should be rather inclined to say that it was a document entitling the Commissioners of Customs to payment rather than entitling them to draw, because drawing is an incidental thing which follows not immediately upon this document, but upon the transfer obtained under the document. Supposing this document were given and the goods released, and then the transfer were to take place, would not that be payment? The document entitles the commissioners to that process, and if the transfer took place it would support a plea of payment if an action were brought. Therefore it seems to me clearly to be a document entitling the commissioners to payment. Well, then, certainly it entitles them to payment on demand, and the Crown does not claim more than a penny stamp upon it as a bill of exchange payable on demand.

Then, the only remaining question is, Does this or does it not come within the exemption? I will not repeat what has been said. I quite agree that the word "remitted," if it stood alone, might be ambiguous, because in ordinary business transactions it is used in a very vague way and in a very large sense. A man sends his bill in with a note saying he will be obliged by a remittance. That is common enough, and there the word is used undoubtedly as an equivalent "for payment." But does it mean here payment to anybody of a debt? Well, I think it does not. The words are evidently limited. It is not "for the purpose of remitting money," but it is "for the sole purpose of remitting money." Now, in either of the two cases which I have thus mentioned very briefly could the transfer order which amounts to payment, and is received as payment, be said to be "for the sole purpose of remitting money" to an account of the public revenue? It seems to me impossible. I think the second case is the stronger of the two where the officer of Customs receives the cheque himself, takes the cheque to the bank, and instead of cashing it gets from the bank the transfer order, and by means of that transfer order obtains the transfer from the account of the merchant to the account of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. Is that for the sole purpose of remitting? Until he gets the transfer order, as I have pointed out (and it is clearly admitted), he cannot release the goods. He cannot treat the cheque as payment. He might possibly obtain cash on the cheque, and then release the goods; but he does not do that. He gets the transfer order, and upon obtaining the transfer order he releases the goods; therefore the primary function and object and purpose of the transfer order, even in that second case, is to pay the customs duties and obtain release of the goods. It is a secondary purpuse that it also enables the officer to pay the money in, or to obtain payment of the money into, the account of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. The truth is that it is one transaction by which two objects are carried out. If the money had been actually paid in cash into the hands of the officer, and he had thereupon released the goods, his duty would have been then, using the word "remit" in its strictest meaning, to have remitted the money to the bank account of the Commissioners of Customs. Instead of going through the two operations, they are combined in one, and by virtue of the order for transfer the payment is effected, and also subsequently, or at the same time, the cash is passed to the account of the Commissioners of Customs. Therefore it seems to me that that is a bill of exchange within the meaning of the Act, but it is quite impossible to say that it is a bill drawn "for the sole purpose of remitting money to be placed to any account of public revenue."

For these reasons I think the learned judges in the court below were quite right in the decision they arrived at, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

SMITH, L.J.—I agree. Lindley, L.J., has so entirely expressed my views on this case that I shall, if he will allow me, adopt them as my own. I have nothing to add, except that the appeal must be dismissed, and with costs.

Ex parte THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

*Church Building Acts—Mortgage by vicar—Land taken compulsorily—Money in court—Payment out—*3 & 4 Vict. c. 60, s. 19.

Section 19 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 60 does not limit the application of surplus land originally given for a church site and not required, or of the money representing such land, to purposes from which the incumbents in succession shall have the benefit or derive income, but the Ecclesiastical Commissioners may apply such land or money to purposes from which the successive incumbents would not derive benefit or income.

Held, therefore, that the court would order payment out of a fund, representing such surplus land, to be applied in paying off a mortgage made by the vicar in order to provide a vicarage and in executing repairs to the church, the proposed application of the fund having been approved by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

Summons.

In 1846, by deed poll, the trustees of Sir John Morden's Charity, under the authority of the Church Building Acts, granted to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners a piece of land at East Greenwich for the purpose of building a church under the provisions of the said Acts. On this site a church had been accordingly built and duly consecrated, but the enclosure surrounding the church had not been consecrated.

In 1882 the vicar borrowed £600 from Queen Anne's Bounty for the purpose of providing a vicarage, and he had executed to the governors of the Bounty a mortgage of the glebe, tithes, rents, &c., to secure the repayment of the said sum.

In 1891 the London County Council, under powers contained in the Thames Tunnel Act, purchased from the vicar part of the unconsecrated ground surrounding the church. The price was fixed by arbitration, and the same was paid into court. Part of this sum had been awarded to meet necessary expenditure on the church caused by the taking of the land by the Council, and had been already paid out to the vicar.

In 1895 the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, acting under section 19 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 60, an Act to further amend the Church Building Acts, directed that, subject to such costs, as the court might direct to come out of the fund in court, £230 should be paid to Queen Anne's Bounty, being the balance due on the mortgage, which was repayable by yearly instalments extending over thirty years, and that the residue should be paid to the vicar for the repair of the church. The trustees of Morden College, as representing the successors of the donors of the site, consented to the proposed application of the money. The question on the summons was whether the money could be applied as proposed.

The material parts of section 19 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 60 are as follows: "And be it enacted that in every case in which any grant shall have been or shall be made of any land or ground to the said Commissioners for any of the purposes of the said recited Acts or any of them . . . and in which the said Commissioners shall determine to apply a part only of such land or ground to any of the purposes of the said recited Acts or any of them, it shall be lawful for the said Commissioners, and they are hereby authorized and empowered, . . . to apply any part of such land or ground which shall not have been or shall not be applied by the said Commissioners for the purposes of the said recited Acts or of any of them to any other ecclesiastical purpose, either as glebe or otherwise, for the use of the incumbent or minister of the parish, place, or district in which such land or ground is situate, or for the purpose of any parochial or charitable school or any other charitable or public purpose relating to any such parish or place. . . ."

Dibdin, for the vicar.—Under this section the Commissioners could have, with the consent of the donors, as the land is not required for the site of a church, directed it to be applied for any other ecclesiastical purpose, and this money represents the land and can be dealt with in the same way.

Kenyon Parker, for the County Council.

NORTH, J., read section 19 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 60, and continued:—I thought at first that there might be a difficulty in directing under this section, just as there is a difficulty under the Lands Clauses Act, that money arising from the sale of land should be applied in payment of instalments due on the mortgage to Queen Anne's Bounty. I am of opinion, however, that this section is wider than section 69 of the Lands Clauses Act. The court is not dealing with part of the estate of the Church, not part of the estate belonging to the Establishment, whether it is used for a church, churchyard, or vicarage, or any other such purpose; but it is dealing with money representing land which has never been applied to any such purpose, though the application to such purpose was contemplated. But when the ecclesiastical authorities changed their minds about it the land became a sort of windfall so to speak—not part of the estate, but an accretion to the estate which can be dealt with under section 19. No doubt the Commissioners might under this section say that the land should be used as part of the glebe, when, of course, it would continue for ever to be used for the benefit of the successive incumbents. It first appeared to me that what was contemplated by section 19 must be of such a character that the vicars in succession would have the benefit, which could not be if the money now in question were applied in partly paying off a charge which the incumbent would have to pay out of his own pocket if he lived long enough, or which the succeeding incumbent would have to do if the first died before the charge was exhausted. But I think the words of section 19 are not so limited. The section says "to any ecclesiastical purposes, either as glebe or otherwise, for the use of the incumbent or minister of the parish, place, or district in which such land or ground is situate." The Commissioners consider that they have power to apply it for the present purposes, and I have no doubt from their approval, that is the best purpose to which they can apply it. I think that the purpose comes within the meaning of the words that I have just read. This view is strengthened by remaining words of the section, which say "for the purpose of any parochial or charitable school or any other charitable or public purpose relating to any such parish or place." That would cover something out of which the incumbent would get no income whatever. I think, therefore, that this is an ecclesiastical purpose, and as the Commissioners have directed it to be so applied it must be so applied.

SYMES v. SYMES. (a.)

Appointment — Validity — Remoteness — Contingent remainder.

An appointment of real estate under a power in a marriage settlement, of which the appointors were tenants for life, was made to the use of A., B., and C. (children then living of a son of the appointors), and to all other the children of the said son who should happen to be living at the death of the survivor of the appointors, and to the heirs and assigns of such of them as should attain twenty-five; with a proviso that if the appointment to the after-born children of the son should fail, the deed should operate as an appointment in fee to A., B., and C., or such of them as should attain twenty-five. Subsequently to the appointment four other children were born to the son. They had not attained twenty-five at the death of the surviving tenant for life, but A., B., and C. had.

Held, to create legal contingent remainders to take effect upon the death of the survivor of the appointors; and that the seven children of the son took estates for life, with remainders in fee to A., B., and C. as tenants in common.

Special case stated under the provisions of ord. 34, r. 1, to have determined the validity and effect of an appointment purporting to have been made in pursuance of a power in a marriage settlement.

By an indenture, dated the 3rd of February, 1819, being the marriage settlement made in contemplation of the marriage of David Symes and Ann Symes, his wife, one undivided fourth part or share of the lands and hereditaments therein mentioned, was limited to the use of the husband and his assigns during his life, and from and after his decease to the use of trustees their heirs and assigns during the lives of David Symes and Ann Symes and the life of the survivor of them upon trust as therein mentioned; and after the determination of the life estate of the said David Symes, and after the decease of the said Ann Symes, to the use of trustees for the term of 1,000 years upon certain trusts therein mentioned, which never arose; and subject to the said terms and the trusts thereof, to the use of such child or children of the said David Symes, by the said Ann Symes, or the issue of any such child or children, which issue should be living during the joint lives of David Symes and Ann Symes for such estate or estates, and on or at such age or respective ages in such manner, and if more than one in such shares and proportions as the said David Symes and Ann Symes should jointly during their joint lives by any deed appoint; and in default of or subject to any such appointment to the use of the first and every other the son or sons of the said David Symes by the said Ann Symes begotten or to be begotten successively in tail male with remainder over.

There was only one child of the marriage—viz., John David Symes (the elder), who married in 1843, and three children only of his marriage had been born and were in existence at the date of the deed poll hereinafter mentioned—viz., John David Symes (the younger), William Henry Symes, and Mary Elizabeth Symes. Four other children were born subsequently.

By a deed poll of the 2nd of September 1848, David Symes and Ann Symes, in exercise of the powers given to them by the said hereinbefore stated indenture, jointly appointed that the said share should from and immediately after the decease of the survivor of them be to the use of John David Symes (the younger) William Henry Symes, and Mary Elizabeth Symes, and all other the child and children of John David Symes (the elder) who should happen to be living at the decease of the survivor of the said David Symes and Ann Symes, and to the heirs and assigns of such of them as should attain the age of twenty-five years equally, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; but in case either of them the said John David Symes (the younger), William Henry Symes, and Mary Elizabeth Symes, and any such other child or children as aforesaid should depart this life under the age of twenty-five years, then immediately after such his or her decease to the use of the survivors or other of them then his or her heirs and assigns; and such deed poll further provided that in case the appointment intended to be thereby made to or in favour of the after-born children of the said John David Symes (the elder) should from any cause fail of effect, then David Symes and Ann Symes, in further exercise of their said power, further declared and appointed that the deed should operate as an appointment of the said hereditaments to the said John David Symes (the younger), William Henry Symes, and Mary Elizabeth Symes, or such of them as should attain twenty-five years as aforesaid, their several and respective heirs and assigns.

David Symes died on the 24th of May, 1867; John David Symes (the elder) died on the 3rd of May, 1863; Ann Symes died on the 5th of November, 1873, and at her death there were then living seven children (including the three mentioned in the deed poll of 1848) of J. D. Symes (the elder), but the above-mentioned three only, had then attained twenty-five years.

John David Symes (the younger) died on the 19th of June, 1893, having devised all his real estate to his wife. He had no male issue.

William Henry Symes died on the 25th of June, 1892, having devised his real estate to trustees; the plaintiff, born on the 11th of January, 1879, was his eldest son, and was the heir in tail male of John David Symes (the elder).

Frederick George Symes, another of the sons of J. D. Symes (the elder), died on the 21st of July, 1894, having devised his real estate to a trustee.

From the death of Ann Symes each of the seven children of J. D. Symes (the elder) or their heirs and devisees had been in uninterrupted and undisputed enjoyment and receipt of an equal seventh part of the rents and profits of the share.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Waggett, for plaintiff, contended that the appointment was in favour of the children during their lives in equal shares, and then that there was a contingent remainder to such of them as attained twenty-five, their heirs and assigns, which limitation would be bad because too remote: In re Atkinson, 40 W. R. 666, [1892] 3 Ch. 52; Blight v. Hartnoll, 30 W. R. 513, 19 Ch. D. 294.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Curtis Price, for defendants, the representatives of deceased sons and the four daughters.—The alternatives are an estate for life which merges in fee at twenty-five, or an estate for life, remainder in fee not coalescing. We contend the estates do coalesce.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., in reply, cited Re Frost, 38 W. R. 264, 43 Ch. D. 246.

NORTH, J.—The question in this case is, What is the true construction of the deed of appointment of the 2nd of September, 1848?

(a.) Reported by R. SILLEM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mrs. Symes survived her husband, and the appointment took effect in possession at the date of her death on the 5th of November, 1873. There were seven children of the only son of the marriage, all of whom were living at her death. The three elder children were born before the appointment, and had attained twenty-five before Mrs. Symes' death, the other four were not born till after the appointment, and at her death had not attained twenty-five.

The first limitation in the appointment with which we have to deal is clearly a legal contingent remainder. It is to the use of the children of the son who should be living at the death of the survivor of the husband and wife, and that is perfectly good because it must vest, if it vests at all, upon the death of Mrs. Symes, the tenant for life, and she was living at the date of the settlement. The grandchildren who were living at her death are to take immediate vested interests, and that is a perfectly good legal limitation. It was clearly intended that they should take immediate interests, and their interests are obviously life estates, for there are no words of inheritance, and by virtue of the subsequent clause the interest of any of the grandchildren who may die under twenty-five comes to an end. Then there is a limitation in remainder to the heirs and assigns of such grandchildren as shall attain twenty-five. This is not a limitation to the same class as that to which the life estates have been limited. It is a limitation in fee to such members of the previously named class as shall attain twenty-five. It might include all the members of the previous class, but it is a different class. This limitation is clearly a contingent remainder, and it must vest or fail at the time when the prior life estate comes to an end, that is upon the death of Mrs. Symes, and it would vest in those grandchildren who had attained twenty-five at the time at which it must either vest or fail. It is clear, therefore, that the remainder vested upon the death of Mrs. Symes in those three grandchildren who had then attained twenty-five, to the exclusion of the other four.

There are, no doubt, cases in which words similar to those of the present appointment have been construed as an executory devise, and not as a contingent remainder; but that was because in the instruments there in question there were words which showed that the limitations were clearly intended to operate as executory devises. In the present case there are no words which justify me in construing the limitations as executory uses. [The learned judge referred to the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in Re Lechmere and Lloyd, 18 Ch. D. 528, 30 W. R. Dig. 225, and said that the very case which had now arisen had been put there, and then continued:—] The principle of this decision was followed in Miles v. Jarvis, 24 Ch. D. 638, 32 W. R. Dig. 231, and in Dean v. Dean, 39 W. R. 568, [1891] 3 Ch. 150. And, as the condition of attaining the prescribed age must be fulfilled at the determination of the prior life estate, it is immaterial whether the prescribed age is twenty-one or twenty-five. The appointment in this case is therefore complete, and nothing fails to take effect. Each of the seven grandchildren takes one-seventh of the estate for life, with remainder in fee to the three elder grandchildren, in equal shares as tenants in common. The proviso shows an obvious intention that if all the seven grandchildren could not take, at any rate the three who were living at the date of the appointment should do so. The result is therefore that the grandchildren who had not attained twenty-five at the date of the death of the tenant for life take estates for life only as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; each taking one-seventh share of the property. In the case of the three who take remainders in fee their respective life estates will merge in such remainders.

Railway company—Compulsory purchase of leaseholds—Payment of purchase money into and out of court—Charges and expenses incident to—Letters of administration—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 80.

A railway company purchased under their compulsory powers leaseholds which were bequeathed by the will of A. in trust for B. for life, remainder to C. absolutely, and the purchase money was paid into court. C. having died intestate, and an order having been made for payment out of the money,

Held, that the costs of taking out administration to C. must be borne by the company.

Held, also, that the company were not liable to pay the costs of taking out administration de bonis non to the estate of A.

This was a summons by the railway company to vary the certificate of the taxing master, and raised the question by whom were the costs of taking out certain letters of administration to be borne.

In 1867 the North London Railway Co. took certain leasehold property forming part of the estate of a testator who died in 1858, and by whose will the property in question stood limited to the testator's daughter, M. A. Lloyd, for life, and subject thereto to all his children and the children of a deceased daughter absolutely.

The purchase money for the property was paid into court by the company, and on the 23rd of November, 1868, an order was made for the investment of the fund and payment of the dividends to the tenant for life on a petition to which M. A. Lloyd and the executors of the testator were parties.

On the death of the tenant for life in 1892 the fund became divisible into eleven shares.

The executors and all the original legatees had died after the payment into court.

In March, 1895, an order was made for the distribution of the fund amongst the legal personal representatives of the deceased legatees, and for the payment of the costs by the company in accordance with the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

In taxing the costs the taxing master had allowed (1) the costs of obtaining letters of administration de bonis non to the estate of the testator, and (2) the costs of obtaining letters of administration to the estates of the deceased legatees.

The company objected to these allowances and took out this summons to have the certificate of the taxing master varied.

Hastings, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for the company, argued that in neither case were the costs "charges, and expenses incident to" the obtaining payment out of court. It would have been necessary to take out administration to these deceased persons even if the land had not been taken by the company.

They referred to In re Liverpool Improvement Act,

Sheldon, for the respondents, argued that the company ought to bear all the costs in question, for if the company had not taken the land, the parties interested might very well have dispensed with the necessity of taking out these administrations: Re Gregson's Trusts, 13 W. R. 193; 2 De G. J. & S. 428; In re Barcham, 29 W. R. 525, 17 Ch. D. 329; In re Brooshooft's Settlement, 37 W. R. 744, 42 Ch. D. 250; In re Olive's Estate, 38 W. R. 459, 44 Ch. D. 316; Ex parte Kelly is not distinguishable from this case; Ex parte Rorke, [1894] 1 Ir. R. 146.

Hastings, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J.—This is a summons to vary the taxing master's certificate made upon a taxation of costs under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. [His lordship stated the facts.] As to the cost of obtaining administration to the testator, I cannot see how this can be chargeable against the company, and I think that those costs must be disallowed.

There is much more difficulty as to the costs of obtaining letters of administration to the estates of the deceased beneficiaries. They are not claimed under the 82nd section, which relates to the costs of making out the title, but under section 80, the question being whether these are charges and expenses incident to the payment of this money out of court. It was urged, however, that letters of administration would have been equally necessary if these leaseholds had never been taken by the company; and in reply to that it was said that the beneficiaries might in that event have simply gone into possession, and obtained payment of the rents to themselves without ever perfecting their legal title. There does not appear to be any English case exactly in point; but two Irish decisions were referred to—namely, Ex parte Kelly and Ex parte Rorke. It seems to me that the former of those cases does decide the point. There money was paid into court by a railway company under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, in respect of leasehold premises. Persons claiming under the marriage settlement of their father, then deceased, applied for payment; but the court decided that other children, then dead, and of whom there were no personal representatives, had taken vested interests, and declined to pay out, until administration had been taken to their estates. One of the applicants thereupon took out administration to the deceased children and obtained payment of the fund, and it was held that the company should pay the costs of obtaining these administrations. The second case is less directly in point because the Master of the Rolls in Ireland appears to have decided it upon the special circumstances. He begins by saying that he did not intend to lay down any general rule; but he does make some general observations, for at page 152 he says: "I do not see any hardship in construing section 80 of the Lands Clauses Acts, 1845, as it has been construed in the cases in this country and in England, which have been referred to by counsel. It must be remembered that an owner of property may be quite content to remain with his title as it is, and may not care to make it better. But if his land is taken from him compulsorily he has to go further, and must show at least something more than a holding title."

I confess that I am not sure that apart from these two cases I should have arrived at the same conclusion; but in a matter of this sort it is very important that the practice should be uniform, and I accordingly follow them. As to these costs, therefore, the decision of the taxing master must be affirmed.

Mortgage—Mortgagee in possession—Repayment—Six months' notice or interest.

A mortgagee who takes possession is not entitled to notice or interest in lieu of notice, when the principal interest and costs have been tendered, even though the tender is before the day fixed for payment in the deed, as entry into possession is equivalent to a demand for payment.

Action.

This was a redemption action in which the plaintiff held second and fourth mortgages of certain premises held by one Jones, under a building agreement in respect of which the defendants Messrs. Elliott held the first and third mortgages.

The first mortgage was dated in September, 1894.

Messrs. Elliott entered into possession of the premises, and expended moneys in completing two unfinished houses, and they received the rents of the houses that were finished and occupied.

On the 22nd of February, 1895, the plaintiff tendered to the Messrs. Elliott the amount of their principal, interest, and costs to date; but they refused the tender on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to tender payment before the date fixed in the deed—viz., six months from the date of the mortgage.

The plaintiff thereupon commenced redemption proceedings.

Elgood, for plaintiff.—Messrs. Elliott having taken possession are bound to accept payment of their principal, interest, and costs, notwithstanding the date for redemption has not arrived. Where the mortgagee proceeds to enforce his security the mortgagor may pay at once without notice or interest in lieu of notice: Re Alcock, Prescott v. Phipps, 23 Ch. D. 372, 32 W. R. Dig. 137; Letts v. Hutchins, L. R. 13 Eq. 176, 20 W. R. Ch. Dig. 7; Banner v. Berridge, 29 W. R. 844, 18 Ch. D. 254; Smith v. Smith, 40 W. R. 32, [1891] 3 Ch. 550. Brown v. Cole, 14 Sim. 427, does not apply as the mortgagee there had taken no proceedings.

E. Ford, for the defendants Messrs. Elliott.—Brown v. Cole is in point.

Elgood replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—It appears from the authorities that if a mortgagee takes proceedings in court to recover his money, the mortgagee cannot refuse a tender of his principal, interest, and costs, on the ground that he is entitled to six months' notice. The mortgagee has taken steps to compel payment of the debt, and is therefore not entitled to the interest in lieu of notice. Now, is entering into possession taking proceedings to compel payment of the debt? It appears to me that although the case is not actually covered by authority yet it is in principle, and that a mortgagee cannot enter into possession for his own benefit and then say he is entitled to remain in the position of a mortgagee out of possession and ask for the interest or notice. The positions are inconsistent, and, in my opinion, the mortgagee by taking possession says he requires payment. Nor do I think Brown v. Cole makes any difference, for that case decides that a mortgagor cannot, before the time limited for payment to the mortgagee expires, either insist on acceptance of a tender of the money or take proceedings to redeem. But that is because during that time the mortgage must remain as a security for the money advanced, and it is not competent for the mortgagee or the mortgagor to disturb that relation. If the mortgagee himself disturb that relation, he cannot insist on notice and no interest is payable in lieu thereof.

Mines—Justices—Offences against the Mines Act, 1872 —Proceedings instituted by the Inspector of Mines—Information laid by his "agent"—Jervis's Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), ss. 10, 16—Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 77), ss. 33, 35.

Notwithstanding section 35 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, an information for an offence against that Act can, having regard to section 10 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 (Jervis's Act), be laid by an inspector of mines through an agent lawfully authorized in that behalf by him.

Special case stated by the justices of Carnarvon.

The short point was whether an inspector of metalliferous mines could lay an information under the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, by an agent, or whether the provisions of section 35 of that Act excluded the ordinary rules of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts applying to prosecutions instituted under the Mines Act.

The special case stated that on the 9th of December, 1895, one Morgan, an inspector of police (who admittedly was not an authorized inspector of mines) purporting to act as the duly authorized agent of the appellant, the inspector appointed for the metalliferous mines in that district, laid and signed an information on the appellant's behalf against the respondents for unlawfully failing to cause the top of a shaft of a certain mine to be and to be kept securely fenced for the prevention of accidents, contrary to section 13 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872.

The appellant and his solicitor appeared before the justices to give evidence in support of the summons, as did also the inspector of police by whom the information was given.

Before the case was opened the respondents took a preliminary objection that the information was improperly laid, on the ground that, in the absence of a written authority from a Secretary of State, all proceedings under the Act must be instituted by the inspector of mines, who had no authority to delegate his powers to an agent.

The justices decided in favour of this objection, and refused to hear the charge, but at the request of the appellant stated a case.

Sutton, for the appellant.—The justices were wrong, and ought to have heard the summons. Section 33 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, directs that all offences and penalties under the Act, and all money and costs directed to be recovered as penalties, may be prosecuted and recovered in the manner directed by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts before a court of summary jurisdiction. Section 35 of the same Act is as follows: "No prosecution shall be instituted against the owner or agent of any mine to which this Act applies for any offence under this Act which can be prosecuted before a court of summary jurisdiction, except by an inspector of mines or with the consent in writing of a Secretary of State." Section 35 does not, however, in any way prevent section 10 of Jervis's Act from applying to prosecutions under this Act, so that an information can be preferred either by an inspector of mines personally or by his agent on his behalf, provided that in the latter case the proceedings have been "instituted" by the inspector, and not by "any other person." If they are "instituted" by any other person, then the inspector's subsequent consent or ratification is not sufficient; and if they are to be proceeded with, the authority of a Secretary of State must be obtained in writing sanctioning the same. There is no evidence that Morgan "instituted" these proceedings on his own initiative or acted at any time in the matter other than as the agent of the appellant.

[He was stopped.]

Macaskie, for the respondents.—The justices were right in refusing to hear the summons, for the inspector of police was not entitled to institute proceedings. By section 35 of the Act of 1872 the information must be laid by the inspector of mines personally, or if by any other person, then only with the consent of the Secretary of State, and that consent must be in writing. There is no evidence that Morgan, the police inspector, was ever instructed to commence these proceedings by the appellant, and mere ratification will not do. [Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J.—He was in the court, and his evidence could have been taken.] The informant relied upon some authority given him by the appellant to act as his agent; but mere verbal authority is insufficient, for by inference it must be "in writing," since the authority of a Secretary of State must be in writing. [Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J.—That is because the Secretary of State may authorize any person to take proceedings who has no authority or interest in the matter.] Suppose the justices refused to convict, then, under section 16 of Jervis's Act, the defendants may ask for costs. How is such an order to be made if the inspector of mines repudiates having given his "agent" authority to lay the information? [Wills, J.—That question must have arisen often under Jervis's Act, and I have never heard of a single instance where the difficulty has not been met.] Probably because the matter has never been pressed, since the costs of the application would be more than the costs to be recovered.

He cited Anderson v. Hamlin, 25 Q. B. D. 221, 38 W. R. Dig. 81; Kyle v. Barber, 52 J. P. 725, 36 W. R. Dig. 108.

Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J.—I think this case must be remitted to the justices with an intimation that in the judgment of this court the view they took of section 35 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, was wrong. The information was laid in the name of the appellant by D. T. Morgan, who in the information is described as the duly authorized agent of the inspector of mines for that purpose. It was contended before the justices that the information must have been laid by the inspector himself, and that he could authorize no one as his agent to do so on his behalf. It is therefore unnecessary for this court to go into the question of whether there was sufficient evidence before the justices for them to have held that Morgan was, in fact, duly authorized to act as agent for this purpose by the appellant; although I think, had it been necessary to inquire into that, there would have been evidence on which they could have so found. I agree with Mr. Macaskie that the scheme of the Act of 1872 was that a priori the inspector of mines should alone be the person to lay a complaint or information; but I see nothing in section 35—or, indeed, in any other part of the Act—which takes the case out of the ordinary provisions of Jervis's Act. I think that the proceedings were instituted by the appellant, who authorized Morgan to make the complaint as his agent and on his behalf. We are informed that since the proceedings were instituted the mine owners have had the shaft secured. That fact ought to be taken into consideration by the justices, and if they find that it was merely an accidental omission they must take that fact into consideration also.

WILLS, J.—The crucial question, to my mind, is whether there is evidence to show that the inspector of mines was the person who, in the first instance, instituted these proceedings. If that is rightly answered, as we think, in the affirmative, then I see no reason why he may not authorize someone to lay the information in his name as any other informant may do under Jervis's Act.

Case accordingly remitted to the justices.

WATSON v. WHITE. (a.)

County court—Jurisdiction—High bailiff—Neglect to levy—Action for negligence—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 49.

Section 49 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides a remedy in the case of the neglect of the high bailiff to levy execution, but the section does not prevent the high bailiff being liable in such a case to an action for damages for failure to perform his statutory duty in the same manner as the sheriff of a county is liable.

Summons for a writ of prohibition referred to the court by the judge in chambers. A question being raised as to the jurisdiction of the court to hear the application, it was agreed to treat it as an original motion.

The plaintiff recovered judgment in the City of London Court for £6 2s. 6d. against a defendant who carried on business in the district of the Whitechapel County Court. The warrant of execution was sent to the registrar of that court under section 158 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and the registrar directed his high bailiff to issue execution.

The plaintiff alleged that the high bailiff had been guilty of negligence in neglecting to levy, and he commenced this action against the high bailiff in the City of London Court, claiming damages. At the trial counsel for the high bailiff objected that the action would not lie, on the ground that the only remedy open to the plaintiff was under section 49 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The judge of the City of London Court thereupon stayed the action until a writ of prohibition had been applied for.

The County Courts Act, 1888, s. 49: "In case any bailiff of any court who shall be employed to levy any execution against goods and chattels shall, by neglect or connivance or omission, lose the opportunity of levying any such execution, then upon complaint of the party aggrieved by reason of such neglect, connivance, or omission (and the fact alleged being proved to the satisfaction of the court on the oath of any credible witness), the judge shall order such bailiff to pay such damages as it shall appear that the plaintiff has sustained thereby, not exceeding in any case the sum of money for which the said execution issued, and the bailiff shall be liable thereto; and upon demand made thereof and on his refusal so to pay and satisfy the same, payment thereof shall be enforced by such ways and means as are herein provided for enforcing a judgment recovered in the court."

Section 35 provides that the high bailiff "shall be responsible for all the acts and defaults of himself and the bailiffs appointed to assist him, in like manner as the sheriff of any county in England is responsible for the acts and defaults of himself and his officers."

Poley, for the defendant.—The high bailiff is the creation of statute, and the remedy provided by section 49 is the only remedy open to persons complaining of the high bailiff's misconduct.

He referred to Reg. v. Judge of Newport (Salop) County Court, 36 W. R. 476, 20 Q. B. D. 242; Reg. v. Judge of Chelmsford County Court, 35 W. R. 511, 18 Q. B. D. 704.

Lochnis, for the plaintiff, was not called upon to argue.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—I confess that I have no doubt whatever as to what our decision should be in this case. The learned counsel apparently cannot produce any authority in support of his contention. The case of Reg. v. Judge of County Court of Shropshire is quite clear, but it has nothing to do with this point, nor does the other case referred to apply here. The high bailiff is undoubtedly the creation of statute, which casts upon him certain obligations, but the statute also annexes to him the common law liability for the failure to discharge his duties. Section 49 is in part of a disciplinary character—that is to say, it authorizes a county court judge to correct the officer of his court for misconduct, and the section also provides a summary method of dealing with cases like the present one. But the section does not say that the remedy provided thereby shall be the only remedy open to persons complaining of negligence on the part of the high bailiff. On the contrary, section 35 in express terms places the high bailiff in the same position and makes him liable in exactly the same manner as the sheriff of the county. Section 49 affords a more summary method of redress, but it does not deprive the plaintiff of his common law remedy against the bailiff for his alleged breach of duty.

WILLS, J.—I agree.

Motion dismissed.

A bye-law for the good rule and government of a locality made by the local authority ought to be construed so as to give reasonable effect to the object aimed at.

A county council made a bye-law that "a person driving any vehicle shall, from the end of the first hour after sunset to two o'clock a.m., except during such part of that period as shall be between the rising and setting of the moon, carry attached to such vehicle a lighted lamp placed so as to exhibit a light in the direction he is proceeding in order to signal the approach or position of the vehicle; and in case of a vehicle carrying timber, such person shall also carry attached at the end thereof a lighted lamp so as to exhibit a light to persons overtaking the vehicle."

Held, that this bye-law was not bad, either (1) by reason of its throwing on an alleged offender the onus of proving that the alleged offence occurred at a period between the rising and setting of the moon, for that could be proved by means of an almanac; or (2) by reason of the omission in the bye-law of the words "in any street or public place," for those words were to be implied; or (3) by reason of the words "attached at the end thereof" being capable of being construed as applicable either to the vehicle itself or to the timber carried thereon, for those words reasonably construed must be taken as applicable only to the vehicle itself.

Special case stated by the justices of Warwickshire.

An information was laid by the superintendent of police against the respondent that he, on the 26th of August, 1895, being in charge of a timber carriage at eleven o'clock at night, had no lighted lamps attached to such carriage as required by a bye-law made by the Warwickshire County Council for the good rule and government of the county under powers given by section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which section was made applicable to county councils by section 75 of the Local Government Act, 1888. The bye-law was in the following terms: "A person driving or having charge of any vehicle . . . shall from the end of the first hour after sunset to two o'clock a.m., except during such part, if any, of that period as shall be between the rising and setting of the moon, carry attached to such vehicle a lighted lamp or lighted lamps which shall be so constructed and placed as to exhibit a light in the direction in which he is proceeding, and so as to afford adequate means of signalling the approach or position of the vehicle. Provided that where one lamp only is carried it shall be attached to the off or right side of the vehicle. . . . And in the case of vehicles carrying timber, such person shall also carry attached at the end thereof a lamp or lamps so constructed as to exhibit a light or lights visible to persons overtaking such vehicle."

It was proved or admitted at the trial that the respondent was in charge of a timber carriage on the night in question, that it was a very dark night, and that he had no lighted lamps. Two constables were called to prove that the moon rose between one and two o'clock in the morning, but neither of them could speak of this fact of his own knowledge, and referred to an almanac for information, and their evidence was on this ground objected to on behalf of the defendant.

The magistrates considered that the local authority had no power to make such a bye-law, and held that it was unreasonable and bad, because it was not restricted to vehicles on public highways; and also on the ground that a person in charge of a carriage ought not, in order to bring himself within the exception, to have to prove that at the time of the commission of the alleged offence the moon had risen and had not set, and that it was equally unreasonable to require such proof from the informant; further, that although the moon might have risen, the night might be so dark as to render lights necessary for the safety of the public. They were of opinion also that lights on vehicles were as necessary in the neighbourhood of towns in the early morning as late at night.

For these reasons the magistrates dismissed the summons.

The superintendent of police appealed.

Alexander Glen, for the appellant.—The magistrates ought to have convicted. The bye-law was framed for securing the safety of the public. It is not unreasonable in itself; and the bye-law is made under powers given to the local authority by section 75 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which renders section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, applicable. This bye-law as to the carrying of lighted lamps by carts after dark is in the same terms as section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which imposes regulations as to carrying of lights on bicycles. If both a reasonable and an unreasonable construction can be read into a bye-law, the court, in cases of doubt, will construe it in such a way as to carry out the intention of the local authority, who are in a position to judge of the necessity for such a bye-law: Reg. v. Saddlers' Co., 32 L. J. Q. B. 337. Almanacs are admissible in evidence to decide the time at which the moon rose and set on a particular day, just as much as they are evidence of the state of the tide. It is not for the informant to prove that the respondent comes within the benefit of an exception: see Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 39 (2). It is admitted that if the moon did not rise till later than eleven o'clock the charge is proved. It is admitted also that the night was very dark, and the fact that a bye-law was passed shows that lighted lamps on carts were necessary in that locality for the safety of the public. The magistrates ought therefore to have convicted, whether the moon had in fact risen or not.

Parfitt, for the respondent.—The magistrates were right in refusing to convict, for the bye-law is bad on two grounds. First, it is unreasonable, for (a) it is unworkable, since to come within the exception the respondent has to show that at the time in question the moon had risen and had not set. The onus of proving that astronomical fact rests in law on the informant, and not on the respondent. At any rate it used to be so held in cases of burglary, where the question was whether the sun had risen or set at a particular time. Almanacs are not admissible evidence of time against the respondent. [WRIGHT, J.—Because local time varies from Greenwich time?] Yes; and the witnesses called by the informant were unable to prove of their own knowledge the state of the moon at that time: Tutton v. Darke and Nixon v. Freeman, 5 H. & N. 647, 8 W. R. C. L. Dig. 26. The bye-law is also unreasonable (b) for it is too wide, as the words "street or public place" are omitted. Secondly, it is bad, for it is too vague—it does not state whether one of the lights is to be placed at the end of the timber or on the back of the cart.

Alexander Glen replied.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—We think that this appeal must be allowed. The magistrates refused to convict on the ground that the bye-law was unreasonable, and the question we have to decide is whether they were right or wrong in the conclusion they have come to. These questions as to bye-laws are so frequently before the court, and so often involve matters of importance, that I wish to say a general word or two with regard to the construction that should in my opinion be placed upon them. In my judgment these courts are bound to support, as far as possible, bye-laws that are made by local authorities, unless it can be clearly shown that such bye-laws have been made without jurisdiction, or that the bye-laws themselves are obviously unreasonable or improper. The court ought not to be, so to speak, astute in "pickling holes" in rules which deal with local matters and local requirements, of which the authorities who frame the laws are often in a better position to judge than the courts. It is therefore safe to lay down this as a general proposition: that the courts should strive to construe a bye-law so as to give reasonable effect to the object aimed at. No doubt it is most desirable that bye-laws should be so clearly expressed that "he who runs may read," yet, as we know from experience, this clearness is not always attained in the case even of laws framed by the higher legislative bodies.

In the present case the magistrates held the bye-law to be bad because in some points it went too far and in others not far enough to ensure public safety; and to some extent I am bound to say I agree with them. It has also been contended by counsel for the respondent that the bye-law was unreasonable because it was unworkable, since the proviso that it should not apply between the rising and setting of the moon placed the defendant under an unnecessary burden of difficult proof; but I do not think there is any real practical difficulty. Then as to another objection raised—namely, that the words "street or public place" have been omitted—I think it is possible and right to read the bye-law as applying only to persons driving in public places, and therefore it ought not to be ruled by us as bad on the ground that it is too wide. The third objection seems to me to fail also, for it is clear that the proviso as to the second light to be carried on timber wagons, is intended to mean that such light is to be attached to the back of the cart and not to the end of the timber. On the whole, I think, the magistrates were wrong in their conclusion, and the case must be sent back for them to convict and impose such fine as they consider under the circumstances is applicable.

Dog—Innkeeper—Liability of innkeeper for injuries caused by a dog—28 & 29 Vict. c. 60.

An innkeeper is, by reason of section 2 of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 60, deemed to be the owner of a dog living in his hotel, and is liable for injuries to cattle caused by it, notwithstanding the dog was at the time of the injuries complained of under the control of a person staying at the hotel, to whose care it had been committed by the real owner.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Leicester County Court.

The statute 28 & 29 Vict. c. 60 amended the law with regard to injuries to cattle and sheep caused by dogs. Section 2 of that Act provides as follows: "The occupier of any house or premises where any dog was kept, or permitted to live or remain, at the time of such injury, shall be deemed to be the owner of such dog, and shall be liable as such, unless the said occupier can prove that he was not the owner of such dog at the time the injury complained of was committed, and that such dog was kept, or permitted to live or remain, in the said house or premises withou his sanction or knowledge; provided always that, where there are more occupiers than one in any house or premises, let in separate apartments or lodgings or otherwise, the occupier of that particular part of the premises in which such dog shall have been kept, or permitted to live or remain, at the time of such injury, shall be deemed to be the owner of such dog."

A dog caused injuries to the plaintiff's horse. The dog belonged to Nutt, who was, until a few days before the time when the injuries were committed, staying at the defendant's hotel. On removing from the hotel, he left the dog in the charge of his friend Newton, who was also living in the hotel. The dog used to spend the night in Newton's room.

Newton and the defendant went out for a drive together in the plaintiff's cab, and took the dog with them.

When the dog was released from the cab it flew at the plaintiff's horse, and bit it.

The plaintiff thereupon brought an action against the defendant under 28 & 29 Vict. c. 60, and recovered damages.

The defendant appealed.

Lyon, for the defendant.—No liability would attach to the occupier in respect of injuries occasioned by a dog while under the control of its owner. The case is not altered by the fact that the dog was here under the control of what may be called its vicarious owner.

Toller, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The section of the Act justified the county court judge in holding the defendant liable.

Bastardy—Service of summons—"Last place of abode" — Validity of service — Jurisdiction of justices — Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), s. 4.

A summons under section 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, may be served at the "last place of abode" of the person summoned, although that person is out of the jurisdiction at the date of such service.

At the hearing of an application for an affiliation order it was proved that the summons had been served by being left at the house where the person summoned had resided up to a day seven days before the date of the service; and that on that day he left the house with the intention of proceeding to America. It was not proved that he had obtained a place of abode in America at the date of the service. He did not appear, and the justices, after hearing evidence, made an affiliation order against him.

Held, that the service was valid, and that the justices had jurisdiction to make the order.

Dicta of the Earl of Selborne, L.C., in Berkley v. Thompson, 33 W. R. 525, 10 App. Cas. 45, and of Kay, L.J., in Reg. v. Farmer, 40 W. R. 228, [1892] 1 Q. B. 637, considered.

Argument of a rule nisi obtained by J. Hotchkiss for a certiorari to bring up an affiliation order made against him by justices for the purpose of quashing it.

The facts disclosed by the affidavits were as follows.

E. Grove was delivered of a bastard child on the 31st of March, 1895. On the 9th of April a summons was at her instance issued against the applicant, and on the 10th of April it was left at the house of the applicant's father.

The applicant had lived at his father's house continuously up to the 3rd of April, on which date he left that house with the intention of proceeding at once to America to reside there. It was not proved that he had on the 10th of April any fixed place of abode in America or had arrived there; and a letter purporting to be written by him in America on the 10th of May mentioned that he had after his arrival in that country wandered from place to place and slept in the fields.

Willes Chitty, for the justices, showed cause.—There is no evidence that the applicant had a place of abode in America on the 10th of April; his father's house was therefore his last place of abode, and the summons was properly served there under section 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872: R. v. Damerell, L. R. 3 Q. B. 50, 16 W. R. C. L. Dig. 14; R. v. Farmer, 40 W. R. 228, [1892] 1 Q. B. 637.

[He was stopped.]

Colam, for the complainant, did not argue.

E. M. Pollock, for the applicant, in support of the rule.—The evidence shows that the applicant had no intention of returning to England, therefore his abode was in America on the 10th of April, and the summons was not served at his "last place of abode." Moreover, as the applicant must be presumed to have been out of the jurisdiction on the 10th of April, the summons could not be served at all under section 4 of the Act. Lord Selborne, in Berkley v. Thompson, 33 W. R. 525, 10 App. Cas. at p. 49, and Kay, L.J., in R. v. Farmer, express opinions to that effect; and the provisions of section 3, as to the issuing of process in cases where the putative father has left England and has afterwards returned, show that it was not intended that proceedings should be taken when he is absent out of the jurisdiction.

Chitty, in reply.—There is no evidence that the applicant was in fact out of the jurisdiction at the date of the service. In Berkley v. Thompson the question was as to personal service, and the dictum of Lord Selborne is directed to that question. R. v. Farmer is inconsistent with the view that service at the last place of abode cannot be made where the alleged father is out of the jurisdiction.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. The question arises under section 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, which provides that "after the birth of such bastard child, on the appearance of the person so summoned or on proof that the summons was duly served on such person or left at his last place of abode, &c.," the justices may hear the evidence and adjudge the man to be the putative father.

It is clear that the applicant was living at his father's house until a few days before the summons was issued; according to his mother's evidence he left on the 3rd of April; on the 10th of April the summons was served at his father's house as being his last place of abode. It is said that he was then living in America, but there is no evidence that he had any fixed place of abode there; in fact, the letter of the 10th of May negatives that suggestion. Under these circumstances Reg. v. Farmer seems to me conclusive that his father's house was his last place of abode. In that case Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J., considered whether the man had a place of abode in America, and came to the conclusion that he had. Lord Esher then says: "I take it that if a man goes to a new place of abode in England his last place of abode is that to which he goes, and in which he is abiding. Does it make any difference that the place of abode is abroad, where the man is not merely wandering about but has got a fixed place of abode? I think not." But in the present case I am unable to come to the conclusion that the applicant had a fixed place of abode in America. As to the dictum of Lord Selborne in Berkley v. Thompson it is sufficient to say that it was not necessary for the decision of the point with which the court was dealing. If we were to yield to the argument founded on that dictum, it would make nine-tenths of the judgments in Reg. v. Farmer completely inappropriate.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether this summons was served at the last place of abode of the applicant. It seems clear to me that the place at which it was served was his last place of abode, unless he can show that he had before the service acquired another place of abode. It is said that he had then acquired a place of abode in America, but I am satisfied that he had not; in fact, it is not clear that he had then reached America at all.

Another point was taken, which if it were good would render the consideration of the question of the applicant's place of abode irrelevant. The dictum of Lord Selborne in Berkley v. Thompson is relied on as showing that the presence of the person served within the jurisdiction is necessary in order to make a service at his last place of abode valid; and it is said that Kay, L.J., in Reg. v. Farmer expresses his agreement with that view. But it seems to me that section 4 is an absolute provision enabling service to be effected by leaving the summons at the man's last place of abode, irrespective of where the man may happen to be. There certainly is another provision in section 3 relating to the absence abroad of the putative father, but I do not think that that provision is inconsistent with the specific enactment contained in section 4. And I think, further, that the ratio decidendi in Reg. v. Farmer is really conclusive upon this case. There Lord Esher, M.R., says: "We have to consider whether he had at the time the summons was served a place of abode in America. If he went there with the intention of returning, or for the mere purpose of avoiding service, I should say he had no place of abode in America. In such a case it would be true to say that his last place of abode was his father's house." It is clearly to be inferred from that passage that if in that case no new place of abode had been acquired, the Master of the Rolls would have held that the summons was properly served by being left at the father's house, although the person served had gone to America. Then in the same case Lopes, L.J., says: "I agree that the case would have been different had it been made out that he went away merely to avoid service . . . but of that I see no evidence, or that he went away merely for a temporary purpose." That assumes and decides that proceedings might be taken under section 4, although the defendant was out of the jurisdiction. The dictum of Lord Selborne in Berkley v. Thompson occurs in a case in which the question was whether personal service in Scotland was good. It does not in my opinion apply to the present case, and it is not an authority for deciding in favour of the applicant.

KIRBY v. NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE CO. (a.)

Mayor's Court—Appeal—Notice of appeal—Condition precedent—Extension of time—Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. clvii.), s. 8—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 59, r. 16.

It is a condition precedent to the right of appeal under section 8 of the Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857, that the appellant should give notice of appeal within two days. This provision is not affected by the general power conferred on the High Court by ord. 59, r. 16, to extend the time for bringing an appeal from an inferior court.

Appeal from an order of a Divisional Court refusing to grant an extension of time for appealing from the Mayor's Court.

The action was brought under the Employers' Liability Act, and was tried in November, 1894, when the jury by the direction of the Common Serjeant found a verdict for the defendants, and judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff's claim was for a sum exceeding £20.

The plaintiff did not give notice of appeal within two days of the judgment, in accordance with the terms of section 8 of the Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857, nor did he comply with any of the provisions of that section; but more than a year after the judgment, he applied at chambers, under ord. 59, r. 16, for an extension of time for appealing.

Lawrance, J., granted an extension of time, but the Divisional Court (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Wright, J.) reversed his order, on the ground that there was no jurisdiction to extend the time.

By section 8 of the Mayor's Court of London Procedure Act, 1857, either party to a cause in which the sum sought to be recovered shall exceed the sum of twenty pounds may appeal on a point of law to the High Court, "provided that such party shall within two days after such determination or direction give notice of appeal to the other party or his attorney, and also give security within such time or times as the court shall direct, to be approved of by the registrar of the court (if the judge shall so direct) for the costs of the appeal."

By section 23 of the Judicature Act, 1884, "the power to make rules conferred by section 17 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875, and enactments amending the same, shall be deemed to include the power to make rules for regulating the procedure on appeal from inferior courts to the High Court."

Ord. 59, rule 16, dealing with appeals from inferior courts, is as follows: "The High Court shall have power to extend the time for appealing, or to amend the grounds of appeal, or to make any other order, on such terms as the court shall think just, to ensure the determination on the merits of the real questions in controversy between the parties."

The plaintiff appealed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The first thing we have to do is to construe section 8 of the Mayor's Court Act, and see whether on the true construction of it there are not conditions precedent to the right of appeal. We must also see what is the first condition precedent. The section says that in any cause in which the sum sought to be recovered exceeds £20 an appeal will lie, provided that the party desiring to appeal shall within two days give notice of appeal to the other party. What is the true construction of an enactment so worded? In my opinion it is a condition precedent to his right to appeal at all. Therefore the first condition precedent is to give notice to the other side. Then he has to do something more, he has to give security within such time as the court directs. If he gives notice, he ought next to go and ask what security he should give and within what time. If he gives notice, but does not proceed to give security, I think the other party may go and apply for security. The appellant ought to go, but the respondent may go. Therefore all depends on the first condition. If that is not fulfilled, there is no right of appeal.

Now, unless this section is repealed, can any court give leave to appeal without that condition being fulfilled? In Morgan v. Bowles, 42 W. R. 269, [1894] 1 Q. B. 236, the decision was that the provision as to giving security was not affected by the rules of order 59. It was held that the general words of the rules did not repeal the special enactment of the statute. The reasons given in the judgments apply to the provision as to giving notice. There is nothing in the Judicature Act, 1884, which repeals this provision; neither in my opinion is it repealed by the rules and orders made under the Judicature Act; they only use general words and they do not assume to alter it, and I think that if any rule had assumed to alter it it would have been ultra vires. In my opinion the case of Morgan v. Bowles, which followed the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of In re West Devon Great Consols Mine, 36 W. R. 342, 38 Ch. D. 51, was rightly decided. There is no power to do that which the plaintiff asks for. To make the order would be to go directly in the teeth of section 8 of the Mayor's Court Act. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—It is admitted that from 1857 to 1884 there could have been no appeal in a case like the present, unless notice was given within two days in accordance with the terms of section 8 of the Mayor's Court Act. The contention is that this was altered by the Judicature Act of 1884. But that Act does not mention the Mayor's Court Act at all. Section 23 simply gives a power to make rules for regulating the procedure on appeals from inferior courts. A rule was made under that power—viz., ord. 59, r. 16, which enables the court to extend the time for bringing such an appeal if it thinks just. We are asked to decide that that rule does away with the absolute condition imposed by section 8 of the Mayor's Court Act. I cannot come to that conclusion without more express words than are used in the rule. I doubt whether any rule could alter it; but this rule does not assume to alter it. It is argued that extending time for appealing within the meaning of the rule involves everything which is necessary to enable a party to appeal. I think that the maxim generalia specialibus non derogant applies to this case, as Bowen, L.J., held it to apply in the case of In re West Devon Great Consols Mine. I cannot suppose that it was intended to do away with the provision as to notice. The appeal therefore fails.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The Mayor's Court Act says that in certain cases a party to a cause in that court may appeal. But this right is not given absolutely. The Act goes on to say "provided that"—which seems to me to be the same thing as saying "if"—such party gives notice within two days, and also gives security. In my opinion it cannot be said that if he does neither the one nor the other he can still get leave to appeal. This enactment has never been repealed, and in my judgment the Rule Committee have no authority to repeal Acts of Parliament.

Appeal dismissed.

WHITELEY v. EDWARDS. (a.)

Married woman — Separate estate — Restraint upon anticipation — Judgment — Execution — Arrears of income accruing due after judgment—Receiver.

Where judgment has been obtained against a married woman who is entitled under a settlement to income for her separate use with a restraint upon anticipation, there is no power to appoint a receiver of her income which has accrued due after the date of the judgment.

The decision of the Court of Appeal to the above effect in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (Nos. 1 and 2), 42 W. R. 628, [1894] 2 Q. B. 559, is not affected by the decision of the House of Lords in Hood Barrs v. Heriot (No. 1), ante, p. 481, [1896] A. C. 174.

Appeal from an order of Kennedy, J.

On the 4th of July, 1895, the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant, a married woman, for £878 16s. 6d. and costs.

By the defendant's marriage settlement certain property was transferred to trustees upon trust to pay the income thereof to her for her separate use with a restraint against anticipation.

On the 1st of April, 1896, the judgment being unsatisfied, the plaintiff applied for an order appointing a receiver of the defendant's income which accrued due on the 25th of March, 1896, but which had not been paid over to her.

Kennedy, J., refused to make an order.

The plaintiff appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and T. W. Chitty, for the plaintiff.—In Hood Barrs v. Cathcart (Nos. 1 and 2), 42 W. R. 628, [1894] 2 Q. B. 559, it was sought, as in this case, to appoint a receiver of the income of a married woman which accrued due after the date of the judgment against her. This court held that a receiver could not be appointed, and in the judgment delivered by Kay, L.J., it was laid down that the restraint against anticipation is not removed till the income is in the hands of the married woman. But the decision in that case has now been overruled by the judgment of the House of Lords in Hood Barrs v. Heriot (No. 1), ante, p. 481, [1896] A. C. 174. In the latter case the income which it was sought to attach had accrued due before the date of the judgment; and this court, before whom the case was heard under the name of Loftus v. Heriot, [1895] 2 Q. B. 212, 43 W. R. Dig. 112, following the decision previously delivered by Kay, L.J., held that the judgment could not be enforced by any kind of process against such arrears of income. The House of Lords reversed this decision, and the reasons given by Lord Herschell and Lord Macnaghten show that they intended to overrule the previous decision of Hood Barrs v. Cathcart. It must now be taken to be the law that as soon as income which was subject to a restraint against anticipation becomes due the restraint is removed, and the income can be taken in execution.

Oswald, Q.C., and Eyre Thompson, for the defendant.—The decision of this court in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart, which exactly covers the present case, has not been affected by the judgments of the House of Lords in Hood Barrs v. Heriot. The only part of the earlier case which was criticised by the learned lords was a dictum in the judgment of Kay, L.J., which was not necessary to the decision.

They cited Cox v. Bennett, 39 W. R. 401, [1891] 1 Ch. 617, and Pillers v. Edwards, 71 L. T. N. S. 788, 43 W. R. Dig. 111.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—On the 16th of June, 1894, two judgments were given in this court on two separate appeals. In one case the judgment of the court was delivered by Davey, L.J., in the other case the judgment was delivered by Kay, L.J. The two appeals raised a point which was common to both, and all the judges who took part in the judgments were agreed as to that point. But in the second judgment another point was taken, and our opinion on that point was no doubt part of our judgment. Afterwards, in the case of Loftus v. Heriot, that second point again came before this court and had to be determined. We then determined it in accordance with the opinion which we had previously expressed upon it. Loftus v. Heriot was taken to the House of Lords, where our decision was reversed. Now, what did the House of Lords overrule? Did they overrule both the points which I have mentioned, or only the second point? If they have not overruled the first point, which was common to both the judgments in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart, there is no reason for departing from our judgment on that point. And that is the point which is raised in this case. I think that the House of Lords confined themselves to the second judgment, viz., that which was delivered by Kay, L.J.; they confined themselves to the case where the arrears of income were in existence before the date of the judgment against the married woman, and they did not touch the case where the arrears of income were income which came into existence after the date of the judgment. I therefore think that we must adhere to our judgment—viz., that delivered by Davey, L.J., and I think that in so doing we are not refusing to follow the House of Lords. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In the case of Hood Barrs v. Cathcart two appeals came before this court. In both cases we held that where a judgment had been obtained against a married woman possessed of income to her separate use with a restraint against anticipation a receiver of her income could not be appointed where the income had not accrued due at the date of the judgment. I adhere to the judgment delivered by Davey, L.J. In the second judgment—viz., that delivered by Kay, L.J.—we went further and said that the restraint upon anticipation did not come to an end till the money had practically come into the hands of the married woman. Then came the case of Loftus v. Heriot, in which the facts were different; there the income which it was sought to attach had become due before the date of the judgment against the married woman, but it had not yet been paid to her. We held, as we had held in the judgment delivered by Kay, L.J., that the income was not free property till it came into her own hands, and that the fetter against anticipation had not come off. That case went to the House of Lords, and our judgment was reversed. The House of Lords dealt simply with the case where the income was already due at the date of the judgment, and they differed from our opinion that the fetter had not come off. Now the point is taken that the House of Lords overruled Hood Barrs v. Cathcart. In my opinion they only overruled the point in the judgment of Kay, L.J., to which I have referred. I think that the decision of Kennedy, J., is right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

A police constable had the exclusive occupation of a cubicle in a police station. The cubicle was one of a number contained in one room. It was separated off from the rest of the room by a partition seven feet high not reaching to the ceiling, and was entered by a door opening into a passage which passed down the room. The cubicles had air, light, and warmth in common. The whole building was under the control of the chief constable, who could order any constable to change his cubicle at any time. The constable slept in the cubicle, but could not without leave take his meals there or smoke there, or go into it during the day time. He had the key of the door, but he was bound to let the inspector in at any time, and he could be ordered to give up the key.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (Rigby, L.J., dissenting), that the cubicle was not separately occupied by the constable as a dwelling within section 5 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878.

Barnett v. Hickmott, 43 W. R. 284, [1895] 1 Q. B. 691, approved.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Grantham and Vaughan Williams, JJ.) on a special case stated by a revising barrister.

An objection was taken before the revising barrister for the city of Gloucester to the retention of the appellant's name on the list of Parliamentary voters, Division 2, on the ground that he had not been the inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house for twelve months prior to the 15th of July, 1895.

The appellant was a police constable, and during the whole of the qualifying period had the exclusive occupation of a cubicle in the police station at Gloucester. This cubicle, with others, was contained in a room in the police station. It measured about 8ft. by 7ft., and was partitioned off on three sides by a wooden partition about 7ft. high, the wall of the room forming the fourth side. There was a space of two or three feet intervening between the top of the partition and the ceiling of the room. The cubicle was entered by a door opening into a passage which passed down the room. The appellant had the key of the door, and was entitled to lock it at pleasure. The cubicles had air, light, and warmth in common. The appellant slept in his cubicle on a bed supplied by the county, but he generally took his meals in a common mess-room and also used the common washing-room of the station.

The revising barrister held, on the authority of Barnett v. Hickmott, 43 W. R. 284, [1895] 1 Q. B. 691, that the appellant was not entitled to vote in respect of the occupation of his cubicle, and erased his name from the list, but stated a case for the opinion of the court.

The Divisional Court upheld the decision of the revising barrister.

The appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal, and when the appeal first came on for hearing the court thought fit, in order to obtain further information, to direct that certain questions of fact should be addressed to the revising barrister to be answered by him.

The answers returned by the revising barrister were to the following effect: The chief constable had control of the whole building; the chief constable could order any constable at any time to change his cubicle; he could order any constable not to receive visitors in his cubicle; he could order any constable not to take his meals in his cubicle; he could order any constable not to have washing apparatus in his cubicle; he could order any constable not to go into his cubicle during the day time (though the revising barrister said it would be unreasonable to make such order in the case of a man who had been on night duty); the inspector could order any constable to open the door so as to let the inspector go in; he could order him to give up the key of his cubicle; he could order him not to smoke in his cubicle. As a matter of fact the constables were sometimes allowed to take their meals in their cubicles, and were also allowed sometimes to smoke in them.

Graham and Garrett, for the appellant.—The appellant is entitled to the service franchise under section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884. He was during the qualifying period an inhabitant occupier of a "dwelling-house," as that word is defined in section 5 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878. The restrictions under which he occupied the cubicle did not make him any the less an occupier. Every person who possesses the service franchise is liable to have his enjoyment of the premises restricted by any regulations which his master chooses to make.

They cited Bradley v. Baylis, 30 W. R. 823, 8 Q. B. D. 195; Stribling v. Halse, 16 Q. B. D. 246, 34 W. R. Dig. 68; Atkinson v. Collard, 34 W. R. 75, 16 Q. B. D. 254.

Lewis Thomas and J. H. Percival, for the respondent.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The claimant in this case is a policeman who does not occupy a separate house or a separate room, but the things relied on as giving him the franchise are things done by him in a compartment of one room in the police station—viz., in what is called a cubicle. The cubicle is partitioned off from the rest of the room and from other cubicles by boards which do not reach up to the ceiling. Inside the cubicle there is a bed, and in the bed the claimant sleeps, but he only does so by virtue of his employment as a policeman. He cannot choose which cubicle he will sleep in, and when it is chosen for him he cannot refuse to sleep there. When he is in it the air which he breathes and the light which is given to him are not air and light confined to his cubicle, but the common light and air of the whole room in which he and the other policemen are. That fact alone appears to show conclusively that the cubicle is not separately occupied as a dwelling. It seems to me inconsistent with the idea of a dwelling that light and air should be shared with other people. But we thought it better to have further facts found by the revising barrister as to the conditions under which the cubicles are occupied. It appears that this building and the mode of using it are under the control of the chief constable. That seems to me to be inconsistent with the idea of each cubicle being a dwelling separately occupied. The chief constable can at any time order a constable to change his cubicle, that is to say, a constable can from day to day be ordered to change that place which is said to be his dwelling. Then a constable cannot receive a visitor in his cubicle without the permission of the chief constable. Neither can he without leave take his meals in his cubicle, nor have washing apparatus there. He can be ordered not to go into his cubicle during the day time, and though, as the revising barrister says, it would be unreasonable to make such an order in the case of a man who had been on night duty, the chief constable has the power. Further, a constable is bound to let his superior officer enter his cubicle at any time. He can be ordered at any time to give up the key, and he can be ordered not to smoke in his cubicle. We must take all these things together, and ask whether they are consistent with the idea of a person occupying a dwelling. These restrictions are the terms of the constable's occupation, for if he were turned out of the force he would not be entitled to come into the room at all. And they seem to me to be absolutely inconsistent with and antagonistic to the ordinary idea of the occupation of a dwelling. Therefore, in my opinion, he is not such an occupier as is entitled to the franchise.

It is said that soldiers in barracks are entitled to the franchise. But I do not think that would be so, if the facts were like these. I therefore think the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—In this case the judges of the Divisional Court followed the decision in Barnett v. Hickmott; and for my part I should have been disposed to affirm their judgment, even without the additional facts which are now before us. A dwelling-house is defined by section 5 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, to include every part of a house separately occupied as a dwelling. The cubicle in question is a compartment of a room which is divided into a number of compartments, which are not completely separated from one another, but have air, light, and warmth in common. The use of the cubicle by the constable is subject to the many restrictions of which we have been told. It seems to me that he only has the use of the cubicle for the specific purpose of sleeping in it during a part of every twenty-four hours. Under these circumstances I think it cannot be said that he occupies a part of a house separately occupied as a dwelling. My idea of occupation within the meaning of the Act of Parliament is an occupation which is not subject to limitations and disabilities such as are inconsistent with the substantial rights which a man ordinarily enjoys with regard to his own house.

RIGBY, L.J.—I have the misfortune to differ from my learned brethren. The question is whether the claimant was during the qualifying period an inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house. He did, in fact, occupy the cubicle without interference during the qualifying period. He had the key of the cubicle; and when he was on night duty he used the cubicle during the day, and when he was on day duty he used it during the night. It seems also that he took his meals in the cubicle when the common mess-room was not available. Section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, says that "where a man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act and of the Representation of the People Acts to be an inhabitant occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant." Here the cubicle was not occupied by any superior under whom the claimant served. Therefore, assuming that the cubicle was a dwelling-house, he was an inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house during the qualifying period. Can the power of the chief constable to make regulations and so restrict the use of the cubicle by the claimant have anything to do with the franchise? He occupied in fact, and the Act says nothing about restrictions on the mode in which occupation may be enjoyed, or what the effect of them is to be. We know of establishments where large numbers of people are employed and live under certain restrictions. But I do not see how such restrictions can affect the question of the franchise. The service franchise is something totally different from the other kinds of franchise. The owner of this franchise does not acquire it by reason of any right of property. He is not in the position of a tenant at will; he is not a tenant at all. He has no landlord, but he merely occupies premises by virtue of his service under such regulations as his master may choose to make.

Then is this cubicle a dwelling-house? By section 5 of the Act of 1878 "dwelling-house" includes any part of a dwelling-house, provided that it be separately occupied as a dwelling. It need not be a large or important part, but any part, even the smallest and the least significant part, is sufficient to confer the franchise. This cubicle, it is true, is part of a room in a building, but it is none the less a part of the whole building. In my opinion it is a dwelling-house. Then did he occupy separately? As to the light and air of the cubicle being enjoyed in common with the whole of the room, the Legislature seems to me to have dealt with that point in the third paragraph of section 5, which says that "for the purposes of any of the Acts referred to in this section, where an occupier is entitled to the sole and exclusive use of any part of a house, that part shall not be deemed to be occupied otherwise than separately by reason only that the occupier is entitled to the joint use of some other part." The claimant had possession of the key of his cubicle during the whole of the qualifying period, and though his superior officer had the power to go into the cubicle at any time, it does not appear that he ever did so. The claimant therefore occupied separately. And further, in my opinion, he occupied his cubicle as a dwelling. It does not seem to me to be necessary that he should occupy it for all the purposes of a dwelling. The question is whether his occupation of it, so far as it went, was occupation as a dwelling. I concede that there appears to have been an unlimited power of interference with the user of the cubicle by the claimant, but I do not think that the franchise has anything to do with that. A man who claims as an inhabitant occupier of premises is not bound to show a good title to occupy them. He may have been a trespasser, but when the franchise comes to be dealt with the only question is, Was he there? The claimant in fact used his cubicle as a place for sleeping during the qualifying period, and in my opinion his user of it, restricted though it was, was as far as it went user of it as a dwelling.

Appeal from Chitty, J. (reported ante, p. 404).

Mr. Buckley, a client of Mr. Baylis, a solicitor, attained twenty-one in 1882, and in 1883 sought the services of Mr. Baylis. Baylis acted for him as solicitor whilst Buckley was still an undergraduate at the university in a great variety of matters of business, and in assisting him in obtaining loans from insurance companies and other societies of a reputable character.

When Baylis obtained a loan he placed before Buckley an account, not a regular bill of costs, showing how the money was to be applied, that he was deducting his costs up to that time, and was giving a cheque for the balance to Buckley.

It was agreed between them, verbally, that the solicitor's remuneration should be not according to the usual scale charges, but a percentage on the sums advanced, on the ground of the special opportunities he possessed for obtaining loans. The cash accounts contained items of lump sums expressed to be for "costs" or "agreed costs" or "on account of costs." The loans were made at a reasonable rate of interest, and the client made no charge of fraud against the solicitor, nor imputed to him any improper conduct in the matter of the loans.

Baylis ceased to act as Buckley's solicitor in 1894, and shortly afterwards Buckley took out a summons against Baylis for the delivery of a bill of costs, and to have the same referred for taxation.

On the hearing of the summons Chitty, J., made the usual order for delivery of bills of fees, charges, and disbursements, and for taxation thereof, with a direction to the taxing master to certify whether any and what agreements within the Solicitors' Remuneration Act of 1881 had been entered into between the solicitor and his client, and, if so, whether any and which of such agreements were or were not fair and reasonable. The costs were reserved, and the solicitor was to have two months for delivery of his bills.

The solicitor appealed.

T. E. Scrutton, for the appellant, used the same arguments as in the court below.

Farwell, Q.C., and Sington, for the respondent, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In my opinion the order made by Chitty, J., was perfectly correct. What the learned judge has done is this. He has ordered Mr. Baylis to deliver a bill of costs, and that that should be referred to the taxing master for taxation; and he has added this, that "the taxing master is to inquire whether any and what special agreement has been entered into between the applicant and the respondent within the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, and, if so, whether any and which of such agreements are or are not fair and reasonable."

It was said, and the statement is perfectly true, that the summons would not have been taken but for the unpleasant feeling which existed between Mr. Baylis and Mr. Buckley's father. The correspondence shows that these proceedings were the father's doing. But it is not a case of the father using the name of the son in any proceedings, but he urged his son to take proceedings. The true inference is that, although the father has promoted the proceedings, they are really the proceedings of the son. Whether they were instigated by the father or not is immaterial, for they are bonâ fide the litigation of the son.

The present appeal is made on behalf of Mr. Baylis to show why no bill should be delivered, or, at all events, that no order to tax should be made, even guarded as this order was by Chitty, J. Several points are made on his behalf. The first point made is that these are settled accounts, and have been paid. We may treat them as one, because though separate in one sense, the answer to one is the answer to the other. We cannot hold that these were settled accounts or paid accounts, inasmuch as there never has been any delivery of any bill of costs of any sort or kind. Counsel for the appellant has urged that they will be paid accounts when the bill is delivered under the order of the court, because the payments will then be held to refer to the bill, and that therefore it is premature to order taxation. I cannot follow that argument. There is no bill now before the court, there is no bill to which these payments can be referred. This is not like the case of Hitchcock v. Stretton, 40 W. R. 555, [1892] 2 Ch. 343, in which I think that perhaps Stirling, J., went a little too far in holding that on delivery of a bill of costs after the issue of the writ in the action payments made before the proceedings could be referred to it. I cannot help thinking that the real reason why Stirling, J., decided in this way was that when he came to see the bill of costs he could not find that there was anything at all which required taxation. I am quite satisfied that if he had thought there were improper payments he would have ordered taxation. As a matter of law, I repeat, I think that he went a little too far, though I do not say the decision was wrong, but I feel convinced that this explanation of his reason is the true one. It is said that because in Ex parte Heming, 28 L. T. O. S. 144, 5 W. R. Dig. 141, it was held that payments made before proceedings instituted could be referred to a bill subsequently delivered, we ought therefore to stay our hands in this case; but that is an impossible contention, and the same observation applies to Re Thompson, 42 W. R. 462, [1894] 1 Q. B. 462, where the court came to the conclusion that the payment could be referred to the bill of costs because the client had actually had the bill and had been satisfied with it. Here we can exercise no judgment of that kind because we have no materials to enable us to do so. The authorities only show that a solicitor who pays himself by retaining and does not deliver a bill of costs cannot treat that retention as payment. No authority to the contrary has been cited, and I cannot see that there has been here payment or settled account.

The other point is different. It is said that it was wrong to order taxation because these accounts were written agreements within section 8 of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881. If there had been any agreement in writing within the Act, we should have to pay attention to it. If the circumstances are looked at, it is clear what the agreement was—viz., that the real agreement was a verbal agreement with this young man that Mr. Baylis should pay himself his costs in this way. Having our attention called to that, I am not prepared to construe the words as we construed those in Re Frape, 41 W. R. 417, [1893] 2 Ch. 284. In that case we held that if there were grounds for suspicion of unfairness, the court would order the taxing master to consider whether the agreement was fair and reasonable; but in this case we are told that the agreement was only for "costs as agreed." That expression does not look as if this document was the written agreement, but rather as if it referred to some other agreement. The account refers to some antecedent agreement not embodied in that account, so that the decision in Re Frape does not cover this case at all. I think that decision was quite right, and I will not throw any doubt upon it; but to extend that decision to a case where there is no agreement in writing would be a very different matter.

The delay which has taken place is a further and a serious point. If by ordering taxation we should be doing an injustice to Mr. Baylis, or if, owing to lapse of time, he had lost the materials for preparing his bill, and could not comply with the order, it would be different; but on his own evidence he has in his possession ample materials for making it out, and there is nothing to show that we should be doing any injustice in ordering him to do so.

I have only one other word to say. When you look at these charges they are very large sums; I do not say they are overcharges, but the difference between them and the scale fees is shown by the evidence, and they are much larger than the usual charges made by solicitors. That requires investigation, and was quite enough to justify Chitty, J., and this court in making the order which has been made. That order is guarded in the manner which I have pointed out, and was quite right, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think that the order made by Chitty, J., is perfectly right in the circumstances of this case. It is said that one reason why it is not right is that there has been delay. It is perfectly true that there has been delay. Mr. Buckley attained his majority in 1882, and twelve years elapsed during which Mr. Baylis acted for him without any question being raised. No doubt that is a long delay; and if it had not appeared from the evidence that Mr. Baylis was in a position to prepare a bill of costs, that would have great weight. But he has the materials from which to prepare his bill, and I have even some doubt whether he has not the bill itself ready. That is the answer to the plea of delay. But there is another answer. I cannot help thinking that there is ground for saying that the agreement relied upon is somewhat unreasonable, because it does appear that there is a very large excess in the amounts charged compared with what would be chargeable under the scale; and that is a strong argument in favour of the order made by Chitty, J., and one which tells against the suggestion that the order is wrong because of delay.

Then it is said that there has been payment and a settlement of account, but in my opinion there has been neither payment nor settlement. No bill of costs has ever been delivered. It is said that the solicitor has retained the money himself, and that that amounts to payment. It is not said that if no bill had been delivered that would be payment; but it is said that when under the order the bill is delivered, if it contains anything to which the previous retention can refer, that will convert the retention into payment. That seems to be a preposterous contention. There is no doubt a case of Hitchcock v. Stretton, in which it was held that retention could be referred to a bill delivered after the issue of the writ, but that was a different case. The reason why Stirling, J., in that case acted as he did was because he felt that under the circumstances there was nothing wrong, but that all was fair and right, and that to send the bill for taxation would have been a useless proceeding.

The further point taken is under the Act of 1881, s. 8. I need not read that, but sub-section 2 says: "The agreement shall be in writing, signed by the person to be bound thereby or by his agent in that behalf." The question is whether in this case there was any such agreement in writing as is contemplated by that enactment. The expressions used in the accounts are "agreed costs" and "agreed as costs." In my opinion that is not a compliance with the statute, and I cannot help thinking (speaking for myself) that the terms of the agreement ought to be found in the writing, and that that is what the statute intended. It is not necessary to go that length for the purpose of this case. Upon "agreed costs" and "agreed as costs," taken by themselves, it is impossible to come to any conclusion what the agreement may be; but we are relieved from the difficulty which might have arisen because we were told by the appellant's counsel what the real agreement was—viz., that there was to be an allowance of 5 per cent. on loans secured by Mr. Baylis. That was an oral agreement; and how can it be said that these words, "agreed costs" and "agreed as costs," in any way indicate what the real agreement was? That point also fails, and in my opinion the order made by Chitty, J., was in every respect right.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, but I will add a few words, because this is a case which involves principles of great importance. In every case of an agreement between solicitor and client the court has always recognised that a solicitor can exercise great influence over his client, and it looks upon an agreement prepared by the solicitor with great jealousy and care, and throws upon the solicitor the burden of showing that it was fair and proper. The Act of 1881 did not alter that, but recognized it in the plainest possible terms. Where there is an agreement the court can refer that to the taxing master to ascertain whether it is fair and reasonable, and if not it is not to be treated as binding upon the client. Is there here, in the first place, an agreement binding under the Act of 1881? The only thing in writing and signed, which is what the Act requires, is a statement which in the first account is in these words, "costs of mortgage as agreed, £35." In some of the later ones it is "agreed costs," and so on. The appellant's counsel argued that there you have on the face of the document an agreement that that is to be the amount of the costs. But he began by saying that there was a verbal agreement with this young man just after he attained twenty-one, to the effect that when any money was borrowed the solicitor should be paid 5 per cent. on the gross amount to cover his costs and commission. That was the agreement on their part. Although it may have been difficult for the other side to set up that case, it is different when the solicitor tells us so himself, and it is quite plain that these documents refer to that agreement. They are not in themselves the agreement, but they refer to an antecedent agreement to pay 5 per cent. for commission and costs, and the words "costs of mortgage as agreed" are completely explained. This was not a written agreement at all; it was a verbal agreement, and not in writing, and ought not to be binding on the client. It was said that that was not consistent with the decision in Re Frape, but I think it is consistent with it. It was a strong decision. I was a party to it. But it does not go so far as we are asked to go in this case. The question there was this. In an account which was signed by the client there was an item for "agreed costs £80." That document enabled the court to say that it was a sufficient description of all the costs incurred down to the date of that document (and there was no suggestion of any agreement outside that document), and that the agreement was that £80 should be the amount payable for all these costs. That is quite different from the point now before us. This is not on the face of the document an agreement, but a reference to an antecedent verbal agreement which is not binding on the client. That completely distinguishes this case from Re Frape. This verbal agreement was entered into with Mr. Buckley when he was such just of age. The court will look very carefully at an agreement, even if it has been signed; but the true result of this is that there was no written agreement. There is not enough to satisfy the Act of 1881, and we must treat it as if there was no signed agreement. If we had to look into it further, I should say that the agreement, whether written or not, requires most careful investigation, because the first account does not refer to any agreement. It says "costs as to loan £30." That was a loan of £600 made by one of the leading insurance societies in London. The account is made out by the society thus: "Costs of investigation of title." Therefore the investigation was not made by Mr. Baylis, but by the solicitors of the society. On looking at the scale it appears that the only charge Mr. Baylis could have made was 1 per cent., which would have amounted to £6, instead of which he has charged £30. That seems to me to be an exorbitant charge which would quite justify the court in inquiring whether it was a fair and reasonable agreement. Then it was said that there had been payments of these accounts. I asked whether there had ever been a case in which retention had been held to be payment where no bill of costs had been delivered, and here no bill has been delivered up to this moment. The answer was "No, but there are cases where a bill has been delivered after the retention and has been kept for some time without rejection, and the retention has been held to refer to that bill and treated as payment." Other cases are said to have gone further than that, as, for instance, Hitchcock v. Stretton, before Stirling, J., where, after the action had begun, the bill was for the first time delivered, and the learned judge thought himself bound to treat that as referable to the retention which had been made before any proceedings had been commenced or any bill delivered. With great deference to Stirling, J., I should not have so decided. I do not think that anything warrants us in going a step further than we did in Re Frape; and we are asked to go even further than the decision in Hitchcock v. Stretton and to hold that a bill delivered under the order of the court will relate back and make all these retentions payments. Even if Hitchcock v. Stretton was right, this would be to carry it a great deal further. I entirely dissent from the argument that delivery of a bill under this order would make that payment, which is not payment now. I cannot follow that argument.

Then it is said that this is a settled account, but the same answer as is given to the suggestion of an agreement is conclusive. There is one item which the client has had no opportunity of investigating. He has not agreed in any way binding on him to make a payment of that item, and no bill has been delivered, and it cannot be treated as a settled account.

It is urged that the respondent is coming a long time after the event. There is no Statute of Limitations which applies, and the Act of 1881 says not a word as to the time within which a bill must be delivered, so there is no statutory bar. But still there has been a long delay. The first account was in 1885, and we are now in 1896. If it could be added to that, that the solicitor is in a great difficulty, that he has lost his vouchers and cannot make out a bill, there would be great force in the argument; but we have it, that he has the materials and that his clerk has actually made out a draft bill, so there is no difficulty of that kind. This is a matter between solicitor and client, and of a client very much in the hands of the solicitor, and I do not feel disposed to say that the question of delay is enough to make the order of Chitty, J., improper. I also think that the father's action was quite right, although the son is, perhaps, doing what he would not have done without it. [His lordship referred to the order of Chitty, J., and continued:—] If the taxing master finds that there has been an agreement which is binding under the Act of 1881, he will tax the bill in relation to that agreement; but he cannot tell until he sees the bill whether the agreement is reasonable or not. Seeing that the solicitor has all the materials, it is rather extraordinary that he should venture to interfere with an order which is reasonable, right, and proper. The appeal fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Company—Debentures—Set off—Assignment of debt—Appointment of receiver—Time of assignment—Liquidated demand—Money had and received—Goods paid for but not delivered — Managing director — Acts within apparent authority.

Debentures issued by a limited company, being a floating charge on its assets, do not take effect as a charge as from the date of their issue, but only from the date of the appointment of a receiver on behalf of the debenture-holders, and then subject to the existing equities. A trader dealing with the company in the ordinary course of its business has an inchoate right of set-off against debts owing by him to the company before such date, even though he has notice of the issue of the debentures.

Where there is a claim for goods paid for but not delivered, the property in the goods not having passed, the claim becomes one for money had and received, upon a failure of consideration, and becomes a liquidated demand, and is a proper subject for set-off.

A company is bound by the acts of persons who take upon themselves, with the knowledge of the directors, to act for the company, provided such persons act within the limits of their apparent authority; and strangers dealing bonâ fide with such persons have a right to assume that they have been duly appointed.

Appeal from a decision of North, J.

Rowatt's Wharf, Limited, was a company incorporated in 1892.

In March, 1893, the company made an issue of 6 per cent. first mortgage debentures of £100 each.

The company thereby charged with the payment of principal and interest "all its real and personal property, present and future, and the undertaking, goodwill, and business of the company, and all its uncalled capital for the time being."

The debentures were subject to a condition (inter alia) that the charge thereby created was to be a floating security, and should attach as a fixed charge only if the company went into liquidation, or made default in payment of any of the principal moneys secured thereby, or made default for three months in the payment of any interest, and should not pay the sums due within one month after receiving notice to remedy such default.

The principal sums due under the debentures were payable on the 1st of January, 1900, but the company might pay them sooner on giving certain notice; and they were payable forthwith if the company made default in payment of interest or went into liquidation.

In May, 1893, Harvey, Brand, & Co. imported a cargo of petroleum oil, which was delivered at the wharf of the defendant company, and stored there by them for Harvey, Brand, & Co. at a rent of 3d. per ton of oil per week, subject to a deduction for any leakage from the oil which might take place at the wharf.

By the custom of the trade the rent was payable when the oil was finally removed from the wharf, but the wharfinger was not bound to allow the amount of oil in tank to be reduced below a value representing the amount of rent owing.

In November, 1893, Harvey, Brand, & Co. purchased through the defendant company 7,000 barrels, which were intended to be used for the delivery of oil, at the price of 3s. 6d. a barrel, and they paid the amount of the purchase money, £1,225, to the company.

The barrels formed part of the general stock of barrels at the wharf belonging partly to the defendant company and partly to their customers, and were to be used by the company when oil of Harvey, Brand, & Co. was to be put into barrels for delivery by the company to the order of Harvey & Co.

In October, 1894, the above actions were brought by holders of debentures of the company to enforce their security, and on the 30th of October, 1894, an order was made appointing Mr. Howard to be receiver and manager of the business of the company on behalf of the debenture holders.

Harvey, Brand, & Co. received notice of his appointment on the 31st.

In November, 1894, the company passed resolutions for a voluntary winding up, and on the 5th of November, 1894, Mr. Howard was appointed liquidator.

In October, 1894, there was oil belonging to Harvey, Brand, & Co. still remaining at the wharf of the defendant company, and the receiver claimed a lien upon it in respect of rent due from them to the company, amounting after a deduction for leakage to about £550.

Harvey, Brand, & Co. claimed to set-off against this sum a sum of £677 5s., being 3s. 6d. per barrel in respect of 3,870 of the 7,000 barrels which had never been delivered to them by the defendant company.

The question was whether this sum of £677 5s. could be so set off, having regard to the existence of the debentures issued by the company, and on the 24th of April, 1895, Harvey, Brand, & Co. took out a summons for the determination of the question.

There was a second question raised by the summons, whether certain debts owing to the company had been validly hypothecated to Harvey, Brand, & Co.

In the latter part of October, 1894, Harvey, Brand, & Co. were pressing the company for security for the money owing them by reason of the non-delivery of the barrels, and the company were in need of money for payment of wages.

On the 22nd of October a meeting took place between the three directors of the company and Harvey, Brand, & Co., at which it was agreed that if Harvey, Brand, & Co. would advance money for the wages, the company would as security for such advances and the debt owing to Harvey, Brand, & Co. give to them (amongst other things) letters hypothecating to them certain debts owing to the company.

On the 23rd of October Mr. Davey, one of the directors, signed a number of letters addressed to the different debtors to the company, telling them that all charges due or to become due from them on goods at the company's wharf were hypothecated to Harvey, Brand, & Co. These letters were signed by Davey, as managing director, on behalf of the company, in the presence of one of the other directors, and were given to Harvey, Brand, & Co.

Under the articles of the company the quorum of directors was three, and the directors had power to appoint a managing director, and to authorise him to exercise all their powers except the signing of bills of exchange and promissory notes. There were three directors of the company. There was no minute of any resolution of the appointment of Davey as managing director; but he appeared to have acted as managing director, and to have been recognised as such by his co-directors. The question was whether or not the hypothecation of the debts was binding on the company, having regard to the fact that Davey had not been formally appointed managing director when he purported to act in that capacity.

North, J., held that the debentures ceased to be a floating security, and the charge thereby created attached on the appointment of the receiver; but the claim of Harvey, Brand, & Co. was a claim for unliquidated damages, being a claim for the wrongful conversion of the barrels, and such damages could not be set off against the amount of the rent.

On the second question he held that Harvey, Brand, & Co. did not rely on the powers of Davey as de facto managing director, and therefore could not support their claim on that ground.

Harvey, Brand, & Co. appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and F. Wright, for the appellants.—The company had the money and did not deliver the barrels, so that the remedy of the appellants is an action for money had and received upon a consideration which has failed. The claim would be for a liquidated amount, the price of the barrels, which could be set off against the rent due to the company. The debentures would only take effect subject to all equities existing on the 30th of October, 1894, and so subject to the right of set off. On the second point, Davey was acting as managing director, and the appellants had no notice that there was any informality in his appointment, and were acting bonâ fide: County of Gloucester Banking Co. v. Rudry, Merthyr, &c., Colliery Co., 43 W. R. 486, [1895] 1 Ch. 629, and Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 28 W. R. 769, 5 App. Cas. 473. [KAY, L.J., referred to Smith v. The Hull Glass Co., 8 C. B. 668, 11 Ib. 897.] [LOPES, L.J., referred to Lindley on the Law of Companies, 5th ed., pp. 159 and 160.]

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Upjohn, and W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the debenture holders.—There has not been a total failure of consideration, and the appellants' claim must be for wrongful conversion. That is a claim for unliquidated damages, which cannot be set off against the rent. If they put their claim for a liquidated sum in respect of the price of the barrels, the answer is that the debt was incurred after the issue of the debentures, by which all the assets were assigned. [KAY, L.J.—Is notice of a debenture which is a mere floating charge notice of an assignment?] There was an actual charge created by them, though until they matured the company remained in possession of the assets. Debenture holders would take in priority to execution creditors, even before the appointment of a receiver, and that could only be on the ground that the debentures created a charge: In re The Standard Manufacturing Co., 39 W. R. 369, [1891] 1 Ch. 627; In re Opera, Limited, 39 W. R. 705, [1891] 3 Ch. 260; and Taunton v. Sheriff of Warwickshire, 43 W. R. 579, [1895] 2 Ch. 319. The right of set off under the statutes relating to set off (2 Geo. 2, c. 22, s. 13, and 8 Geo. 2, c. 24, s. 4) only arises in some proceeding in which it can be asserted. The debts must have been incurred in the same transaction, and be such as would before the statutes have given rise to cross actions. The right had not arisen in this case when the receiver was appointed. On the second point, these so-called letters of hypothecation, amount to no more than notices given by the managing director. There was no resolution of the board authorizing him to charge the assets of the company in this way, and to hold this transaction good would be an extension of the principle of The Royal British Bank v. Turquand, 6 E. & B. 327, 4 W. R. Dig. 148. In County of Gloucester Banking Co. v. Rudry, Merthyr, &c., Colliery Co. the seal of the company had been actually fixed to the document in question. That is a different case from this.

No reply was called for.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The first question is as to the set-off. The company issued debentures in the ordinary form, which were a floating security creating an equitable charge upon the assets of the company, such assets being of necessity uncertain in amount. The debentures did not interfere with the company carrying on its business in the ordinary way, but the debenture holders could in certain events take possession by means of a receiver. The appellants owed the company a sum of over £500 for rent for storage of oil, and they have a cross claim against them to which I will refer later. It is an important fact that the appellants and others owed money to the company, as on the credit of that and other such debts the company obtained facilities for carrying on its business, and for dealing beyond what they otherwise would have done. It would be disastrous to companies if it could be said that because they had issued debentures they could not incur debts in respect of which a right to set off might arise. That would be equivalent to saying that they could not carry on their business. It is very much to the interest of the debenture holders that they should be able to do so, as without that they could not earn any money.

The appellants bought from the company some 7,000 barrels, for which they paid £1,225. They never received some of the barrels, and to the extent to which there was a short delivery they were creditors of the company for the price of every barrel which was undelivered, there being to that extent a total failure of consideration, which would enable them to have the price back or set off the amount of it against any debt owing by them to the company. They claim the right to set off that amount against the rent which they owe to the company, and they say that that right being an existing right when the debenture holders obtained the appointment of the receiver on the 30th of October, 1894, the debenture holders cannot now interfere with it. The answer of the debenture holders is, in the first place, that the claim is really one for unliquidated damages for a breach of contract, and that cannot be a set-off against the rent. I do not think that that is so. The barrels were not earmarked in any way, and the property in them did not pass. It is not a case for an action of trover, and the appellants were right in making their claim on the ground of short delivery for the price of the barrels not delivered. That is a claim for a liquidated sum.

Then the debenture holders say that, even so, this debt cannot be set off against the rent, because when it was incurred the appellants had notice of the assignment of all the assets of the company made by the debentures. That is a very important question. No doubt, in an ordinary case, when a debt has been assigned and notice of it has been received by the debtor, no right to set off in his favour can arise as against the assignee. On behalf of the debenture holders it is said that there is no difference in this respect between an ordinary assignment and an assignment made by debentures such as these; but I think that there is. If there were not, a company could not obtain credit without the consent of its debenture holders, and the right of a company to carry on its business in the ordinary way would be so crippled by the issue of debentures that it could not after that carry on its business at all. One means by which a company could earn money would be lost if it could not deal with people upon such terms that a right to set off cross debts could arise between them. That view of the effect of debentures would be mischievous. There is no authority for it, and it is contrary to principle, and contrary to the bargain made by the debenture holders that until they take possession their debtors can continue to carry on their business. It appears to me that this view is untenable, and if adopted would be commercially disastrous. The right to set off which the appellants claim is, in my opinion, established.

The second question is whether the appellants are under the letters of hypothecation entitled to the debts dealt with by them. It is said that the company was not bound by the letters because Mr. Davey had no authority to pledge the debts. Persons who deal with directors of companies must look to see what powers the directors have under their articles, and in this case the articles show that the directors could appoint a managing director to exercise all their powers other than the signing of bills of exchange and promissory notes. So far, therefore, as the appellants knew, Mr. Davey had all the powers which he claimed. He was managing director, and might have had those powers. They were not bound to inquire into the books of the company to see whether his appointment was validly made. It is sufficient for persons who deal with a managing director of a company in the ordinary course of business and bonâ fide if the articles of the company show that he might have the powers which he purports to have. In the absence of notice that he had not the powers which his co-directors might have conferred on him, persons dealing with him would have a right to assume that he had such powers. That that is so, is shown by a long string of cases. I think the appellants were entitled to assume that Mr. Davey had the power which he exercised.

LOPES, L.J.—Where there is a claim in respect of goods paid for but not delivered the claimant may adopt either one or the other of two courses. He may, on the one hand, sue in trover and recover the goods or damages for their conversion, which would be unliquidated damages. I very much doubt whether in this case that would have been successful, as the property in the barrels had not passed. They were not earmarked, and an action in trover does not lie except for specific property. On the other hand, the claimant might waive the conversion, and sue for the money which he had paid, and for which he had received no consideration, as money had and received, which would be a liquidated demand. Counsel for the respondents said that to enable a person to succeed in the second kind of action which I have mentioned, the failure of consideration must be complete. That, however, is not correct in a case like this, where the consideration is severable. In my opinion the appellants had a good right to set off. It was further said that such a right is not good as against the assignee of a debt where notice of the assignment is given to the debtor before the right to set off arose, and that that was so even where the assignment was made by a debenture security such as those issued by this company. No doubt, in the case of an ordinary assignment of a debt that would be so, but in the case of debentures such as these it is different. If the contrary view could be maintained, it would be monstrous. In that case debtors who were also creditors of their creditor would be precluded from availing themselves of a right to set off after they had notice of an assignment of a debt which was a mere floating security, and which in its nature contemplated the business of the debtor being carried on in the ordinary way, with power for him to mortgage or sell his assets so long as it was done in the ordinary business way. If an assignment by a debtor such as this could prevent a right to set off accruing, it would be a serious thing for companies. They would be crippled in their business by the issue of debentures, and would not be able to obtain credit, the result of which would be that the debenture holders would not receive their interest. Everything, in the interests of both parties, must depend upon the company being able to carry on its business in the usual way. On this point, therefore, I think that the decision of North, J., was wrong.

Upon the question of the hypothecation, I think, upon the evidence, that Mr. Davey was in fact managing director, and that he acted in that capacity. The articles of association of the company show that it was within the power of the board to delegate to a managing director the powers which Mr. Davey has exercised. There was no doubt an irregularity in the way in which it was done; but the question is whether, the delegation being intra vires, the irregularity was sufficient to make the acts done in pursuance of it invalid. Upon that I will read a passage at pp. 159 and 160 of the 5th ed. of Lindley on the Law of Companies: "In Smith v. The Hull Glass Co. it was held that a company registered under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110 was liable to pay for goods ordered by persons in its employ, and that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove that those persons were authorized by the directors to order the goods in question. Maule, J., went further than this, and his judgment is an authority, for the broad proposition that a company is bound by the acts of persons who take upon themselves, with the knowledge of the directors, to act for the company, provided such persons act within the limits of their apparent authority, and that strangers dealing bonâ fide with such persons have a right to assume that they have been duly appointed." The principle there enunciated is applicable to this case. It cannot be said that Mr. Davey was not acting within the limits of his apparent authority, nor that the appellants were not acting bonâ fide, nor that they had no right to assume that Mr. Davey was duly appointed. I think that the appeal must succeed on this point also.

KAY, L.J.—The appellants owed the company a considerable sum as a simple contract debt, and the company owed the appellants what was in my view a debt of a liquidated amount, from which circumstances a right to set off would arise. Before North, J., it was argued that the claim of the appellants was for unliquidated damages, in which case it would be difficult to assert a right to set off. But the claim was for 3s. 6d. per barrel, for 3,870 barrels which had not been delivered or set apart for the appellants, and the property in which had not passed to them. There was a short delivery, and to that extent there was a total failure of consideration. That is a claim for a liquidated amount, a claim for money had and received due from the company to the appellants.

Then comes the question whether the right to set off can be asserted against the debenture holders. The argument was that the debentures were issued before the debt was incurred, that they charged all the assets of the company, and that the appellants had notice of them, and that a debtor cannot, after notice of the assignment of his debt, set off any claim of his against it. Does that apply in the case of debentures such as these? Counsel hesitated to go so far as that. But they said that there was no right of set off because no action had been brought in which it could have been asserted. I think that that is not so. I think that if at the time of the assignment there was an inchoate right to set off, it can be asserted after the assignment, as the assignment is subject to the rights then in existence. The question is whether the assignment took place at the date of the issue of the debentures, or at the date of the appointment of the receiver. It is well established that in the case of a floating charge like this, made by a company, the company can deal with all its property in the ordinary way of business until the debenture holders intervene. When they intervene their charge becomes crystalized, and they can take possession of the assets of the company. Therefore the date to be regarded is not the date of the issue of the debentures, but the date of taking possession. It would be most unfortunate for the debenture holders themselves if it were otherwise. It would be fatal to the business of the company, if an equitable right such as the right to set off could not be asserted against the company after the debentures had been issued. In that case the business of the company would be paralyzed in a way which would be disastrous to the company, and also to the debenture holders who would naturally wish the company to have all possible facilities for carrying on its business. In my opinion there was in this case an inchoate right of set off at the time of the appointment of the receiver. The assignment effected by the debentures only became complete at that time, and then took effect subject to the equities then existing, one of which was this inchoate right of set off.

On the second point I have no doubt that Mr. Davey was managing director; whether he was formally appointed or not, he acted as such, and persons dealing with the company had a perfect right to deal with him on that footing. The articles show that the directors had power to depute to a managing director all their powers except that of signing bills, so that in giving the letters of hypothecation Davey was doing nothing ultra vires of a managing director. It was within the power of the directors to give him authority to sign them, and it would be extraordinary if persons dealing for value with a company like this were bound to inquire whether a managing director had in fact had delegated to him the powers which his co-directors might have delegated to him. There is a series of cases which show that such persons are not bound to make such inquiry, but can assume that a managing director is doing what is within his power, if it was within the power of the directors to delegate it to him. Then it was said that in this the intention was that the letters of hypothecation should be the act of the board, and not of the managing director. At all events the board were aware of what had been done, and there was a meeting of the board on the next day at which no objection to it was taken. The appellants had a right to assume, and the court will assume in their favour, that the managing director had power to sign the documents as he did, and they were justified in relying on the authority which they had a right to assume that he had to act in that way; and there has been in my opinion a complete hypothecation of the debts in their favour.

This was an administration action, and it neither appeared from the writ nor in the title to the statement of claim that the plaintiff was suing on behalf of himself and all other creditors; but in the prayer, the plaintiff, "suing on behalf of himself and all other creditors," claimed administration of the real and personal estate of the testatrix in the event of the defendant not admitting assets.

made by the debenture holders that until they take possession their debtors can continue to carry on their business. It appears to me that this view is untenable, and if adopted would be commercially disastrous. The right to set off which the appellants claim is, in my opinion, established.

The second question is whether the appellants are under the letters of hypothecation entitled to the debts dealt with by them. It is said that the company was not bound by the letters because Mr. Davey had no authority to pledge the debts. Persons who deal with directors of companies must look to see what powers the directors have under their articles, and in this case the articles show that the directors could appoint a managing director to exercise all their powers other than the signing of bills of exchange and promissory notes. So far, therefore, as the appellants knew, Mr. Davey had all the powers which he claimed. He was managing director, and might have had those powers. They were not bound to inquire into the books of the company to see whether his appointment was validly made. It is sufficient for persons who deal with a managing director of a company in the ordinary course of business and bonâ fide if the articles of the company show that he might have the powers which he purports to have. In the absence of notice that he had not the powers which his co-directors might have conferred on him, persons dealing with him would have a right to assume that he had such powers. That that is so, is shown by a long string of cases. I think the appellants were entitled to assume that Mr. Davey had the power which he exercised.

LOPES, L.J.—Where there is a claim in respect of goods paid for but not delivered the claimant may adopt either one or the other of two courses. He may, on the one hand, sue in trover and recover the goods or damages for their conversion, which would be unliquidated damages. I very much doubt whether in this case that would have been successful, as the property in the barrels had not passed. They were not earmarked, and an action in trover does not lie except for specific property. On the other hand, the claimant might waive the conversion, and sue for the money which he had paid, and for which he had received no consideration, as money had and received, which would be a liquidated demand. Counsel for the respondents said that to enable a person to succeed in the second kind of action which I have mentioned, the failure of consideration must be complete. That, however, is not correct in a case like this, where the consideration is severable. In my opinion the appellants had a good right to set off. Practice — Judgment by consent — Order passed and entered by the registrar—Consent given under mistake —Motion to vary judgment—Power of court to alter judgment—R. S. C., ord. 28, r. 11—Fresh action to set aside judgment.

A court can only, except possibly with the consent of all parties to the action, interfere with a judgment passed and entered (not being an order made on an interlocutory application) (1) in the case of an accidental slip which can be rectified under R. S. C., ord. 28, r. 11; (2) where the court finds that the judgment as drawn up does not state what it decided and intended.

The proper remedy for a party who has consented to a judgment under a mistake is to proceed by a fresh action to set aside such judgment.

Motion.

This was a motion in this action on the part of John Wilding, one of the defendants, that an order made by consent in the said action on the 23rd of November, 1894, and which had been passed and entered, might be set aside, and that the action might be reheard, on the ground that the consent of the plaintiffs and defendants to such order was given by mistake and that such order did not express the true intention of the parties thereto, and that in any case the consent of the defendant John Wilding to such order was given by mistake or under misapprehension as to the effect thereof. The facts of the case were as follows.

The action had been brought by the plaintiffs as second mortgagees against the said John Wilding and R. Wilding, since deceased, as first mortgagees in possession, to obtain accounts of what was due from John Smith, the mortgagor, to the said first mortgagees, and for redemption of the premises mortgaged.

The action came on for trial before Romer, J., on the 23rd of November, 1894, when a declaration was made by his lordship with consent, and certain accounts and inquiries were directed to be made. This judgment was passed and entered by the registrar.

The question in dispute was as to the footing on which the accounts were to be taken. On the 4th of December, 1895, the Court of Appeal made an order in the action on the construction of the consent order to the effect that the accounts were to be taken on the footing of a cash account. The applicant in his affidavit in support of the motion denied that he had ever given authority to his counsel or solicitors to the accounts being taken otherwise than as mortgagees' accounts.

They referred to the report of the case, 39 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 448.

Hopkinson, Q.C., replied.

ROMER, J.—This is a motion to discharge a judgment given at the trial of the action, notwithstanding that such judgment has been passed and entered. The application is made in the action in which judgment was given, on the ground that the judgment, which was based on the consent of the parties at the trial, was consented to by the applicant under a mistake. In answer, the respondents have taken the objection that the court has no jurisdiction to discharge the judgment on such a motion, and that it has now no power to deal with its judgment on the grounds raised by the applicant unless a fresh action is brought to set aside the judgment. If I overruled the objection, it would be necessary to go into evidence on which the applicant might support his case. Speaking for myself, I am sorry that I do not see my way to overrule the objection, as my not doing so will cause expense and probably some delay. But I think that a fresh action must be brought, and that I have no jurisdiction to try the question on motion except with the consent of all the parties. I have offered to hear it if all the parties will consent, but the required consent has been refused. I should only be glad to find, if the case went to the Court of Appeal, that my grounds for refusing the application were insufficient. As the authorities now stand I have no option but to refuse the motion. The court has no jurisdiction after the judgment at the trial has been passed and entered to rehear the case. That is clear. The Court of Chancery had formerly power to rehear cases which had been tried before it, even after the decree had been entered; but that is not so since the Judicature Acts. So far as I know the only cases in which the court can interfere after the passing and entering of the judgment are these: (1) Where there has been an accidental slip in the judgment which has been drawn up, in which case the court has power to rectify it under ord. 28, r. 11; (2) where the court finds that the judgment, as drawn up, does not correctly state what the court actually decided and intended. I am not now speaking of cases where the court acts by the consent of the parties. If the parties had consented I might have had jurisdiction, but even that is not free from doubt; and I am not speaking now of merely interlocutory orders, even if drawn up, as to which different considerations apply, as was pointed out by the late Master of the Rolls in Mullins v. Havell, 11 Ch. D. 763, 27 W. R. Dig. 158.

This being so, is the applicant's case brought under either of the two heads of exceptions to the rule that after the judgment has been passed and entered the court has no power to alter it? In my judgment the case does not fall within either exception. In the first place I do not think that it would be putting a fair interpretation on ord. 28, r. 11, to say that this case was within that rule. It is not the case of a clerical mistake or an error arising from an accidental slip or omission. I say that, although it is quite true that the rule would apply in a proper case where there had been a mistake in fact, on which the judgment was obviously founded. In this case I cannot, without going into evidence and really trying the matter out, decide at once that there has been an accidental slip or omission, and it is clear that this case is not within ord. 28, r. 11. And certainly it is not within the second exception. The order, as drawn up, simply expressed what the parties consented to, and contains the words consented to, and I cannot say that the judgment does not carry out what the court decided and intended to decide. Having stated the principles to be applied, I will now call attention to the cases which are in support of the application.

The first case in point of date is Davenport v. Stafford. That was a case under the old practice, when the Court of Chancery had the inherent power of rehearing cases even after the drawing up and the passing of the decree. Davenport v. Stafford, however, merely decided that in the opinion of the then Master of the Rolls the court in the exercise of its discretion would not rehear the case after the decree had been entered on the ground of fraud; but would rehear it in the case of a mere mistake. That case has no application to the modern practice under the Judicature Acts.

The next case is In re Swire. That case decided this, viz., that even when a judgment had been drawn up, passed, and entered, it might still be altered if the court saw that it did not truly represent the judgment. In deciding that case, Cotton, L.J., says, 30 Ch. D. 243: "In my opinion the court has jurisdiction over its own records, and if it finds that the order as passed and entered contains an adjudication upon that which the court has never adjudicated upon, then, in my opinion, it has jurisdiction, which it will, in a proper case, exercise to correct its record, that it may be in accordance with the order really pronounced." That case has no bearing on the case before me; because it cannot truly be said that here the judgment does not truly express the meaning and intention of the court. Mullins v. Howell, to which I have already referred, was a case of an order made on an interlocutory application, and that was the very ground taken by Sir George Jessel, M.R., for entertaining the jurisdiction to discharge the order, though he states a further ground. It was a case of attachment, and the court has, as he stated, a discretion as to issuing an attachment, and would not in that case exercise it. That case is no authority for me here. Then I come to Barker v. Purvis, 56 L. T. 131, 35 W. R. Dig. 106. That was a case of slip, which was corrected under ord. 28, r. 11. The last case is Hickman v. Berens, [1895] 2 Ch. 638. There the compromise made was more in the nature of a compromise in an interlocutory proceeding, and no order was drawn up. No objection then was taken on the ground that the compromise could not be set aside on motion, but only in a fresh action; and it is clear that an objection of that kind must be taken at once, as is pointed out in Gilbert v. Endean, 27 W. R. 252, 9 Ch. D. 259. The decision in that case therefore affords no reason for thinking that a judgment which has once been passed and entered can be set aside on motion.

There were two other cases cited, which as far as they go are against the applicant's contention. One is the Huddersfield Banking Co. v. Lister & Sons. In that case Vaughan Williams, J., refused to upset an order for a compromise on motion, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to do so. When that case was before the Court of Appeal it appears that the Court of Appeal did not entertain the appeal in its then form, but gave leave to bring an action, which was accordingly brought and resulted in the judgment being set aside. That case is directly opposed to the applicant's contention. As to Emeris v. Woodward it is not clear on the report what the facts were. I cannot gather whether the order had been entered or not. If it had been, it is an authority against the applicant. If it had not, it goes beyond what the respondents ask me to decide here, for North, J., held that he could not entertain such an application by motion. But that case was before the decision in Hickman v. Berens, and, having regard to Hickman v. Berens, I doubt if it would now be held that an action to set aside a compromise was in every case necessary, even although the order had not been drawn up. I cannot help thinking that if the order had not been passed and entered the court could entertain a motion to discharge it on proper grounds. I do not say that even when the order is not drawn up the court would always entertain a motion; for example, I doubt if it would do so when from the nature of the ground on which the application was based conflicting evidence had to be gone into or viva voce evidence considered. In many cases the court might decline to set aside a compromise on motion, even if it had jurisdiction to do so. So far as the authorities go I think they show the principles I laid down at the beginning of my judgment, and I must dismiss this application with costs. This will not, of course, prejudice the right of the applicant to bring a fresh action to set aside the judgment.

Motion dismissed.

May 19.

COOK (Appellant) v. HAINSWORTH (Respondent). (a.)

Local government—Bye-laws—Validity—New buildings—Powers of corporation to disapprove of plans—Leeds Improvement Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. ccx.), s. 57—Notice to stop building disregarded—Penalty.

The Corporation of Leeds under the powers given them by certain local improvement Acts made bye-laws relating to new buildings in the city.

Bye-law 61 provided that any person who shall erect a new building without having the plans previously approved of by the Corporation shall be liable to a penalty.

C., a building owner, sent in plans, which the Corporation, within twenty-one days, gave written notice to C. of their refusal to pass, on the ground, as stated in their notice, that the provisions of section 57, sub-sections (1) and (3), of the Leeds Improvement Act, 1893, would not be complied with by the proposed plan.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

C. thereupon commenced to erect the buildings in accordance with the plans, and was summoned by the Corporation and convicted under bye-law 61.

Held, that, although bye-law 61 purported to give an absolute power to the Corporation to sue for a penalty whenever a building was commenced without their previous approval having been obtained, yet, as the Corporation had not used that power capriciously, but had stated the grounds for their disapproval, the conviction was right and must be affirmed.

Special case stated by C. Milner Atkinson, Esq., a stipendiary magistrate for the city of Leeds.

The material facts set forth in the case were these. An information was laid by Davidson Hainsworth, the respondent, an inspector of new buildings for the city of Leeds, acting on behalf of the corporation, charging George Cook, the appellant, that he in September, 1895, did "unlawfully erect certain new buildings, to wit, a house and shops in Otley-road and Wood-lane, Headingley, in the said city, without having the plans thereof previously approved by the corporation, as required by bye-law No. 61 of the bye-laws relating to new streets and buildings duly made and ordained by the Council of the city." On the 14th of June, 1895, the appellant had given the corporation notice of his intention to erect the premises in question, and deposited plans and sections indicating in detail the buildings which it was proposed to construct. On the 24th of that month the corporation gave the appellant written notice that the plans were disapproved of by them, inasmuch as a back road, in accordance with section 57 of the Leeds Improvement Act, 1893, was not provided, and as the back of the proposed house and shops would be less than 19ft. 6in. from the boundary of the property, contrary to sub-section 3 of that section. In spite of this notice, the appellant in September, 1895, began erecting buildings on the site, which were admittedly in accordance with the plans sent in.

Proceedings were thereupon taken by the corporation against the appellant, the building owner.

The magistrate convicted the appellant under bye-law 61, and imposed a penalty of £3, inclusive of costs.

The building owner appealed, and the question for the opinion of the court was whether the conviction was right.

Bye-law No 61, under which the proceedings were instituted, directs that any person who shall erect any new building without giving twenty-one days' notice in writing to the corporation, and previously delivering plans and sections showing in detail the situation, character, and size of the proposed new buildings, or without having the plans approved by the corporation, or erecting buildings in any wise contrary to plans and sections as approved, shall be liable for each offence to a penalty.

By bye-law 63 it is provided that the corporation shall give notice of their approval or disapproval of the proposed new buildings to the building owner within twenty-one days after the plans have been sent in by him.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (with him Bairstow), for the appellant.—The bye-law is unreasonable and bad, because it gives an absolute power of veto to the corporation whether the provisions of the bye-law as to the plans are complied with or not. Here admittedly the plans meet the requirements of the bye-law, for no alterations were directed to be made in them before the sanction of the corporation would be given. In the case of Reg. v. Mayor of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 60 L. T. N. S. 963, 53 J. P. 788, the corporation disapproved of plans solely on the ground that the new buildings in their opinion were undesirable, and the court held that the corporation had no absolute discretion to disapprove of plans sent in, but could do so only where there would be a breach of a statute or of a bye-law as to new buildings. The bye-law is, moreover, ultra vires, as it contains provisions unauthorized by any statute.

Forbes, Q.C. (with him Sir George Morrison), for the respondent.—The bye-law is not ultra vires, for it is expressly authorized by certain local Acts. See section 51 of the Leeds Improvement Act, 1866; section 26 of the Leeds Improvement Act, 1872; and section 40 of the Leeds Improvement Act, 1877. The corporation have given good and sufficient grounds for objecting to the new buildings, and therefore the case of Reg. v. Mayor of Newcastle does not apply: Baker v. Mayor of Portsmouth, 25 W. R. 677, 3 Ex. D. 4; Hall v. Nixon, 23 W. R. 612, L. R. 10 Q. B. 152; and Robinson v. Local Board of Barton Eccles, 32 W. R. 249, 8 App. Cas. 798. The building owner, moreover, instead of commencing to erect the houses after receiving notice from the corporation that the plans were not approved, might, if he thought himself aggrieved at the decision the corporation had arrived at, have appealed to the quarter sessions under section 128 of the Leeds Improvement Act, 1866, the provisions of which are incorporated with the Leeds Improvement Act, 1877; or he might have applied to the High Court for a mandamus to compel the corporation to pass the plans.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The principle of law raised by this appeal is one of importance, and the question we have to decide is whether bye-law No. 61 is valid or not. The corporation had expressed their disapproval of certain plans sent in by the appellant relating to some houses he proposed to erect; and it must be noted that the corporation, in deciding not to pass the plans, gave the reasons for their disapproval in a notice to that effect sent by them to the building owner within the time prescribed for doing so in the Act. The building owner disregarded that notice, and was summoned by the corporation. When the matter came before the stipendiary magistrate the building owner contended that the bye-law was bad; and the corporation took up this ground—not that they could, by virtue of the bye-law, without stating any reason for so doing, disapprove of plans, not that their decision, whether right or wrong, was binding—but that they had given certain reasons for their disapproval, and that the magistrate was not the judge to determine whether those grounds of objection were good or bad, but that he was bound to impose a fine on the building owner for having committed a breach of the bye-law. There was, no doubt, a remedy open to the building owner by appeal to quarter sessions, or by a mandamus, if properly pursued, if their disapproval of the plans was arbitrary or unreasonable. The facts show that the building owner has done that which made him incur a penalty under the bye-law; but it seems to me to be a fallacy to suggest that the power of the corporation is limited in such matters to the powers vested in them by the bye-laws alone, and that the validity of their decision depends on whether the bye-law is reasonable or unreasonable, when the bye-laws were made under express powers given by Acts of Parliament, which the corporation are bound to take into consideration when giving their decision. The magistrate, in my opinion, was right in convicting the appellant, and the conviction ought to be affirmed.

WILLS, J.—I think that any bye-law which purports to give an unqualified and absolute power to a corporation to apply for a penalty merely because a building has been begun without their approval having been first obtained, under all circumstances, would be an unreasonable one, looking at the general legislation applicable in other places. Indeed, in face of the decision given in Reg. v. The Justices of Newcastle-upon-Tyne it would be impossible to hold any bye-law reasonable which gave a corporation an absolute discretion to disapprove of plans submitted to them, on the simple ground that in their opinion the building was not desirable. The party aggrieved by the adverse decision of the Leeds corporation is not necessarily bound by that decision, for there is an express provision made for his pursuing a remedy both in the bye-laws themselves and in the Local Improvement Acts. In my judgment therefore the bye-law is reasonable, and the magistrate was right in convicting the building owner.

DERBYSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL (Respondents) v. MAYOR, &C., OF DERBY (Appellants). (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Penal or criminal matter—Pollution of Rivers Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75), s. 10.

By the Pollution of Rivers Act, 1876, s. 10, the county court has power, where any offence against the Act is committed within its district, by summary order, to require any person to abstain from the commission of such offence, and, where the offence consists in default to perform a duty under the Act, to require him to perform such duty in the manner in said order specified. The county court has, under the same section, the further power, in case of default being made in complying with any such order, of ordering the payment of a penalty.

Held, that proceedings instituted to obtain the former order were not proceedings in a penal or criminal matter, and that an order for discovery made in them was right.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Derbyshire County Court.

The appellants (the Mayor and Corporation of Derby), who were the sanitary authority for Derby, formerly discharged their sewage into the River Derwent. The respondents (the Derbyshire County Council) took proceedings in the county court, under section 10 of the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876, to compel the appellants to stop the discharge of sewage into the river. In the course of those proceedings the respondents obtained an order for discovery of documents and for the administration of interrogatories. The appellants appealed against that order, on the ground that the proceedings were in a criminal or penal matter, and that there was therefore no power to order discovery.

Section 10 of the Rivers Pollution Act is as follows: "The county court having jurisdiction in the place where any offence against this Act is committed may by summary order require any person to abstain from the commission of such offence, and where such offence consists in default to perform a duty under this Act may require him to perform such duty in manner in the said order specified. The court may insert in any order such conditions as to time or mode of action as it may think just, and may suspend or rescind any order on such undertaking being given or condition being performed as it may think just, and generally may give such directions for carrying into effect any order as to the court seems meet. Previous to granting such order the court may, if it think fit, remit to skilled parties to report on the best practicable and available means and the nature and cost of the works and apparatus required, who shall in all cases take into consideration the reasonableness of the expense involved in their report.

"Any person making default in complying with any requirement of an order of a county court made in pursuance of this section shall pay to the person complaining, or such other person as the court may direct, such sum, not exceeding £50 a day, for every day during which he is in default, as the court may order; and such penalty shall be enforced in the same manner as any debt adjudged to be due by the court . . ."

Graham, for the appellant.—This was a proceeding in a penal matter, and the respondents were therefore not entitled to discovery: Hummings v. Williamson, 32 W. R. 267, 11 Q. B. D. 533; Mellor v. Denham, 5 Q. B. D. 467, 28 W. R. Dig. 163; Reg. v. Whitchurch, 7 Q. B. D. 534; Jones v. Jones, 37 W. R. 479, 22 Q. B. D. 425; and Reg. v. Buchanan, 15 L. J. Q. B. 227. Though the proceedings in question were not to recover a penalty, the ultimate result of them would be a penalty, and therefore they were proceedings in a penal matter. The discovery obtained in these proceedings would be of use to the respondents in the ultimate proceedings for the penalty.

Stanger, Q.C., and Carver, for the respondents.—The proceedings here were initial proceedings, but they were not in themselves penal proceedings. The ultimate order for the payment of the penalty in the event of disobedience to the first order was within the discretion of the county court to make or refuse. No case went so far as to say that where an order may be given, and disobedience to that order may be followed by an order imposing a penalty, the proceedings to obtain the first order were penal proceedings: Fisher v. Owen, 26 W. R. 581, 8 Ch. D. 645; Martin v. Treacher, 34 W. R. 315, 16 Q. B. D. 507; Adams v. Batley, 35 W. R. 437, 18 Q. B. D. 625; Downing v. Falmouth United Sewerage Board, 36 W. R. 437, 37 Ch. D. 234; Saunders v. Wiel, 40 W. R. 594, [1892] 2 Q. B. 321; Reg. v. Ambergate Railway Co., 17 Q. B. 957.

GRANTHAM, J.—There is no decision upon this point. It seemed difficult to say that a proceeding which would ultimately result in a penalty was not a criminal proceeding, and, if so, that it did not come within Reg. v. Whitchurch. But, on considering the terms of the Act, I have come to the conclusion that it altered the form of procedure from criminal to civil. The Legislature had that object in view in order to obviate the difficulty formerly experienced of enforcing the old common law rights where sewage was poured into a stream. The cases cited for the appellant followed Mellor v. Denham, and in each case the Act under which the proceedings were taken directed that the proceedings should be taken under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. But under this Act the proceedings were to be taken in the county court. The procedure provided by the Act was clearly inconsistent with the proceedings under the Act being criminal proceedings.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me, primâ facie, looking at section 3, that it may well be that a person who "knowingly permits to fall or flow or to be carried into any stream any solid or liquid sewage matter" may be deemed to have committed a misdemeanour. But it has been held in two cases that the use of the word "offence" does not necessarily imply a criminal offence. One must look at the consequences of the act, and if an act, though described as an offence, is yet not followed by a punishment, then it is not a crime. We find that the Legislature has thought fit to put a stop to what persons might otherwise have had a right to do. Persons might have acquired a right to pour sewage into the river in such a way that they could not be restrained from doing so by persons occupying land lower down. It would be a hardship to turn such persons into criminals. It was not even necessary that the acts prohibited by the statute should amount to public nuisances. It would have been a strong thing to have done to turn such acts into crimes. Provision was made in the Act that the county court should deal with offences against the Act. It was to hold inquiries and to make summary orders restraining persons from committing offences against the Act, or requiring them to perform duties under the Act, and it had the power of putting limitations upon such orders. It was to take steps to see what were the "best practicable means," and what would be the expense involved. That was all it had to do at first. It was not till something else happened that any penal consequences were to ensue, that is to say, when any person against whom an order was given, made default in complying with it. Then the county court might order the payment of a sum of money. That penal enactment was the only means of enforcing the order, which was an order in the nature of an injunction. Having regard to the circumstances that the procedure provided was of a civil nature, and that, instead of appointing the justices to administer the Act, the Legislature had referred the matter to a civil court, and having regard also to the fact that the Court of Appeal have entertained appeals from orders made under the Act, which they could only do on the assumption that they were civil matters, I cannot doubt that the proceedings are essentially civil, and not criminal.

ESCRITT AND OTHERS v. TODMORDEN CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY. (a.)

Industrial society—Deceased member's property—Intestacy—Distribution—Discretionary power—Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 39), s. 27.

The power given to the committee of an industrial society by section 27 of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, of distributing the property of a member who has died intestate to the next of kin without letters of administration is a discretionary power, and an action will not lie to compel the committee to exercise their discretion.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal of the defendant society from the County Court of Yorkshire, holden at Todmorden.

The plaintiffs were the next of kin of David Escritt, deceased, and claimed from the defendant society the sum of £10, part of a sum of £100 which had been deposited with the society by David Escritt.

In 1885 David Escritt nominated the £100 in favour of his ten children equally. He died in May, 1891, intestate.

Nine of the ten nominees had been duly paid their shares by the society.

The present action related to the share of John Escritt, one of the children of David Escritt. John Escritt had left England some years before his father's death, and was last heard of in January, 1884.

The plaintiffs contended that John Escritt must be presumed to have died before his father, and that therefore they were entitled on an intestacy to the lapsed share of John Escritt.

The society declined to presume that John Escritt had died before his father.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs. In the course of the hearing he amended the claim by adding the administratrix of David Escritt as a plaintiff.

The defendant society appealed.

The Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, s. 27 (1), enacts that if any member of a registered society entitled to property therein in respect of shares, loans, or deposits, not exceeding in the whole at his death one hundred pounds, dies intestate, without having made any nomination thereof then subsisting, the committee may, without letters of administration, distribute the same among such persons as appear to them, on such evidence as they deem satisfactory, to be entitled by law to receive the same.

C. A. Russell, for the defendant society.—In the circumstances which have arisen in this case the society is under no obligation to pay this £10 to the plaintiffs. Under section 27 of the Act of 1893 the society has a discretionary power. The section says: "The committee may . . . distribute." In the former enactment, the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876, s. 11, sub-section 6, the language was different, for the word "shall" was used. The inference to be drawn from this change of language is in favour of the society's contention.

Herbert Lush, for the plaintiffs, admitted that an action would not lie against the society under section 27.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that the contention of the defendant society as to the construction of section 27 is right. Assuming a state of facts which would entitle the committee of the society to act at all, action by them under the section is purely discretionary. Unless a member of the society has died intestate without any nomination of his property in the society subsisting at the time of his death, they cannot act under it at all; but even if these facts are proved, the section goes on, "the committee may" distribute the funds among such persons as appear to them entitled by law to receive the same. The change of language from that of section 11, sub-section 6, of the Act of 1876, which dealt with the same subject, is very significant, for in that section the word "shall" was used, and it appears to me that the change of language from "shall" to "may" was intentional and deliberate. The decision, however, does not and cannot relieve the society of the real difficulty in the case, which is the doubt that may remain whether the nominee was dead, and died without issue before David Escritt died. The committee can only act under section 27 if the nominee be out of the way. Whether they act under that section or not—if even by the judgment of a court they pay the administrator or next of kin of David Escritt, on the supposition that the nominee's claims are out of the way—and it turns out that they are wrong, they would have under sections 25 and 26 to pay over again.

The action of the committee under section 27 is, however, clearly discretionary.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree. I think the committee are entitled to require that they should be satisfied in the proper way both of the intestacy and of the fact that no nomination subsisted at the date of the death of the intestate; and even then I do not think that they can be compelled by action to exercise the discretion given to them by section 27.

The court made no order on the appeal, counsel for the society undertaking that the £10 should be paid to the plaintiffs.

Re HANCOCK.
MALCOLM v. BURFORD HANCOCK. (a.)

Power—Appointment—Irrevocable appointment to children—Subsequent appointment to wife—Subsequent appointment inoperative.

A settlement contained a power enabling the tenant for life to appoint the trust funds in favour of his children, subject to a proviso enabling him to appoint one-fourth of the income to "his wife" for her life. The tenant for life, who was married at the date of the settlement, in exercise of this power, irrevocably appointed the trust funds to his children, subject to his own life interest and "subject and without prejudice to" an appointment of one-fourth of the income to his wife for life, "if the same should take effect." His wife having died, on his remarriage he purported to appoint one-fourth of the income to his second wife for her life. His second wife survived him.

Held, that the words "his wife" meant the wife he had at the date of the settlement. But even if this were not so, the irrevocable appointment in favour of the children, being subject only to his own life interest and the appointment in favour of his then wife and not reserving any power of appointing to a second wife, precluded him from making any further appointment.

Decision of Kekewich, J., ante, p. 426, affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported ante, p. 426, where the facts will be found fully set out), holding that an appointment by a tenant for life to a second wife, under a power contained in a settlement, was ineffectual by reason of a prior exercise of the power in favour of the children of a first marriage.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts for the purposes of the appeal are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Lindley, L.J.

Farwell, Q.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the appellant, Lady Hancock.—The children's interest is subject to the power to jointure, which overrules the power to portion (Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., pp. 484-490). The words "his wife" are not confined to any particular wife: Isaac v. Hughes, L. R. 9 Eq. 191, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 94.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the children of the first marriage.—Re Parrott, Walter v. Parrott, 34 W. R. 553, 33 Ch. D. 274, shows that a devise or bequest to the wife of A. is confined to that particular wife (Jarman on Wills, 5th ed., p. 303). The case of a settlement is stronger than that of a will. Here the donee has done something inconsistent with the power of appointing, and consequently the power is gone: Farwell on Powers, 2nd ed., p. 15: Smith v. Death, 5 Madd. 371.

C. E. E. Jenkins, for the trustees.

Farwell, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The case is one which admits of argument, and has been exceedingly well argued by Mr. Farwell and Mr. Cartmell; but after all, there is such a thing as common sense, in the construction of a power, and it strikes me that common sense will enable us to see our way on the present occasion. The case stands thus.

By a settlement made in 1872 a certain sum of money which is referred to as the son's share, the son being Henry James Burford Hancock, was settled. The subject matter of the settlement was money. At the date of the settlement the son had a wife and three children, or at all events some children; and the children to whom he had a power of appointment were his children, not necessarily his children by his then wife. If she had died and he had married again, I do not doubt that the power of appointment would have been exercisable in favour of any of his children. Then in the settlement, after settling the fund on the son for life, there is this proviso: "Provided always that it shall be lawful for the said Henry James Burford Hancock by deed or by will or codicil to appoint that after his own death, or the determination of the trust hereinbefore declared in his favour, one-fourth part of the annual income of the said son's share shall be paid to his wife for her life or for any less period, and upon such conditions and with such restrictions as he shall think fit."

That is the proviso which we have to construe first of all, and the first question which arises is what is the meaning of this: "Provided that it shall be lawful for Henry Hancock by deed or will to appoint that after his own death, or determination of the trust in his favour, one-fourth part shall be paid to his wife." Does that extend to any wife that he might have, he having one at the time, or is it confined to the one which he had? It is most important to observe that this is a power to appoint not by will to his widow; that is not it at all, or at all events only part of it. It is to appoint by deed or will to his wife, the events contemplated being not only the event of his death, but another event, that is his bankruptcy or attempt to dispose of his property, in which case his power is to appoint to his wife. This has been likened to a power to jointure; but it is different, because the power to jointure applies to a widow, and this is something more. I think this means his then wife. I feel that very strongly; but it is possible by the exercise of a certain amount of ingenuity to throw a doubt on that, not in the events which have happened, but in the events which might possibly happen. Therefore I go on, and assume that the clause means something more than I think it does, and that under this clause under some conceivable circumstances another wife might take.

Let us now see what has been done. On the 26th of January, 1885, a deed of appointment was executed by the son, then Sir Henry Hancock, and he appoints thus. He refers to the instrument or settlement which I have just been quoting, and he says that he is desirous of making such appointment as hereafter mentioned, and then he appoints absolutely and irrevocably, subject and without prejudice to and from and after the determination of the said trust by the said indenture declared in his favour in the income of the same, if at the determination of the last-mentioned trust his wife Hannah shall be then living, that there shall be paid to her during the remainder of her life one equal fourth part of the income. That is to say, he irrevocably appoints to his then wife and makes a provision for her for life. Then comes a further witnessing part of the deed, which is an appointment subject and without prejudice to and from and after the determination of the said trust by the said indenture declared in his favour in the income of the same, and subject also and without prejudice to the trust in favour of his said wife under the appointment which he had just made, to his children. There is not a word there of any reservation of any power on his part to appoint thereafter to any wife. There is no reason to suppose that he thought of such a thing, and accordingly the deed ends there, except a power to revoke the shares of one of the children. That is in 1885. Now what is the effect of that? Could he after that, without having therein signified any intention whatever of altering that disposition, make another appointment to another wife, substituting so far as his children are concerned, a young life in front of them, instead of the life of their own mother? The effect is very startling, so far as the children are concerned. Whereas under this they might naturally think, that subject to the life interests of their father and mother, they were provided for, yet if it was competent for their father in the event of the death of their mother to make a provision for another wife who might be a very young woman, then their position would be different.

Now, Lady Hancock having died in 1893, Sir Henry Hancock married again and made an appointment in favour of his second wife. That is contained in a deed not very material to refer to. It simply says it is supplemental to the appointment which I have already referred to, "Whereas this deed is supplemental to two deeds poll respectively of the 26th of January, 1885," and it makes an appointment in favour of the second Lady Hancock.

Now comes the question, Was it competent for him to do that? I assume for the present purpose that the word "wife" in the original settlement of 1872 was not confined to the then Lady Hancock, as I have said I think it is. This is said not to be to the prejudice of the children, and it is put in this way, and it is very ingenious and arguable. It is said to be an elementary principle of the law of conveyancing as applied to powers, that you should read this appointment of January, 1885, into this settlement of March, 1872, and you will see that it is possible still to hold that that provision in favour of the wife is consistent with what has been done. Now, it appears to me, I confess, that what we are asked to do is this: to construe the two deeds without regard to the manifest intention of the appointor who executed the deed of January, 1885. That is where the formidable difficulty appears to arise. We are asked to do that which was never dreamt of by anybody, and to do a gross injustice to the children, who have acted on the faith, of course, that they were provided for by the appointment of January, 1885. I dare say that Lady Hancock is disappointed, and she has been led to suppose that the appointment in her favour was good; but if you look at it all round, it is inconsistent with the intention of the appointor to read these deeds in such a manner as to uphold the second, and I do not think any technical law would bind us to do it. If you want a technical answer, it is to be found in the doctrine laid down in Mr. Farwell's book on Powers, 2nd ed., at p. 15: "All powers, other than powers coupled with a trust or duty, may be suspended or destroyed either wholly or in part by the donees thereof." That rule applies to limited powers—namely, powers in favour of a wife or children. Then he says: "Any dealing with the estate inconsistent with its exercise must determine the option." If you put those two together, I confess what was done in January, 1885, was inconsistent with the good faith and intention on the part of the appointor to appoint to anybody else other than those for whom he was then providing. He was not doing a dishonest thing, but an honest thing, and never dreamt of altering his mind I think the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—After the very able argument I have listened to, perhaps it is presumptuous in me to say that I have no doubt of the way in which this case should be decided. Why not give effect to the words according to their ordinary and true meaning, notwithstanding that they may be contained in a deed or power to appoint? I have often thought that, courts of equity, pace my learned brothers Lindley and Kay are disposed to refine these things more than necessary, and to overlook the ordinary common-sense meaning of words when they are in deeds. Now take this deed. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] The question in this case is whether the appointment in favour of Sir Henry's second wife was valid or not, whether the power of appointing in favour of Sir Henry's wife was strictly in favour of his then wife, whether it was not so restricted as to be exhausted by the appointment in favour of Sir Henry's first wife. It is said that the power of appointment to his wife included any wife. The court is entitled to regard the state of things existing at the time of the execution of the deed. Sir Henry was then married, and in my judgment the wife contemplated and intended was the existing wife, and none other. If not, it would include any number of wives, and the interest of the children would be indefinitely postponed, and it would be only competent for them to deal with their vested interest subject to contingencies the extent of which could not be calculated upon. If Sir Henry exercised the power of appointment in favour of the first wife, speaking for myself, I should have thought it was so entirely in favour of that wife that he could not have exercised it in favour of any other. It is a question of construction, and I can only thus construe the power. To hold it could be exercised toties quoties would be most unjust to the children, and I cannot find anything in the deed to justify it. The appointments to the children and wife are made at the same time, and I observe that Sir Henry Hancock never intended to reserve to himself a power to defeat a grant made to his children. But assuming that I am wrong in that construction of the deed, I think he has exercised the power in favour of the first wife, and in my judgment the power is thereby exhausted. I think the appeal should be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—The deed of the 30th of March, 1872, seems to have been a post-nuptial settlement. By it certain funds, £28,000 Consols, were settled upon certain trusts; and the deed contained, besides the power of appointment to the children of Sir Henry Hancock, the settlor, a power by way of proviso, which has been read by Lindley, L.J., of appointing by deed or will after his own death, or the determination of the trusts thereinbefore declared in his favour, one-fourth part of the annual income to his wife for life. Now, at the time of this deed he was married and had a wife, and the first question that arises is whether the power of appointing to his wife for life means to any wife which he might have or only to a wife which he had at the date of the deed. As has been already observed, it is not a power to appoint to his widow or to appoint after his death a life interest to a wife, but a power to appoint after his death or after the determination of the interest thereby reserved to himself. He had reserved to himself by this deed a life interest, and that life interest was determinable in the case of bankruptcy or alienation or other events, and therefore it is that this power to appoint to a wife is by deed as well as by will, and to take effect on the determination of that life interest. I do not pause now to inquire whether the mode of limiting the life interest was applicable to a case of bankruptcy, because no bankruptcy happened, and the question does not now arise. What occasions the first question of some difficulty upon this deed is whether those words "his wife for her life" can primâ facie mean anything but the wife to whom he was then married. It is absolutely necessary for the court construing a deed of this kind to pay regard to the state of things at the time; and the state of things, as far as this point is concerned, which is most material, is the fact of Sir Henry having then at the date of the deed a wife, and of this power not referring to "any wife" or to the widow whom he might leave, which, of course, would be susceptible of a different construction, but only to "his wife." I feel the difficulty of saying absolutely that that can mean only the wife he had at the time, and not someone whom he might marry after the death of that wife. Supposing it to happen that he had made no appointment in favour of the wife he had at the time and had married again, and then for the first time exercised his power in favour of his second wife, I do not like to say positively now, that such an appointment would be an invalid appointment, which would be the case if we were to read the words "his wife" as referring only to the wife he had at the date of this deed. I feel the question is of some difficulty and doubt, but I think the proper mode of construing this deed is to refer to the wife that he then had, and not to include any wife whom he might afterwards marry.

I will assume, however, that any wife that he might afterwards marry might come within the terms of this power, which is inserted by way of proviso. What are the facts? While his first wife was still living Sir Henry by deed poll (which has been referred to, and therefore I will not mention it at length again) did make what he calls on the face of the deed an irrevocable appointment in favour of his wife for her life, and after her death for his children. Now, suppose any child, on the faith of that appointment, settled his share or dealt with his share, it would be an extraordinarily hard thing on that child to say afterwards, that Sir Henry having married again, although he had exercised his power in favour of his existing wife that did not exhaust the power, and he may now exercise it again in favour of his second wife, and thereby postpone the children to a wife who might have a young life and might live a great many years after his own death. That would be a very hard thing indeed on the children who had relied on the terms of this appointment as giving them an absolute vested and irrevocable interest. Such an appointment to the second wife would be a revocation pro tanto of the original appointment. Was that the meaning of the deed of appointment? I cannot satisfy my mind that it was. It is said that you ought to read this appointment into the original settlement, and in this order, that the appointment to the wife comes before the appointment to the children. I agree that that is so, as far as the appointments are valid appointments. Suppose you followed that rule in this case, you might have to read into this settlement first of all the appointment to his first wife, and then you must read in the appointment to the second wife, not as a remainder after the appointment to the first wife, but as an alternative appointment to the appointment of the first wife. Is that legitimate, and is that according to any rule or practice of the court in dealing with appointments of the kind? The result would be this, that I appoint to my first wife after the determination of my estate; if she should not be then living, then I appoint to my second wife after the determination of my estate; and, subject to those alternative life interests, I appoint to my children. Is that consistent with the appointment which he did actually make, irrevocably in favour of his first wife and children? I cannot bring myself to believe that it is; and therefore, even if the first point be as argued in favour of the appellants that this power of appointment to a wife would extend to any wife, yet having exercised it in this way by deed in favour of his existing wife it seems to me entirely contrary to the plain meaning and intention of that deed that he should afterwards, having married again, postpone the interests which he had given to the children by that deed of appointment, to the life of another wife, which certainly was not a thing within his contemplation when that deed of appointment was made. I therefore think that the learned judge was right in the decision at which he arrived, and that this appointment was so complete an exercise of the power of appointment that he had, in favour of the wife as to make it impossible for him after that appointment to make an appointment in favour of another wife, which I think would be entirely inconsistent with the terms of that deed of appointment.

The appeal therefore fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

Promissory note—On demand—Maturity—Gift—Renunciation—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 62, 89.

A promissory note payable to a specified person without the words "order" or "bearer" is a negotiable instrument within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Such a note, when made payable "on demand," is "at maturity" as soon as it is made, and therefore, under sections 62 and 89 of the Act, if the holder of the note desire to renounce all rights in it, the renunciation must be in writing, unless the note is delivered to the acceptor in person, though possibly delivery to the acceptor's legal personal representatives will suffice.

Accordingly, where the holder of a note made a parol renunciation of all rights in it and delivered the note to one of the devisees of the real estate of the acceptor, who by his will had charged his real estate with payment of his debts, the renunciation was held to be insufficient.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

This was a question arising upon the construction of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

On the 1st of August, 1865, the Rev. Abraham Edwards lent £200 to his brother-in-law, Mr. Walter Walters. For this sum Mr. Walters gave Mr. Edwards a promissory note payable on demand, with interest at 4 per cent. per annum. The note was made payable simply to Mr. Edwards without the words "or order."

Mr. Walters died in 1866, leaving the debt of £200 unpaid. By his will he devised some real estate in Cardiganshire specifically to his son and daughter, Thomas Walters and Annie Evans, and he also charged his real estate with the payment of his debts. His executors wound up his estate and paid his debts, with the exception of the debt of £200, of the existence of which they were ignorant.

In October, 1894, Mr. Edwards died, and in 1895 this action was brought by his administratrix against the executors of W. Walters, and against Thomas Walters and Annie Evans as the devisees of the real estate of W. Walters, for the purpose of obtaining payment of the £200 with interest out of the devised real estate.

The evidence showed that the defendants Thomas Walters and Annie Evans had during the life of Mr. Edwards voluntarily made him some payments by way of interest at 4 per cent. on the £200, the first of these payments being in 1878 and the last in 1889.

There was also evidence that in 1891, when Mrs. Evans was on a visit to her uncle, Mr. Edwards, he delivered up the promissory note to her, saying that he gave it to her.

The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 8 (4), provides that: "A bill is payable to order which is expressed to be so payable, or which is expressed to be payable to a particular person, and does not contain words prohibiting transfer or indicating an intention that it should not be transferable."

By section 62 (1): "When the holder of a bill at or after its maturity absolutely and unconditionally renounces his rights against the acceptor the bill is discharged. The renunciation must be in writing unless the bill is delivered up to the acceptor."

By section 83 (1): A promissory note is an unconditional promise in writing made by one person to another signed by the maker, engaging to pay on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time a sum certain in money to, or to the order of, a specified person or to bearer."

By section 89 (1) (with certain exceptions): "The provisions of this Act relating to bills of exchange apply, with the necessary modifications, to promissory notes"; (2) "In applying those provisions the maker of a note shall be deemed to correspond with the maker of a bill."

Kekewich, J., was of opinion that if a parol renunciation was sufficient, the evidence proved a renunciation sufficient to discharge the defendants. But he held that the note, being payable "on demand," was at maturity immediately on its being made, and that consequently, the delivery up not having been made to the maker, the renunciation was inoperative because it was not in writing. He accordingly gave judgment for the raising of the £200 with interest out of the devised real estate.

The defendants Thomas Walters and Annie Evans appealed.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Butcher, for the appellants.—The Act shows that the delivery must be to the acceptor, but cannot mean to the acceptor personally. It must be taken to mean anyone who represents the acceptor for the purposes of the bill. If this be not so, the result is that a renunciation by delivery to the legal personal representatives who are not interested is good, while delivery to the devisees who are interested is worthless. We suggest that the renunciation is good, provided the bill is given up. This is a claim which ought not to be enforced in equity.

In the course of the argument the following cases were referred to: Foster v. Dawber, 6 Ex. 839; Taylor v. Manners, 14 W. R. 154, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 48; Storm v. Sterling, 4 W. R. 543, 3 E. & B. 832, affirmed sub nom.; Cowie v. Sterling, 6 E. & B. 333; Rex v. Box, 6 Taunton 325; and also Byles on Bills, 11th ed., pp. 53 and 79, and 15th ed., 264.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Griffith Jones, for the plaintiff.—The estate in the appellants' hands is liable for the debt. [LINDLEY, L.J., referred to Crowe v. Clay, 2 W. R. 304, 9 Ex. 604.] By payment of interest in respect of the debt the debt is kept alive, and the plaintiff can sue for money lent. The renunciation to be effective must be in the manner pointed out by the statute. If delivery up of the note is to amount to a discharge of the debt, the delivery must be to a person liable on the note. The word "acceptor" would include his legal personal representatives, but it is a great extension to make it include devisees.

They referred to Roddam v. Morley, 5 W. R. 510, 1 De G. & J. 1; Re Hollingshead, 36 W. R. 660, 37 Ch. D. 651; Re England, 43 W. R. 491, [1895] 2 Ch. 100.

Renshaw, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J., after stating the facts, said: Walters' devisees contend that Edwards in his lifetime released the debt. What he did was this. In April or June, 1891, he gave the note to Mrs. Evans, who was one of the devisees, telling her in effect that he should never make any claim under it, and that she might keep it. Mrs. Evans has kept it from that time until now. The note was not indorsed to her, nor was there any writing at the time throwing any light on this transaction. What, then, is the effect of this transaction? It is contended that it is a release in law, or, at all events, in equity. A release at law is sought to be established by the law merchant apart from the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and if not by the law merchant, then by section 62 of that Act. The law merchant is stated in Foster v. Dawber. I do not understand that it applied to bills or notes not negotiable; but this difficulty is removed by section 8, sub-section 4, to which I have already alluded. The law merchant is adopted with modifications in section 62 of the Bills of Exchange Act. The modification introduced is the necessity for writing unless the bill is given up to the acceptor. In this particular the law merchant is inconsistent with the express provisions of section 62. The appellants' argument, based on section 97, sub-section 2, and on the law merchant, which before the Act formed part of the common law of England, cannot be supported.

Reliance is then placed on section 62 of the Act. This section, though in terms applicable to bills of exchange, is by section 89 made applicable to promissory notes payable to a particular person without the addition of the words "or order or bearer" (section 8, sub-section 4). Section 62, therefore, applies to the promissory note which is in question here. The maker of a promissory note corresponds with the acceptor of a bill (section 89, sub-section 2). A promissory note payable on demand is payable at once without any demand, and may be sued upon accordingly. Such a note therefore "matures" within the meaning of section 62 as soon as the note is made and delivered to the payee: Re George, 38 W. R. 617, 44 Ch. D. 627. I will now paraphrase section 62 and apply it to a promissory note payable on demand. The section will run thus: "When the holder of a promissory note payable on demand absolutely and unconditionally renounces his rights against the maker the note is discharged. The renunciation must be in writing unless the note is delivered up to the maker." In the present case there was no renunciation in writing. Can it, then, be said that it was delivered up to the maker? The maker had long been dead; but I am not prepared to say that the legal personal representatives of an acceptor or maker would not be included in the word acceptor or maker. The ordinary use of language and the general understanding of business men as well as of lawyers warrant such an interpretation of the word acceptor or maker in such a context. As Lord Macclesfield said in Hyde v. Skinner, 2 P. Wms. 196, "The executors of every person are implied in himself" (Byles, 11th ed., p. 53). But I cannot go further, and say that acceptor or maker in this section means or includes a legatee or devisee. Such an interpretation is not warranted either by the ordinary use of language or by the general understanding of business men or of lawyers. Consequently section 62 does not justify the contention that this note was discharged by the gift of it to Mrs. Evans.

In the course of the argument I expressed a doubt whether as the plaintiffs were not the holders of the note they could sue the maker's representatives either on the note or for money lent to the maker (see Crowe v. Clay, 20 W. R. 364, 9 Ex. 604); but as the devisees themselves hold the note and are not liable to be sued upon it by anyone, the reasoning on which that case was decided does not apply.

I come therefore to the conclusion that there has been no release or discharge at law of the debt due to Edwards' estate from Walters' estate. The defence founded on the Statute of Limitations fails as regards the devisees of the real estates by reason of their payment of interest: see Re Hollingshead, 36 W. R. 660, 37 Ch. D. 651.

There remains only the question whether the devisees of the real estate have been discharged in equity, though not at law. Edwards in his lifetime made no claim against Walters' executors, but there is no evidence to show that the devisees have been prejudiced by the mode in which the personal estate has been dealt with. There is no evidence that there was any personal estate. Moreover, the devisees for many years paid interest on the £200, and, apart from the gift of the note to Mrs. Evans, there is no ground for saying that Edwards so conducted himself as to render it inequitable on his part to insist on payment of his debt out of the real estate devised to those who recognized his demand. The gift of the note to Mrs. Evans is unquestionably strong evidence of an intention to forgive the debt; but unfortunately the note was not endorsed by the payee. Mrs. Evans could not therefore sue on it in her own name. Nor was there any consideration for the transaction, no consideration to support an agreement not to sue. There is, in fact, nothing except an intention not carried out. Such an incomplete transaction does not amount to a gift of the debt nor to an equitable release of it. In Taylor v. Manners, 14 W. R. 154, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 48, Turner, L.J., expressed a doubt whether a gift by a secured creditor of his security to the debtor might not amount even at law to a release of the debt if such was the intention of the creditor; but I confess I cannot adopt this suggestion. Turner, L.J., came to the conclusion that there was an agreement to release and a consideration for such agreement. Knight Bruce, L.J., differed. The decision therefore does not really assist the plaintiff. At law exoneration before breach need not be under seal, but a release must be under seal except in the cases provided by section 62 of the Bills of Exchange Act. A release in equity is often spoken of as something easy to establish. But I am not aware of any circumstances which amount to a release in equity and not at law except an agreement for valuable consideration to give a release or not to sue. Such an agreement, unless there is some reason for not enforcing it, has in equity the effect of a release. Again, a creditor may so conduct himself as to preclude him from obtaining equitable relief, and even from enforcing a legal demand. This I understand to have been Turner, L.J.'s, meaning when he said (L. R. 1 Ch. App., at page 56) he was not satisfied that there might not be considerations which would in this court prevent a debt from being enforced, although it might be subsisting at law. But to call such conduct a release in equity suggests false analogies and misleads.

In this case there is no release or discharge at law or in equity, and no conduct on the part of Mr. Edwards which precludes his representatives from obtaining payment from the devisees. An intention to discharge them from their liability is established, but that unfortunately is insufficient to afford them a defence to the claim made against them. A court of equity cannot enforce a mere intention to give or to forgive.

The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I will not recapitulate the facts which have already been stated in the judgment of Lindley, L.J. This note is payable to a person designated without the addition of the word "order" or "bearer," and would not have been negotiable before the statute. The old law, therefore, as laid down by Byles, J., in his book on bills, would be inapplicable. It was contended that the statute of 1882 did not apply because this note was not a negotiable instrument, but that contention cannot be maintained if section 8 of the statute is looked at. Besides, section 83 refers to a note and clearly covers a note made payable to a specified person. This note is therefore within the statute, and the case is governed by section 62. [His lordship then read that section and continued:] According to this section the note must be mature; a note such as this, payable on demand, is at maturity immediately it is made. In my opinion, however, the holder in the present case has by parol absolutely and irremediably renounced his rights against the acceptor. But the statute says the renunciation must be in writiug, unless the bill or note is delivered up to the acceptor. There was no writing, and the bill was not delivered up to the acceptor, in this case to the maker. It was delivered up to the devisees of the maker, who were no parties to the note, and could not have been sued on it. I am clearly of opinion that this is not within either the words or the meaning of the statute. It may be that the word "acceptor" or the word "maker" would include any person liable on the bill, as, for example, the personal representatives of the acceptor or maker, but I am quite clear that it cannot include the maker's devisees. The case is taken out of the Statute of Limitations by the payment of interest by the devisees of the real estate. There has been no release at law, and in my opinion there has been no discharge in equity. I think, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

KAY, L.J.—The administrator of a man named Edwards has brought this action against the executors and against the devisees of real estate of a person named Walters, to recover a sum of £200 lent in 1865 by Edwards to Walters. Walters died in 1866. By his will he charged his real estate with payment of his debts. His executors were ignorant of the existence of this debt, and have completely administered his personal estate; but the devisees of the real estate of Walters paid interest for some years, and up to 1889. The defence is that the debt has been released. It appears that Walters gave a promissory note to Edwards for the amount, and that in April or June, 1891, Edwards gave up to the devisees the promissory note with the intention of releasing the debt. The learned judge has found this to be the fact, and there seems no reason to doubt it. [His lordship then read section 62 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and continued:—] By section 89 the provisions of the Act apply with the necessary modifications to promissory notes. Therefore in section 62 we must read in this case "maker" instead of "acceptor." The difficulty is to say that this note has been delivered up to the maker. The actual maker, of course, was Walters, and it was not delivered up to him; but, if it had been delivered up to his executors after his death, I should think that would do, because they might have been sued on the note as standing in the place of the maker. The devisees of his real estate are not in the same position as his executors for this purpose. There is nothing in the Act to bring them within the definition of makers of the note. They might be joined with the executors in an action to make the real estate, which they took under the will of the maker of the note, liable for its payment, as has been done in this case. Payment on account by them would keep this right against the real estate alive, as was determined in the case of Roddam v. Morley and in Re Hollingshead. But these considerations do not authorize the court to say that the devisees of the real estate of the maker are themselves makers within the meaning of section 62 of this statute, or that they stand in the position of the deceased maker as his executors may be said to do. Before the statute the liability of any party to the note might be discharged by an express renunciation without writing and without consideration. This was by the law merchant (Foster v. Dawber, 6 Ex. 839), but it only applied to those who were parties to the note. The statute has altered this by requiring the renunciation to be in writing. I have no doubt that if the renunciation was made as required by the Act the debt would be completely discharged, and no action could be maintained on the note or to recover the loan. It is argued that the case does not come within the Act at all; that the renunciation contemplated by the Act is only against the maker, and if these defendants are not makers the matter may be treated as outside the statute, and that the loan has been effectually released, as far as they were concerned. The only authority cited for this was a case of Taylor v. Manners, where Turner, L.J., intimated, rather doubtfully, an opinion that the giving up of a policy of insurance which was the security for a debt might operate as a total release of the debt. Knight Bruce, L.J., dissented from this opinion. I do not see how this could be a release in equity, unless there was a valuable consideration for the release, and no case has been cited in which such a transaction has been held to be a release at law.

Then it was said that no one could sue for the debt in this case unless he was in a position to hand over the note to the defendants, and that would undoubtedly be so if there was any chance of the defendants being exposed to the risk of being sued upon the note by the holder. But no such danger can possibly arise, because the note is in the defendants' own hands.

With every desire to assist the defendants in a case in which it seems clear that the payee of the note intended to release all claim against them, I feel bound to hold that he has not carried out that intention effectually. He might have made the renunciation in writing, in which case I incline to think it would have been sufficient. He has not done this; he has made an attempt to give up the claim, which, being without consideration and not complying with the statute, in my opinion has not discharged the real estate devised to those defendants from liability.

Appeal dismissed.

A testator devised estates to trustees for a term of 500 years upon certain trusts, and subject thereto to certain persons successively for life. The trusts of the term were (inter alia) to pay to the person who for the time being should, subject to the term, be entitled under the will to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the devised estates a certain annuity. Subject to that trust, the trustees were directed, during the period of twenty-one years from the testator's death, to accumulate the rents and profits arising from the hereditaments comprised in the term, and apply the same, with the accumulations, upon trust to purchase land and settle the same as nearly as possible in the same manner as the estates devised by the will, and after the determination of the period of twenty-one years upon trust to pay the rents and profits to the person or persons for the time being entitled to the hereditaments comprised in the term and the reversion expectant on the term.

The testator died on the 2nd of November, 1875, and upon the death of C. D., on the 12th of April, 1893, J. D. became entitled to receive from the trustees an annuity of £3,000, and became tenant for life subject to the term.

Held, affirming the decision of Stirling, J., 43 W. R. 630 (Rigby, L.J., dissenting), that, having regard to the substance rather than the conveyancing form of the gift, the annuity to which J. D. became entitled was not one charged upon his own estate, and that consequently legacy duty was payable upon it by virtue of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 74, s. 4, and not succession duty.

Shirley v. Earl Ferrers, 1 Ph. 167, distinguished.

This was an appeal from the decision of Stirling, J., 43 W. R. 630, [1895] 2 Ch. 517. The facts are stated in the previous report and in the judgments of Lord Herschell and of Rigby, L.J. Stirling, J., held that legacy, and not succession, duty was payable (see the report, 43 W. R 630).

(a.) Reported by ARNOLD GLOVER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the appellants.—The decision of Lord Lyndhurst in Shirley v. Earl Ferrers, 1 Ph. 167, where the facts were in substance the same as in this case, applies. Sir James De Hoghton became tenant for life of the estate, and legacy duty is not payable.

They referred to 36 Geo. 3, c. 52; 45 Geo. 3, c. 28, s. 4; 55 Geo. 3, c. 185, Schedule 3; and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, s. 4.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the respondent.—Shirley v. Earl Ferrers does not apply, for the £3,000 is not paid out of Sir James De Hoghton's estate. [Lord HERSCHELL.—Could he live in the mansion-house?] Hickley v. Strangways, 35 W. R. 83, 34 Ch. D. 423, seems to show that he could not, nor could he exercise the powers of a tenant for life. See Settled Land Act, s. 2, sub-section 5. In Shirley v. Earl Ferrers the lady actually took the accumulations. Here they are to be laid out in the purchase of land. The gift is clearly an "annuity," and therefore within the words of the Act.

Sir R. B. Finlay, in reply.—It is not the case that Sir James de Hoghton could not exercise the powers of a tenant for life. See Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 56 and 58, and Re Clitheroe, 34 W. R. 169, 28 Ch. D. 378, 31 Ch. D. 135.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The question in this case is whether legacy duty is payable under the following circumstances. Sir Henry De Hoghton, who died on the 2nd of December, 1876, by his will devised his estates to trustees, their heirs and assigns, to the use of the same persons, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of 500 years, to commence from the testator's decease, upon the trusts hereinafter declared concerning the same, and, subject to that term and to the trusts thereof, to the use of Sir Charles De Hoghton and his assigns for life, with certain remainders to his issue in tail, with remainder to the use of Richard De Hoghton for life, with similar remainders in tail, with remainder to the use of Sir James De Hoghton for life. The trusts of the term were (inter alia) to pay to the person who for the time being should, subject to the term, be entitled under the will to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the devised estates an annuity which was, according to the age of the recipient, to be £1,000, £2,000, or £3,000 a year. Subject to that trust, the trustees were directed, during the period of twenty-one years from the testator's death, to accumulate the rents and profits arising from the hereditaments and premises comprised in the term, and apply the same, with the accumulations, upon trust to purchase land and settle the same as nearly as possible in the same manner as the testator's estates thereby devised, and, after the determination of that period of twenty-one years, to pay the rents and profits to the person or persons for the time being entitled to the hereditaments and premises comprised in the term and the reversion expectant on the term. The will contained the usual powers of leasing. These were to be exercisable during the period of twenty-one years just referred to, as well as during the minority of any tenant for life or tenant in tail, by the trustees of the term. It may be added that the successive tenants for life were empowered to charge the estate with a rent-charge in favour of a wife and portions in favour of children, and any appointment under these powers was to take effect in priority to the trust for accumulations. It was provided that no charge under any such appointment should take effect unless the person so charging, or some issue of such person, should become entitled to the rents and profits of the estate; but, for the purposes of such proviso, the will was to be construed as if the term of 500 years had not been limited therein. Richard De Hoghton died in August, 1892, and Sir Charles De Hoghton on the 12th of April, 1893. The respondent, Sir James De Hoghton, thereupon became entitled to receive from the trustees an annuity of £3,000, and became tenant for life, subject to the term. Stirling, J., held that legacy duty was payable in respect of this annuity.

The statute 8 and 9 Vict. c. 76, by section 4, provides that every gift by any will which shall be payable out of, or charged or rendered a burden upon, the real or heritable estate of the testator, whether such gift be by way of annuity or in any other form, shall be deemed to be a legacy. It cannot be denied that the gift in question comes primâ facie within these words. But it is said to have been decided that where the gift, whether by way of annuity or otherwise, is charged upon or payable out of the estate of the person to whom the gift is made, the case is not within the statute. Since the Succession Duties Act came into operation, there would in such a case be, it is said, a duty payable in respect of a succession under that Act, and prior to that Act it is said that no duty would have been payable in such a case. I will refer presently to the decision relied on. It has been often said that, in considering whether the case is within the Act relating to legacies or within the Act relating to successions, the substance of the matter must be looked at, and not the mere method of conveyancing by which the disposition of the testator's estate is provided for. This is the more necessary inasmuch as the Acts relate to Scotland as well as England, and the system of conveyancing and the rules by which it is governed are by no means identical in the two countries.

Now, I should certainly not be disposed to dissent from the proposition that there may be cases in which a gift, being charged on and payable out of the estate of the person entitled to the gift, is therefore not subject to legacy duty. But the question is whether, in the present case, when the substance of the matter is looked at and conveyancing forms are disregarded, the annuity to which the respondent is entitled is charged on or payable out of his estate in any sense which can give rise to such an exemption. When I speak of disregarding conveyancing forms, I am, of course, alive to the fact that the language used must be looked at to see what is taken under a will, and that such language must have its natural legal effect. I merely wish to emphasize the point that you must get behind all that is technical, and find out what the substantial effect of the disposition is.

The case is put for the appellants in this way. Sir Sir James De Hoghton, it is said, is tenant for life of the estate, subject indeed to the term, but that is a mere piece of machinery to facilitate the scheme of the testator; the annuity is charged none the less on the estate of which he is life tenant. Now there may, no doubt, be many cases in which, notwithstanding a prior term, it would be quite proper for the purpose we are dealing with to regard the estate as that of the person entitled subject to the term, and to speak of an annuity charged on it as being payable out of his estate. But what is the state of things in the present case during twenty-one years from the death of the testator? The respondent (Sir James De Hoghton) is not entitled to enter into possession; he has no right to receive any of the rents or profits; the management of the estate is vested by the will in the trustees; its administration does not rest with the respondent. As far as I can see his right is to receive an annuity of £3,000 a year, and no more. During the period of twenty-one years from the testator's death he can receive no more benefit from it than if he were a stranger to it altogether, and, unless he is alive at the expiration of the twenty-one years, no such right or benefit will ever accrue to him. He has indeed a power to charge the estate for certain purposes, but this is a power expressly conferred to charge the inheritance, and not merely his life estate. He acquires it by the express terms of the will, and does not derive it from the fact that, subject to the term, he is made life tenant. Under these circumstance, looking at the substance of the matter, I find myself quite unable to say that the annuity to which he is entitled is charged upon or payable out of his own estate in the sense to which I have referred.

It is said that the effect of the will is the same as if the respondent had been entitled to receive the rents and profits of the estate, and to retain for his own use each year £3,000 thereof. I do not think this is so. He would then, at least, have been entitled to enter upon a receipt of the rents and profits, which he is not under the testator's will. The rights which the respondent, in fact, possesses might, no doubt, have been conferred upon him in different ways, If the estate had been devised to the trustees absolutely, with directions to pay an annuity of £3,000 a year and accumulate the surplus income during twenty-one years, and then to settle the estate in such a way that the same persons who are made tenants for life and in tail under the will should become tenants for life and in tail, the position of the respondent would have been in substance the same as at present. He would have received just the same benefit; his annuity would have been secured in the same way. But it would have been then impossible to contend that the annuity was charged on or payable out of his estate. If in that case he would have got just the same pecuniary benefit as at present, it seems to me to follow that in substance the estate on which his annuity is charged, and out of which it is payable, cannot for the purpose we are considering be regarded as his estate.

It is true that, if Re Clitheroe Estate be correctly decided, the respondent may be in the position of a tenant for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, so that the power of leasing conferred on the trustees by the will cannot be exercised without his consent. I must in this court take that case to have been rightly decided. I do not think the decision touches the question which we have to determine. I think it is impossible to hold that, if this case could not have been regarded before the Settled Land Act was passed, as one in which the annuity was payable out of the respondent's own estate so as to exempt it from legacy duty, it can be differently regarded now. If this be the result, it would be a strange effect, indeed, of legislation dictated by quite different considerations. In my opinion the utmost effect of the Settled Land Act would be to add the respondent for some purposes to the trustees of the will as a quasi-statutory trustee, whose consent is necessary to certain dealings with the property.

The case relied on by the appellants is Shirley v. Earl Ferrers, decided by Lord Lyndhurst. It arose under the earlier Act relating to legacy duty, the 58 Geo. 3, c. 184, but there is no distinction for the present purpose between that and the later statute. In that case a testator devised estates to the use of trustees for the term of 500 years, and subject thereto to other trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the first and other sons of Caroline Shirley (then an infant), with divers remainders over. He directed that the trustees of the term should, after paying certain annuities, apply so much of the rents and profits of the estates as they should think fit (not exceeding in any one year a specified amount) to the maintenance and education of Caroline Shirley until she should attain twenty-one or marry, and that they should accumulate the surplus rents for the benefit of Caroline Shirley when she should attain twenty-one or marry, and, if she should die under twenty-one and unmarried, then for the benefit of the persons entitled under the subsequent limitations, and that, upon her attaining twenty-one or marrying, they should during her lifetime pay the surplus rents, after payment of the annuities, to her for her separate use. Lord Lyndhurst held that legacy duty was not payable. Nothing, he said, but what is a charge upon the estate of another person will come within the statute. It is quite true that in that case unless Miss Shirley attained the age of twenty-one or married she would have taken nothing under the will but the allowance referred to, and this is naturally relied on in the present case. But what are the reasons which Lord Lyndhurst gives for holding that the estate on which the legacy was charged was her estate? He says: "The direction merely does what this court would have done without it. The petitioner would have been entitled, at all events, to maintenance out of the rents and profits of the real estate. It is true the trustees have a discretion to allow a portion of the rents, not exceeding a certain amount, for that purpose, but still the estate out of which the allowance is to come is her estate." Now, Lord Lyndhurst may have been right or wrong in thinking that the direction merely did what the court would have done without it, and that the infant would be entitled to maintenance out of the rents and profits. It is suggested that he was mistaken in this view, but, however that may be, I think it was one of the reasons, if not the main reason, why he regarded the estate as hers. No such grounds exist in the present case, and I am by no means satisfied that Lord Lyndhurst would have disposed of it in the same way. At all events, it does not seem to me to be an authority which compels us to hold that the annuity is exempt from legacy duty because it is charged upon and payable out of the respondent's estate. I do not, of course, for a moment question that the respondent is tenant for life, subject to the term, and that he has, as such, certain rights. He could, as suggested, in some circumstances join in barring the entail, and, when that was done, join in putting an end to the trust for accumulation. But the statute creating the legacy duty applies in terms to the annuity in question; there is no exception in the statute which excludes it. In Shirley v. Earl Ferrers an exception was implied where the annuity was charged on and payable out of the annuitant's estate. I am bound to admit this exception in such a case as was then in question. In the present case I do not think the annuity was charged on or payable out of the respondent's estate in any sense in which such an exception could reasonably be engrafted upon the plain words of the statute which we have to construe.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question in this case is whether the Crown is entitled to call upon Sir James De Hoghton to pay legacy or succession duty, he having, in the year 1893, become entitled under the following circumstances to receive an annuity of £3,000 a year. Sir James De Hoghton admits that he is liable to pay legacy duty, and Stirling, J., has held that this was the duty payable. The Crown, however, contends that he must pay succession duty, and not legacy duty. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] The point in dispute is this, Is this £3,000 a year to the enjoyment of which Sir James became entitled upon the death of Charles on the 12th of April, 1893, until the expiration of the twenty-one years, apart from form, in substance a gift by way of annuity payable out of the rents and profits of real estate to which he is entitled, in which case it has been held not to be a legacy within the meaning of section 4 of 8 and 9 Vict. c. 76 (Shirley v. Earl Ferrers); or is it, in substance, an annuity payable by another, in which case it would be a legacy, and within the terms of the Act.

It is not denied, either by the advisers of the Crown or of Sir James De Hoghton, that in inquiring what duty is to be paid the substance and not the form of the instrument is to be looked at; one reason for this, I apprehend, being that the taxing acts refer to both England and Scotland, in which the conveyancing forms differ; the other being that a subject is to pay duty upon that which he in reality comes into the enjoyment of, and not upon that which he may appear to come into upon paper. Now, when the substance and not the form is looked at, how do matters stand? The term of 500 years is vested in trustees with the obligation imposed upon them of collecting the rents and profits of the devised estates. In many cases the creation of a term is a mere conveyancing contrivance, but in this case the creation of the term is a reality, one object being by means thereof, as far as possible, to keep the tenant for life out of the settled estates for the contemplated period of twenty-one years. Sir James, until the expiration of the twenty-one years, is no more entitled to collect the rents than any stranger to the estate. The trustees are to do this, not Sir James. The trustees, out of the rents and profits which they alone are to collect, are to pay Sir James an annuity of £3,000 a year and nothing more, and all rents and profits of the estate of whatever kind after making this payment are, up to a period of twenty-one years from the death of the testator, to be accumulated by the trustees and laid out by them in the purchase of land. If Sir James happens to die before the expiration of the twenty-one years, he will take no benefit whatever from the accumulations. It is true that by the terms of the will Sir James, subject to the term of 500 years and the trusts declared, takes a life estate; but what, until the expiration of the twenty-one years, is the tangible interest which he takes? What, apart from form, in substance does he come into? He is not entitled to receive a single sixpence of the rent; the amenities, such as shooting and fishing, are not his. If these are capable of being let for value, I apprehend the trustees under the will, notwithstanding the Settled Land Act, are bound to let them. At any rate, Sir James could not enjoy them without obtaining the sanction of the court; and whether this could be obtained I have not to decide.

In these circumstances, what is it that Sir James came into the enjoyment of upon the death of Sir Charles in 1893? In substance, did he come into a present enjoyment of a life interest in his own estate with a limitation as to its enjoyment, or into a gift of an annuity payable out of the rents to be received by the trustees of the term? There is obviously a vast distinction, when considering a taxing matter, between the case of a man coming into a present actual enjoyment of a life interest in an estate, even though subject to a limitation as to its enjoyment, and that of a man who is only entitled to have doled out to him a certain fixed sum of money out of rents and profits which he is not to receive, but which are to be received by others out of an estate the amenities of which he cannot enjoy without the leave of the court, if obtainable.

In the one case it appears to me that the man is in possession in truth and in fact of his own estate with a limitation as to its enjoyment; in the other case, though in form it may be his estate, it is not so in substance when considering upon what he is to be taxed, he having no effective interest whatever therein, being only entitled to receive a money payment from another, and nothing more.

The point in the case of Re Clitheroe Estate was whether the trustees of a term created by the will of the late Duke of Buccleugh were entitled to effectually exercise the powers of sale contained in the will without the consent of Lord Henry Scott, who was tenant for life of the devised estates, and it was held that they could not do so, for by the Settled Land Act, 1882, his consent was necessary; but it appears to me that this was no decision upon a taxing Act, nor, in my opinion, do the provisions of the Settled Land Act, which undoubtedly gives largely extended powers to a tenant for life, really affect the question now in hand. That Act was passed alio intuitu, and not for the purpose of affecting a taxing Act.

The Crown sought to rely upon the case of Shirley v. Earl Ferrers, in which Lord Lyndhurst, when Lord Chancellor, held that sums to be annually applied by the trustees of a term of 500 years out of the rents and profits of an estate towards the maintenance of a minor were not chargeable with legacy duty, he holding that for legacy duty to become payable under the Act (which was an Act for this purpose the same as the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, s. 4) there must be that which is a charge upon the estate of another, or in other words a person is not to pay legacy duty upon coming into the enjoyment of an estate which is his own. Lord Lyndhurst in that case held that the allowance payable to Caroline Shirley was payable to her for maintenance, to which in any event she was entitled, and consequently it could not be said that the allowance did not come out of her own estate, and this is where I think the present case differs from that. Nor does the case cited by the respondents of Hickley v. Strangways apply to this case, for there, by the terms of the will, the tenant for life took no estate or interest in possession until the termination of the term thereby created.

I cannot think that the Settled Land Act of 1882 really affects what we have to determine. It gives, it is true, larger powers to the tenants for life than they theretofore enjoyed, but this cannot, I think, alter the way in which a taxing Act is to be applied. Then, looking not to the form but to the substance of this case, it appears to me that the £3,000 a year is not payable to Sir James out of any estate which in reality he came into the enjoyment of.

The only thing Sir James is entitled to until the expiration of the twenty-one years is an annual money payment of £3,000, and nothing more; and this seems to me in substance, apart from form, to constitute a gift by way of annuity payable out of the estate created by the term, and not a limitation upon the tenancy for life which, for the reasons given above, is not enjoyed by Sir James.

In my judgment Sir James must pay legacy duty upon the £3,000 a year, and succession duty is not the duty now payable.

I therefore am of opinion that Stirling, J.'s, judgment is correct, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—At the time of making his will the testator, Sir Henry De Hoghton, was without male issue, but had brothers, Charles and Richard, and numerous half-brothers, of whom Sir James, the present baronet, was the eldest. The scheme of the will is to settle the property dealt with in strict settlement, so as to go along with the baronetcy, and only to go to the testator's female issue and collateral female relatives after the failure of successors to the baronetcy. But the testator was desirous, at the expense of the successive owners of the freehold, to raise a fund for the purchase of additional lands to be settled to the same uses as the property devised. It cannot be supposed that he knew personally how far this could be done, but the scheme of the will, so far as is material for the present purpose, is exactly what would have resulted from instructions to settle the property so as to go as long as possible with the baronetcy, but to apply the income of the successive owners of the estate, with the exception of sums varying according to their ages, but in no case exceeding £3,000, in the purchase of additional property. The law would not allow of such an accumulation for more than twenty-one years, and if the leading idea—that the sucessive baronets were to be owners of the estate for the time being—were followed, the directions for accumulation must be of necessity more or less precarious. On the expiration of preceding estates of freehold each successive tenant for life and tenant in tail under the actual limitations takes, notwithstanding the term of 500 years, the seisin in possession of the immediate freehold. His position is essentially different from that of a reversioner or remaindermen, and is correctly described as that of the freeholder in possession, subject to the term, just as an owner in fee simple who has made a lease for years is the immediate owner of the fee simple, though subject to the lease. The rents and profits of the property, except in so far as they are expressly withdrawn and diverted from him, go to the freeholder because he is freeholder.

In the present case a portion of those rents is withdrawn and diverted from the freeholder to meet annuities to other people, and the rents and profits made subject to the trust for accumulation are also withdrawn and diverted during twenty-one years if, but only if, the settlement lasts so long. The tenant for life in possession, subject to the term, is, however, the person who under the old law would have made a tenant to the præcipe, and is now protector of the settlement, and he and the first remainderman in tail could, by a disentailing deed, make themselves entitled to the whole fee simple, subject only to charges taking effect in priority to their estates, and so put an end altogether to the trusts for accumulation during the residue of the term of twenty-one years, if they are so minded. At the same time they could put at end to the trusts for payment of an annuity to the immediate freeholder. Precisely the same questions would arise if a tenant in tail under the limitations were in receipt of the annuity. But he, without consulting anybody, could bar the entail and get rid of the trust for accumulation at his pleasure. That the immediate freeholder, whether tenant for life or in tail, takes his annuity in that capacity is clear from the terms in which it is given to him. He will be entitled to it only so long as he retains his freehold estate. If, under the name and arms clause, he forfeits his freehold, or if he grants away his freehold, the annuity limited to him as freeholder ceases to be payable to him. Meanwhile, and before any of the aforesaid events happen, the rents and profits to the extent of the annuity are not taken away from him, as the other rents and profits are, but constitute the residue to which he remains entitled of the rents and profits incident to his freehold estate. But that the mere power to receive the rents, or the vesting of powers of management in trustees, would not affect the essential position of the tenant for life as owner of the immediate freehold, except to the extent to which trusts not exclusively in his favour are declared of the rents received, would seem to be clear. His estate might be equitable, and not only all powers of management, but the legal ownership of the freehold might be vested in the trustees, and still he would be in the full sense tenant for life. If, however, it can be a matter of importance, it would seem that, as the Settled Land Act, 1882, came into force before Sir James became entitled in possession, the nature of his interest cannot be treated independently of that Act, under which he, and he alone, would have all powers of management, leasing, sale, and conversion given by the Act, to the entire exclusion of the trustees of the term unless he thought fit to consent to their exercising their powers, though similar powers are by the will directed to be exercised by the trustees of the term. See Re Clitheroe Estate. The successive legal owners of estates for life or in tail under this will are in a very different position from that which would have been the position under an executory devise contained in a direction to settle at a future date, as in Hickley v. Strangways. For myself I can see no escape from the conclusion that Sir James, being, on the death of his brother Charles, seised in possession of the immediate estate of freehold, the annuity given to him is nothing more than a return of part of the produce of his life estate so as to take effect out of the life estate limited to him.

I think, therefore, that the principle laid down in Shirley v. Earl Ferrers applies, and that legacy duty is not payable.

JACKSON v. THE RAINFORD COAL CO. (LIMITED). (a)

Company—Borrowing power—Mortgage of uncalled capital—Power to mortgage—Companies Act, 1862, s. 50.

In the articles of a company limited by shares, incorporated in 1866, was a clause enabling the company "to borrow from time to time at interest upon mortgage of the freehold, copyhold, and leasehold hereditaments, machinery, works, and other property and effects for the time being of the company, or any of them, or any part thereof respectively, or upon bonds or debenture notes of the company, or in such other manner as the company may determine."

Held, that while, according to Stanley's case, 12 W. R. 894, 4 De G. J. & S. 407, and In re Sankey Brook Co., 18 W. R. 914, L. R. 10 Eq. 381, the words in the first part of the clause did not authorise a charge on uncalled capital, yet reading the last part, and having regard to the wide meaning of the word "manner," on the proper construction of the clause as a whole, such a charge was thereby authorised.

Held, also, that even if the clause in the articles did not comprise a power to charge uncalled capital, yet the company might, under section 50 of the Companies Act, 1862, by a special resolution, alter the clause so as to make it comprise an authority to charge uncalled capital.

(a) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion.

The defendant company was incorporated on the 10th of August, 1866, under the Companies Act, 1862.

The capital of the company was £100,000, divided into 100 shares of £1,000 each. Of these shares eighty-five had been issued, sixty being fully paid up. Of the remaining twenty-five £850 per share had been called up, leaving a balance of uncalled capital to the amount of £3,750.

It was proposed by the company to mortgage the uncalled capital; and this was a motion by the plaintiff Jackson and another, who were joint proprietors of shares, numbered 52 and 53, to restrain the defendant company from pledging or attempting to pledge the uncalled capital of the company, and from passing or attempting to pass any resolution purporting to authorize them to do so.

The memorandum of the company contained nothing about borrowing powers; but article 56 of the articles of association empowered the company "to borrow from time to time at interest upon mortgage of the freehold, copyhold, and leasehold hereditaments, machinery, works, and other property and effects for the time being of the company, or any of them, or any part thereof respectively, or upon bonds or debenture notes of the company, or in such other manner as the company may determine, such sum or sums of money . . . as the company shall from time to time think proper."

E. C. Macnaghten, for plaintiff.—Though in the memorandum of the company there is nothing about borrowing, there is an article limiting the power, and it does not authorize the company to charge uncalled capital.

He referred to In re British Life and Fire Assurance Society, Stanley's case, 12 W. R. 894, 4 De G. J. & S. 407; In re Sankey Brook Coal Co., 18 W. R. 914, L. R. 10 Eq. 381; Re the Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co., 44 L. J. Ch. 683, 23 W. R. Dig. 45; Newton v. Debenture-holders of the Anglo-Australian Investment, Finance, and Land Co., 43 W. R. 401, [1895] A. C. 244.

W. R. Sheldon, for the defendant company, submitted that the words in the article as to borrowing "or in such other manner as the company may determine" included power to borrow on any security. [CHITTY, J.—The word "manner" is a word of large import, and is so treated in powers of appointment.] The word "manner" is used where the largest possible meaning is wanted. The clause in the article must be read as a whole, and there is no other manner left in which the company could borrow other than on uncalled capital.

CHITTY, J.—The motion raises two points: (1) Whether the company, as the articles now stand, has power to raise money on the security of uncalled capital? (2) Whether the company, assuming that it now has no such power, could by a properly passed special resolution confer this power on itself?

With regard to the second question I have no doubt. The memorandum is silent on the question of borrowing, and were it not for the articles, the company would, as a trading company, have power to borrow upon any security; but there is an article defining the power to borrow. On this second point I entirely adopt what was said in the Privy Council in Newton's case, in the judgment delivered by Lord Macnaghten. This is no case of altering any bargain made between the shareholders so that the principle might intervene which precludes certain shareholders from taking away any rights which had been conferred by existing articles on other classes of shareholders, such as a right to preferential dividends or the like. But, seeing that the memorandum is silent as to borrowing, and that in the articles there is a special power to borrow, I see no reason why section 50 of the Companies Act, 1862, should not apply and the company be justified in extending their articles, if necessary. It is true that in Newton's case the articles of association had been altered, and the decision turned on the special resolution. It does not appear whether there was or was not any article in the original articles defining the borrowing power; but this would seem from their lordships' judgment to be immaterial. In my opinion, with regard to this second point, the company has power to alter the articles to supply this defect in their borrowing powers, if there be such a defect.

Then I have to consider the present state of things, and whether as the articles now stand, the borrowing power is limited, so that the contemplated charge would not be authorized. The first part of the article defining the borrowing power authorizes the company "to borrow from time to time at interest upon mortgage of the freehold, copyhold, and leasehold hereditaments, machinery, works, and other property and effects for the time being of the company, or any of them, or any part thereof respectively." Having regard to Stanley's case and that of The Sankey Brook Co., those words are not sufficient to justify charging uncalled capital. Stanley's case has not been overruled, and these decisions are binding on me. Then the rest of the clause runs thus: "or upon bonds or debenture notes of the company, or in such other manner as the company may determine, such sum or sums of money at such rate or respective rates of interest, and repayable at such time or respective times, and upon and subject to such terms and conditions as the company shall from time to time think proper." This contains in point of form two other alternatives. First, power to borrow on bonds or debenture notes; this is general, and does not import any charge on any property, as bonds or debenture notes might be so given. Then there is the other, the third alternative, that is "or in such other manner as the company may determine."

No doubt the right mode of construing this clause is to consider the three parts of it separately up to a certain point and then together as a whole. In the case in the Privy Council the words were "to receive money on loan or deposit or otherwise, and upon any security of the company, or without giving security," and their lordships had no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that these words authorized a charge on uncalled capital. In that case in the clause in question the larger term preceded the lesser, it being first "any security of the company," and secondly "or on the security of any property of the company," and the Privy Council decided on the combined effect of the different parts of the clause. It is suggested that in the present case the words "or in such other manner" have some reference specially to bonds or debenture notes, though the words occur as an alternative. I do not see why I should thus apply these words "in such other manner" to the bonds or debenture notes. The word "manner" is a word of large import, and has been so treated in powers of appointment, though perhaps to refer to them would be too technical for this case. I read the clause as a whole, as empowering the company to borrow in the particular manner specified, and in such other manner as the company may determine, and there seems no other manner in which the company could borrow except by borrowing on uncalled capital. I think I am justified in thus reading this clause as a whole, and in saying that these words are of a wide import, and entitle the company to borrow on uncalled capital, and the motion therefore fails.

Motion refused.

FOOKS v. HORNER. (a.)

Interest—Sum payable at a certain time—Time fixed by reference to death—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28.

A sum payable by virtue of a written instrument within a fixed time after the death of the party chargeable is payable at a certain time within the meaning of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28, and in case of default of payment within such time the court will allow interest on the sum from the expiration of such time until payment.

Knapp v. Burnaby, 9 W. R. 765, followed.

Summons.

By indenture, dated in 1891, the above-named testator covenanted that within six calendar months after his death his executors or administrators should pay to trustees the sum of £2,000 upon certain trusts, and by his will, dated in 1893, confirmed the settlement made by the said indenture, and died in 1894. The £2,000 was not paid until some time after the expiration of the six calendar months.

This was a summons on behalf of the tenant for life of the fund under the said indenture to determine whether any interest was payable out of the estate of the said testator in respect of the said sum of £2,000, and, if so, from what date. A payment was made in respect of interest for the six months next after the testator's death, as was alleged, under a mistake of fact; but the question argued was whether interest was payable from the expiration of the six months to the time when the fund was paid by the executors.

Stewart Smith, for the summons.—Interest was payable from the end of the six months after the death until the £2,000 was paid. The £2,000 was a sum certain, payable by virtue of a written instrument at a certain time within section 28 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, which shows that interest ought to be allowed in such a case: Knapp v. Burnaby, 9 W. R. 765.

Alfred Adams, contra.—There is no time certain within the statute here, and consequently interest should not be given: Merchant Shipping Co. v. Armitage, 22 W. R. 11, L. R. 9 Q. B. 99; London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. v. South-Eastern Railway Co., 40 W. R. 194, [1892] 1 Ch. 120, [1893] A. C. 429, 42 W. R. Dig. 33.

Stewart Smith, in reply.—The time need not be a particular named day to satisfy the statute.

CHITTY, J.—The testator's covenant is to pay a sum within six calendar months after his decease. The question is whether that is a sum "payable at a certain time" within the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28. The point made is that the sum is not payable at a certain time.

The point came before Lord Hatherley in Knapp v. Burnaby, where a testatrix had covenanted that a sum should be paid within one month after her death, and default was made in payment; and he held that interest at 5 per cent. was payable as from the end of the month. I am not aware that his decision has ever been overruled or questioned, and I think that it is founded on good sense.

But Merchant Shipping Co. v. Armitage and London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. v. South-Eastern Railway Co., approving that case, are said to have the effect of overruling Knapp v. Burnaby; but Knapp v. Burnaby was not cited in either of those cases, and it was not applicable. No reasons are given for the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Merchant Shipping Co. v. Armitage, but they are not difficult to see. The event by reference to which the time for the payment there was fixed was not a certain event, but an event which might or might not happen. The stipulation was that the money should be paid on an event that might never happen, and it was therefore held not to be payable at a time certain. This is well put by Kay, L.J., [1892] 1 Ch., at p. 148. That is sufficient ground for distinguishing Armitage's case and this.

Death is not a contingent event, it is a certainty, and so many days after death is a time certain for the purposes of the statute. The statute does not require the exact day to be named, and it is rightly admitted that it makes no difference that the money is to be paid not on a particular day, but within a certain time. A covenant to pay within six months after death is in law a covenant to pay on the last day of the six months.

Will—Construction—"Shares"—Debentures.

A testatrix bequeathed her shares in the Grand Trunk Railway to A. absolutely. At the date of her will and at her death she held debenture stock of the Grand Trunk Railway, but she never had any shares.

Held, that the debenture stock passed under the bequest.

Adjourned summons.

This summons raised the question whether certain debenture stock of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, entitled "Perpetual Five per Cent. Debenture Stock Great Western Borrowed Capital" passed under a bequest in the will of Jane Elizabeth Weeding, "To Annie Wilkin, the wife of Herbert Wilkin, my shares in the Great Western Trunk Railway of Canada absolutely," or whether the same stock passed under the bequest of the said testatrix's residuary personal estate, and whether any and what property passed under the bequest. The testatrix never had any shares in the Grand Trunk Railway, but held the above-mentioned debentures both at the date of her will and of her death.

Jenkins, for Mrs. Wilkin.—As the testatrix held no shares, it is clear that she intended the debenture stock to pass. In In re Bodman, 40 W. R. 60, [1891] 3 Ch. 135, the testator held both shares and stock. In re Nottage, ante, p. 22, [1895] 2 Ch. 657, is very similar to the present case.

were interested in the residuary bequest.—I do not rely on the misdescription, but say a bequest of "shares" cannot pass stock. If the testatrix had had a couple of shares in the company in addition to the debentures, the case would not be arguable: In re Gray, 35 W. R. 795, 36 Ch. D. 205; In re Lane, 28 W. R. 764, 14 Ch. Cur. adv. vult.

June 6th.—NORTH, J., after dealing with the facts, said that In re Bodman was a case in which the testator held both shares and stock both at the date of the will and at the time of his death, and that case was therefore distinguishable. If in the present case the testatrix had held both descriptions of property, he might have had to hold that case applicable, although it might seem peculiar that the accident of the testatrix holding or not holding shares should affect the matter. In In re Nottage Rigby, L.J., said ([1895], 2 Ch. p. 664), "You have got a long way towards a specific gift if you come to the conclusion that he (the testator) is trying to describe something which he has." In the present case his lordship was satisfied that the testatrix intended to dispose of all her interest in the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. The point was not of much importance, as Mrs. Wilkin would take the stock for life with remainder to her children even if it passed under the residuary gift, but she was entitled to have the point decided, and in his lordship's opinion she took absolutely.

In re SAMPSON.
SAMPSON v. SAMPSON. (a.)

Will—Construction—Gift of income of residue until alienation—Time of vesting.

A testator gave certain property to trustees upon trust after the death of his wife to pay to his son A. during his life so much of the income thereof "as would not, although the same were payable to him, be by his act or default or by operation or process of law so disposed of as to prevent his personal enjoyment thereof, and to apply so much of the income as would, if the same were payable to my said son, be disposed of as last aforesaid for the benefit of" B. and her children, at the discretion of the trustees and in manner thereinafter expressed.

After the death of the testator's widow the trustees' solicitors wrote to A. informing him that they had a sum of money in their hands, the income of the trust fund, payable to him. A. replied asking that the money should be paid to him, but was informed by the same solicitors that the trustees had since been served with a garnishee order nisi attaching the same. B. thereupon served the trustees with notice not to part with the income; but the trustees, the garnishee order having been made absolute, paid it over to the husband's creditors.

On a summons taken out by B. asking for payment to her of the income attached as aforesaid, Held, that, unless A. had by his own act or default or by process or operation of law been deprived of the enjoyment of the income, he was entitled to receive the same the moment it came into the hands of the trustees; that such right could not be affected by subsequent events —e.g., the garnishee order; and that therefore B. never became entitled to the benefit of the discretionary trust.

This was a summons by the wife of William Henry Sampson against the executors of the surviving trustee of the will of the testator and against the said William Henry Sampson asking for payment to her on her separate receipt of a sum of £152 7s. 5d., admitted to have been received by the executors in respect of income of the real and personal estate of the testator, and claimed by plaintiff to have become payable to her in the events which happened.

The testator by his will devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust after the decease of his wife (who died before the date of this summons) to apply the income of the trust property accruing due in the lifetime of his son (the defendant William Henry Sampson) in accordance with the trusts thereinafter expressed concerning the same, those trusts being "upon trust to pay to my said son so much of the same . . . income as would not, although the same were payable to him, be by his act or default or by operation or process of law so disposed of as to prevent his personal enjoyment thereof, and to apply so much of the same . . . income as would, if the same were payable to my said son, be disposed of as last aforesaid, for the benefit of his wife and children and other issue for the time being in existence, or some one or more of those objects, if any, or if none for the benefit of the person or persons for the time being entitled, or presumptively or expectantly entitled, to the income of my trust property in such proportions as my trustees shall, in their discretion, think fit."

There was no issue of the marriage of the plaintiff and the defendant William Henry Sampson.

On the 16th of April, 1895, after the death of the testator's widow, the solicitors of the defendants the executors wrote to William Henry Sampson, enclosing an account and informing him that they had in their hands income to the amount of £132 7s. 5d. payable to him.

He assented by telegram to the account, and asked for the money to be paid to him.

In reply to this he received another letter from the same solicitors, dated the 17th of April, informing him that the trustees had been served with a garnishee order nisi (which had been obtained by the said solicitors acting for creditors of W. H. Sampson) attaching the said sum.

The garnishee order was made absolute on the 24th of April, the plaintiff having on the 18th of April served notice on the said solicitors not to pay the fund over to the husband's creditors.

The executors having paid the creditors, this summons was taken out.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Marcy, for the summons.—The garnishee order effected a forfeiture of the interest, which took effect from the time of the service thereof: Hamer v. Giles, 27 W. R. 834, 11 Ch. D. 942. The object of the testator was to prevent his son from anticipating his income. Mr. Sampson could not enforce payment of the income when the result would be that the enjoyment of the income would pass to his creditors: Hood Barrs v. Cathcart, 42 W. R. 628, [1894] 2 Q. B. 559; Loftus v. Heriot, [1895] 2 Q. B. 212, 43 W. R. Dig. 112. The limitation is valid. It is not a gift over after an absolute gift, but a gift for life or until alienation —i.e., so long as Mr. Sampson could personally enjoy it. It never was a debt due to him, as if it were, he would have been able to demand payment from the trustees. As a matter of fact, however, he could not demand payment, because he could not show the trustees that he would be able to enjoy it personally. Whilst the judgment subsists the future income is not liable to be attached: R. S. C., 1883, ord. 45, r. 5; Roberts v. Death, 30 W. R. 76, 8 Q. B. D. 319.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR MORTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Buckley, Q.C., and E. Beaumont, for the personal representatives of the last surviving trustee.—This is an attempt to restrain anticipation in the case of a man, and consequently is not valid. Hood Barrs v. Cathcart was the case of a married woman, and is not applicable to the present matter. The result of the letter of the 16th of April and the telegram from Mr. Sampson was to vest the £132 7s. 5d. in him, and he could have sued the trustees for the money. Consequently it was validly attached by the garnishee order. Subsequent instalments of income are not affected, and the gift over has not come into operation.

Marcy, in reply.—Although a man cannot be restrained from anticipation, the same result may be achieved in some other way: Davidson's Precedents, 2nd ed., vol. 3, p. 93. [STIRLING, J.—This is nothing but an attempt to give the son a personal right of enjoyment, notwithstanding alienation.] Certainly; but that is a lawful object. It is not a fraud on creditors, nor is it inconsistent with the law; for a gift may be valid although its object is to defeat creditors: Twopenny v. Peyton, 10 Sim. 487; Godden v. Crowhurst, ib. 642.

STIRLING, J.—[His lordship stated the facts as above set out, and, after expressing an opinion that it was to be regretted that the solicitors of the trustees should have also acted for the creditors of W. H. Sampson in the matter of the garnishee order, he continued:—] The trusts declared of the income of the testator's estate during the life of W. H. Sampson are to me novel in form, and apparently have not hitherto been the subject of judicial consideration. They are not altogether happily expressed, but the object of the testator appears to be that a vested right or interest should not arise in the income except as it accrued due—i.e., such right or interest was not to arise as to any portion of the income until (at the earliest) such portion came to the hands of the trustees, and then only as to such portion. The testator directs this portion to be dealt with in one of two ways, according as the son has or has not done or suffered any act which would prevent his personal enjoyment of it. If he has not, this portion of the income is to be paid to him; if he has, then it is to be applied at the discretion of the trustees for the benefit of the wife and children of the son. There is therefore in effect a series of alternative limitations declared of the successive instalments of income which reach the hands of trustees. These limitations must all take effect during the lifetime of the son, and do not offend against the rule against perpetuities, neither do I see that they can be treated as objectionable on the ground of repugnancy or otherwise, and in my judgment they are valid in law.

It is next to be considered at what precise period of time one or other of these alternative limitations is to take effect. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the son takes no vested right or interest in any portion of the income until it has actually reached his hands; and in support of this view the recent decisions of the Court of Appeal in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart and Loftus v. Heriot are relied on. It must be taken to be established (unless and until the House of Lords decides otherwise) that the restraint on anticipation in the case of a married woman is operative until the fund affected by the restraint has actually reached her hands.* This, however, is not a case of the rights of a married woman for whose benefit the restraint on anticipation was designed, nor is it in strictness one in which anticipation or alienation is restrained. The question rather is whether the son ought to be treated as having acquired any title to any portion of the income until it has actually reached his hands, or whether a right to income in the hands of the trustees vests in him at an earlier date. There is a class of cases which have not infrequently been considered by the courts, and appear to me to have some bearing on this point. I mean those in which there has accrued a gift over on the death of a legatee before actually receiving his legacy, and among them I may mention Hutchin v. Mannington, 1 Ves. 366; Gaskell v. Harman, 11 Ves. 489; Law v. Thompson, 4 Russ. 92; Martin v. Martin, 14 W. R. 986, L. R. 2 Eq. 404; Minors v. Battison, 25 W. R. 27, 1 App. Cas. 428; Johnson v. Crook, 28 W. R. 12, 12 Ch. D. 639; Re Collison, 28 W. R. 391, 12 Ch. D. 639; Bubb v. Padwick, 28 W. R. 382, 13 Ch. D. 517; Re Chaston, 29 W. R. 778 18 Ch. D. 218; Re Wilkins, 29 W. R. 911, 18 Ch. D. 634; Wilks v. Bannister, 33 W. R. 922, 30 Ch. D. 512. These cases are not entirely consistent among themselves, but this at least they establish—i.e., that whether or not a testator can effectually cause a vested gift to be divested before it has actually come to the hands of the legatee, such an intention ought not to be attributed where the words are not clear, and in cases where the words are susceptible of such an interpretation the court has held that the period over which the operation of a divesting clause of this kind is to extend ought not to be held to continue beyond the time at which the legacy is de jure receivable. The courts always favour early vesting, regarding it as undesirable that rights and interests should depend on the degree of diligence with which trustees perform their duties.

The cases to which I have referred are not direct authorities, and the question must be determined on the consideration of the terms of this particular will. So regarding it, I think that the epoch at which the destination of any instalment of income is to be determined is the moment when that instalment either "accrues due," or is in the hands of the trustees ready for application in accordance with the trusts of the will. For the present case it is not necessary to determine which of these points of time is to be regarded. If at the instant any instalment of income is in the hands of the trustees the son has not by his own act or default, or by process or operation of law, been deprived of the enjoyment of the income, I think he is entitled to receive it. The trustees have not conferred on them by the will any discretion to retain it in their hands with a view to its application at a later period, and it seems to me that this right of the son to receive, cannot be affected by subsequent events.

This being so, it follows that William Henry Sampson's title to the sum mentioned in the summons accrued on the 16th of April, 1895 (previous to the service of the garnishee order), and that the plaintiff consequently never became entitled to the benefit of the discretionary trust. The summons must therefore be dismissed.

HORNSEY DISTRICT COUNCIL v. SMITH. (a.)

Local government—Street—Paving expenses—National schools—Charge on schools—"Owners"—Trustees—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 150, 257—School Sites Act, 1841 (4 & 5 Vict. c. 38), s. 6.

The trustees of premises conveyed to them for the purposes of a school under section 6 of the School Sites Act, 1841, are "owners" within section 4 of the Public Health Act, and the local authority is entitled to a charge on the premises for the proportionate amount of the expenses of paving the street fronting the premises.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by the plaintiffs to obtain a declaration that the proportionate part of the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in paving the street fronting the defendant's school was a charge thereon in priority to any mortgages thereon, and for an order for sale.

The applicants had, in accordance with their powers under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, paved the street in which the Holy Innocents' National Schools, of which the defendants were the trustees, was situate, and had apportioned to be paid by the trustees, as owners of the schools, the sum of £111 15s. 11d.

A notice was served by the plaintiffs on the trustees demanding payment, but they did not pay the same.

The school premises were vested in the trustees under the provisions of the School Sites Acts, 1841 and 1844, for the purposes of the said Acts.

E. Beaumont and Frederick Low, for the District Council.—The trustees are "owners" within section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875. National schools are not included in the exceptions in section 151. Under section 257 the plaintiffs are entitled to a charge on the schools: Corporation of Birmingham v. Baker, 17 Ch. D. 782, 30 W. R. Dig. 121; Bowditch v. Wakefield Local Board, L. R. 6 Q. B. 567; Wright v. Ingle, 34 W. R. 220, 16 Q. B. D. 379; Re Christchurch Inclosure Act, Meyrick v. Attorney-General, 42 W. R. 614, [1894] 3 Ch. 209; Guardians of Tendring Union v. Dowton, 40 W. R. 145, [1891] 3 Ch. 265.

Dibdin, for the trustees.—There can be no charge, as there is no owner. Even if there is a charge, there can be no order for sale: Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Hackney District Board of Works, 31 W. R. 769, 8 App. Cas. 687.

E. Beaumont replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—The first question arises under section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which defines "owner" as the person for the time being receiving the rack-rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the word is used, whether on his own account, or as an agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack-rent. It is said that that definition does not apply in a case in which no letting at a rack-rent is possible. Here the premises are conveyed for the purposes of a school only, under section 6 of the School Sites Act, 1841, and for no other purpose. The dedication to that purpose can only be set aside by another Act of Parliament, and therefore the premises can never be let at a rack-rent; and it is argued, that consequently the definition in the Public Health Act does not apply. But it seems to me, on the authority of both Bowditch v. Wakefield Local Board of Health and Wright v. Ingle, I must regard the respondents as "owners"; and if they are owners, then, according to the terms of section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875, a charge may be made on the schools.

It was also suggested for the applicants that as there is an express exception of churches and burial grounds by section 151, there cannot be another exception of a similar character. I do not assent to this proposition. This is property which must be held on the trusts declared and for nothing else, and I see very great difficulty in making the charge effective by means of a sale, because the applicants cannot make a title, they cannot sell the property to anybody except for the purposes of a school to which it has been dedicated. At the same time I do not know why the statute should not create a charge which cannot be enforced by sale. The statute says it is to be a charge, and the applicants may have some remedy, though what the nature of the remedy is I cannot foresee. I declare that the sum claimed, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent., is a charge on the land and buildings, and the applicants may take liberty to apply to enforce the charge in chambers, and they may add their costs to their security.

Application to make absolute a rule nisi for a mandamus commanding the Vestry of St. Matthew's, Bethnal-green, to repair a certain drain or sewer.

Section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, defines "drain" and "sewer." It enacts that "the word 'drain' shall mean and include any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only, or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer in which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed, and shall also include any drain for draining any group or block of houses, by a combined operation, under the order of any vestry or district board; and the word 'sewer' shall mean and include sewers and drains of every description, except drains to which the word 'drain,' interpreted as aforesaid, applies."

Section 68 vests all sewers made or to be made within any of the parishes and districts scheduled in the Act, except sewers and works vested or to be vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works, in the vestry of such parish or the board of works of such district.

Section 69 enacts as follows: "The vestry of every parish mentioned in Schedule (A) to this Act, and the board of works for every district mentioned in Schedule (B) to this Act, shall (subject to the powers by this Act vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works) from time to time repair and maintain the sewers under this Act vested in them . . . ; provided always, that no new sewer shall be made without the previous approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works. . . . "

The drain or sewer in question was constructed in 1866, and received the drainage of several houses. It did not appear that the previous approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works was obtained for its construction. The houses drained by it were prior to 1866 undrained. In that year an epidemic of cholera took place, which carried off all the inhabitants of the houses but one. The landlord then constructed the system of drainage of which the drain or sewer in question formed a part. The property subsequently came into the possession of the School Board of London.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

WRIGHT, J.—This is an application by the School Board for London against the Vestry of a metropolitan parish for a mandamus to compel the Vestry to repair a drain or sewer which was made in 1866, and receives the drainage and sewage of several houses within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts and repairable by the Vestry, as was held in Kershaw v. Taylor. The Vestry resist the application, mainly on the ground—which they contend was overlooked in Kershaw v. Taylor—that previous approval of the construction of the sewer does not appear to have been obtained from the Metropolitan Board of Works as was required by section 69 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and other sections of that and the amending Acts. After the lapse of thirty years such consent ought, perhaps, to be presumed in the absence of clear disproof, but, even assuming it to be clearly disproved, we think that the objection must fail. The mere fact that the requisite consent was not obtained for the making of the sewer does not prevent it from being a sewer when made. Further, we think that from the circumstances stated in the affidavits and from the nature of the case it ought to be inferred that the Vestry knew and approved of the making of the sewer, and of its connection with their principal sewer in the adjoining street, and cannot now raise the objection.

The rule for a mandamus will be made absolute, with costs.

Rule made absolute.

DRURY v. ARMY AND NAVY CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY (LIMITED). (a.)

Metropolis — Building — Party wall — Wall extending above adjoining building — Wall dividing a building of the warehouse class extending to more than 250,000 cubic feet — London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), ss. 59 (1), 75.

By the London Building Act, 1894, s. 75, it is enacted that buildings of the warehouse class above a certain size shall be divided by party walls.

Held, that it was not intended that a wall which was a party wall for the purposes of the section up to a certain height should necessarily continue to be a party wall above that height, so as to be subject as to the upper portion, to the provisions of the Act with regard to party walls.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

An information was filed against the respondents for erecting a building without regard to the provisions of sections 54 (3) and 77 (3) of the London Building Act, 1894.

Section 75 provides (inter alia) as follows: "Except as in this section provided, no building of the warehouse class shall extend to more than 250,000 cubic feet unless divided by party walls in such manner that no division thereof extend to more than 250,000 cubic feet."

Section 54 (3) provides that "an opening shall not be made in any party wall except in accordance with the provisions of this Act in relation thereto."

Section 77 (3) provides that an opening shall not be made in any party wall or in two external walls dividing buildings which, if taken together, would extend to more than 250,000 cubic feet except under certain conditions mentioned in the Act as to the size of the opening and the contrivances for closing it.

The building complained of was of the warehouse class, and extended to 657,408 cubic feet. It was divided by two party walls in accordance with the provisions of section 75. One portion of the building, separated by a party wall from the remaining portion, extended only to one story, while the rest of the building rose above it and extended to five stories. The wall separating the higher from the lower portion of the building, as to that part of it which extended to the first story, was admitted to be a party wall; but the respondents, maintaining that above the first story the wall ceased to be a party wall, and was therefore, as to that part of it, not subject to the provisions of the Act, made openings in it which did not comply with the requirements of the Act.

The magistrate dismissed the summons.

Section 59 (1) of the Act is as follows: "Every party wall shall be carried up of a thickness in a building of the warehouse class equal to a thickness of such wall in the topmost story, and in any other building of 8½in. above the roof, flat, or gutter of the highest building adjoining thereto to such a height as will give a distance (in a building of the warehouse class exceeding 30ft. in height) of at least 3ft., and (in any other building) of 15in., measured at right angles to the slope of the roof or 15in. above the highest part of any flat or gutter, as the case may be."

Horace Avory, for the appellant.—Section 59 (1) meant that a party wall must extend three feet above the highest adjoining building. It was therefore impossible for a wall to be a party wall as to its lower part, and not a party wall as to the part above. These provisions as to party walls were made with a view to diminish the danger from fire. There was a skylight in the lower building, and the danger of fire spreading from the lower building through openings in the upper part of the dividing wall was just what the Act was intended to obviate: Weston v. Arnold, 22 W. R. 284, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 1084, and Knight v. Pursell, 27 W. R. 817, 11 Ch. D. 412.

McCall, Q.C. (R. C. Glen with him), for the respondents.

WRIGHT, J.—The magistrate was right in refusing to convict. There were substantially the same enactments in the old Metropolitan Buildings Acts, and it was not contended that the decisions under those Acts were not right. This was a building extending to more than 250,000 cubic feet.

By virtue of section 75 it must be divided by what are called party walls. But it is obvious that party wall is not there used in a technical sense. The question is whether the enactment has been obeyed. It has been obeyed by the erection of dividing walls. But a certain part of the building is carried no higher than the first floor. Up to that point the walls are properly constructed in accordance with the Act. But above that point the wall has been pierced with windows.

Speaking for myself, I should say that section 59 does not bear the construction contended for. I do not think it was intended that a party wall should extend above the highest adjoining building. Where a man builds an external wall, and that wall adjoins his neighbour's house, which is lower than his own, so as to become a party wall, it ceases to be a party wall above the lower house.

But here the point arises under section 75, and the real ground of my decision is that section 75 has not the uncertain effect of making a wall a party wall above the point where it ceases to divide two buildings.

COLLINS, J.—But for section 75 the wall in question would not be a party wall. Mr. Avory says that the effect of that section is to constitute the wall a party wall. Now, I think if we are considering what is to be treated as a party wall, we must be guided by the definition of a party wall given in section 5. The true definition, according to that section, is a wall which separates the buildings of adjoining owners.

Mr. Avory relies on section 59, and says that that makes a party wall continue to be a party wall up to its full height. The decision in Weston v. Arnold is a decision that, apart from legislative enactment, there is no presumption that a wall which is a party wall is a party wall as to its whole height. But Mr. Avory returns to section 59, and says that that does carry up the party wall as such to its full height. That is not the case. All that the section means is that a party wall shall be carried up to a certain height. So far as a wall is a party wall it must comply with the statute, but so far as it is not, it is not fettered by the statute. You must first find out if the wall is a party wall. We are not bound by reason of section 59 to say that this wall or that is a party wall, when in fact it is an external wall.

Appeal dismissed.
